Stimson had no legal authority and President Coolidge had not a shadow of constitutional right, without a congressional declaration of war or sanction, to authorize Stimson to pledge the armed forces of the United States to a war on Nicaraguans on Nicaraguan soil in enforcement of Stimson's ultimatum. Several Senators, including Borah, said publicly that the President of the United States was properly impeachable for this excess of authority. Stimson, as Secretary of State, made out a Philadelphia lawyer's case for his Presidential client. The difficulty was met largely by euphemisms and name calling. It was not a war but cooperation with the Nicaraguans to put down banditry. Sandino was not a rebel but a bandit.

With that precedent, how easy it would be now for Mr. Stimson to call an American expeditionary force to Europe a mere matter of cooperating with the British in stamping out the banditry of Hitler et al. Stimson will be no good for the military aspects of the enterprise, but his record proves him an expert at putting over a foreign war by the President without congressional authorization. He can put it over in a legal, propaganda, and moral way. The task of putting it over in a practical way, of course, will fall to younger fighting men and executives, the age limit even for generals being 64.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW A. DUNN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, my main reason for not supporting S. 3046 was because I believed it to be undemocratic. I did not support the original Hatch bill, which passed the House last year.

I do not question the sincerity of the sponsors of this legislation, nor those who support it; however, it seems to me that we are getting away from the principles of democracy when we deprive Federal employees of the right to seek office and to publicly support candidates in whom they are interested.

Roosevelt's Decision Cannot Be Delayed Longer—The Real Fight Now Looms Between Two New Deals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE OREGON JOURNAL

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oregon Journal of July 5, 1940:

[From the Oregon Journal of July 5, 1940]

ROOSEVELT'S DECISION CANNOT BE DELAYED LONGER; THE REAL FIGHT NOW LOOMS BETWEEN TWO NEW DEALS

Four months from today the people of the United States will vote on Presidential nominees.

A week ago, in a surprise move, the Republican Convention proclaimed a New Deal for its party and went before the country with its strongest possible ticket—Wendell Willkie, of New York, and Senator Charles L. McNary, of Oregon.

A week from Monday the Democratic convention will meet to name its ticket, and there is no reason why it, too, may not be featured by a surprise move. It is possible that President Roosevelt may decline the nomination of his party for a third term.

Until the invasion of the Low Countries by the Nazis, in early May, political wiseacres the country over chorused assurance that the President would not accept the nomination but would undertake to dictate his successor as head of the ticket.

From mid-May until late June the grim specter of war and the overnight demand for large-scale national defense shadowed all political considerations, and again the acceptance of a third-term nomination by Roosevelt was taken for granted.

Now, America is aware of the gravity of the war situation, public opinion, on record for preparedness, shifts back to politics, again to ask the question: "Is he or isn't he?"

Only the President knows the answer to that question. For months he has maintained the silence of the sphinx. His name appeared on the primary ballots in many States with no word from the White House. Accordingly, an overwhelming majority of delegates will converge on Chicago pledged to his renomination. The people who want Roosevelt for a third term expect him to accept the nomination and do not believe that he will let them down. The nomination will be difficult to decline.

Only the President knows his own mind and heart. Only he can appraise for himself whether he cares to undertake the campaign that would be a fight from start to finish. And it is certain that he would not care to risk defeat with the issues drawn as they appear to be at the moment.

At present no one can forecast with any certainty the outcome of a Willkie-Roosevelt race, beyond the probable election of a Republican House of Representatives.

Both men have personal appeal. Both men have liberal ideals. Willkie previously had indorsed the foreign policy of the Roosevelt administration and had approved its reciprocal trade treaty policy.

Either candidate would suffer much if tainted as an interventionist, because, regardless of party, the people of this country do not want the United States to become embroiled in a foreign war.

To date, there has been no mass sentiment against Roosevelt. The belief that in Roosevelt the average man has a President who cares and who has done something for his material welfare pretty generally prevails.

If Willkie today is not widely known, he soon will be, and his ideas, too. He is that kind of person. There is nothing in his record to indicate other than frankness, candor, and the capacity of making himself understood. The average man may have confidence that Willkie, also, will not overlook him. He may be expected to win many by his own program of social justice.

The Willkie candidacy, too, has appeal to those ardent supporters of Roosevelt's first term who cooled early in 1937 and are now cold to him. There is the businessman, large and small, who has seen himself cuffed around far more than he deserves and who is sick and tired of bureaucratic regimentation that glories in making him do the goosestep.

There are those who well remember how the administration condoned the sit-down strike, ultimately outlawed by the Supreme Court; there are those who cannot forget the effort to enlarge the Supreme Court, and everyone will feel for years the lavish expenditure of money that raised the public debt to an all-time high. Whether there are enough of them who have soured on the New Deal, for these and other reasons, to turn the tide to Willkie in a contest with Roosevelt, no one knows. In brief, the Willkie candidacy has not had time to jell.

Business, large and small, feels that, if given the opportunity, it could relieve the Government of much of the burden of unemployment, which an economic system of free enterprise should facilitate.

All of these and many other important considerations confront the President if he contemplates rejection of the nomination.

On the other hand, last week's Gallup poll showed that 92 percent of the Democratic voters want Roosevelt for a third term, and that is quite an overwhelming percentage.

At long last, Roosevelt must make his decision.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR D. HEALEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

ADDRESS BY ROLAND L. MACDONALD

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Roland L. MacDonald, State commandant, Massachusetts Department Marine Corps League:

Fellow citizens, ladies, and gentlemen, in these dark and dreadful days, when ruthless despotism is ravaging and seeking to destroy the democracies of the world, and when civilization itself hovers on the brink of chaos, America can ill afford to dally with defense.

Lulled into a false sense of security in the belief that the Nation was inviolate, the shocking disclosures of our unpreparedness to meet aggression or invasion struck the national conscience like a Hitler "blitzkrieg." Every American is now fully aware that adequate defense is not only imperative but it must be immediate and efficient if we are to be spared the fate of unprepared European democracies.

What does adequate and efficient preparedness mean? It means more than expanding our military, naval, and air forces. It means more than the accumulation of unlimited men, munitions, and modern mechanized equipment. It means more than the concentration of huge reserves of supplies and material to bolster the combined armed forces defending our democracy.

Adequate preparedness means that the Nation as a whole, individually and collectively, must patriotically support the defense program and be ready and willing to make sacrifices far beyond any the people have been called upon to make in any previous crisis.

Adequate preparedness means that courage and high resolve in themselves are not sufficient, but that courage must be backed by training and efficiency of the highest degree to cope with a super-trained and merciless foe. Of what avail are huge armies, imposing navies, or impressive air armadas if they who man them lack the training necessary for them to withstand a superior force.

To illustrate this, let me relate one of the outstanding episodes of the last World War which, but for the superior training and physical stamina of the American forces involved, might have ended in disaster for the Allied cause. As one who was privileged to participate in that crucial encounter, I believe I am qualified to appraise it at its true value.

It was just 22 years ago, June 6, 1918, to be exact, when the events I am about to describe began. A few days previously the Germans had launched a surprise attack against the Allied forces on the Chemin des Dames sector, northwest of Rheims. The French and British soldiers, exhausted after weeks of heavy fighting, were completely unprepared for a lightning major drive by the enemy, and in a comparatively short time they were forced to retire. The German push continued until they reached the Marne at Chateau-Thierry and then to Belleau Woods on the Paris-Metz road.

Now, Paris was definitely menaced. The sound of the battle could be heard in the city streets. The civilian population began moving out. More than a million fled the city. The Government itself made preparations for a hasty exit, planning to establish headquarters in southern France.

The Germans had established artillery stations and machine-gun nests on rocky eminences concealed in the woods, giving them a commanding sweep of the open wheatfields and roads in the low terrain.

At that time, my own marine machine-gun battalion, attached to the Second Division of the Regular Army of the A. E. F., had just been relieved from the front line at Verdun. On Memorial Day word was received that the Allied line had been broken and we were ordered to reinforce the position and stop the German advance. At daybreak the next morning we started out to join our Allies and help stem the enemy drive. Traveling in lorries, our progress was hampered by the hordes of refugees fleeing Paris, then under bombardment by Big Berthas and bombing planes. As we advanced we came upon other refugees, lowly peasants from the country, old men and women who probably had never been more than 10 miles from home in their lives. Pitiful creatures, trundling what they had salvaged of personal belongings, hurrying they knew not where.

During the nighttime, proceeding without lights or guidance, we several times drove through the German lines, which were in snakelike formation, only to reappear in Allied territory. All this time we were under constant aerial attacks and artillery fire. How we managed to reach our objective without disaster is one of war's miracles which only Divine Providence can explain.

We took up our position in the low-lying wheatfields, unaware of the enemy concealed in the woods and also unaware that we had marched into what the Germans believed was a death trap. We were met by hordes of French soldiers and refugees retreating under rear-guard protection, who had apparently given up all hope and conceded victory to the Germans. "Finis le Guerre,"—the war is over—they cried despairingly. "Finished, bah," was the rejoinder of the marines as they prepared to meet the onslaught.

Unexpectedly there came an order from the commanding French general for the Second Division to retire to Meaux. We were then only 25 miles from Paris and the order to retreat caused dismay to the Americans. One Marine officer refused to heed the order and flung back the famous, "Retreat be hanged, we've only just got here."

For 26 days the marines and the equally trained soldiers of the Second Division resisted the full force of the enemy's fury and refused to give ground. Fierce hand-to-hand fighting finally cleared the Germans from their woodland positions and with their collapse the whole German line began falling back. It was the turning point in the war. Paris was saved and Allied victory was assured.

Unfortunately there are many sincere and well-intentioned persons in America who believe that we will not be obliged to defend this country only in the event of actual invasion. We regret that this is not true. Should the Allies lose this war, which God forbid, the totalitarian victors could bring this Nation to its knees by economic pressure exerted through the South American republics. Under the terms of the Monroe Doctrine the United States is bound to defend the Western Hemisphere against any and all forms of aggression, and it is possible that we may have to wage war outside of our own territory to protect our economic structure.

But it is not only against outside enemies that we need adequate defense. There are enemies within who desire the downfall of the American stronghold of democracy. Make no mistake about it, my friends, we have a "fifth column" in this country that would plunge the treacherous knife into Uncle Sam's-back at the first opportunity.

As a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, so will any defense program be no stronger than the weakest effort to support it. There must be united effort to guarantee security. Rich and poor, industry and labor, big business and agriculture must all pull together for the sake of America. There must not be any racial, religious, or political difference on this vital issue. United we stand, divided we fall, must be the guiding motto of every true American through this national crisis.

The Marine Corps League, of which I have the honor to be State commandant of the Massachusetts Department, stands four-square for preparedness in the realization that adequate defense is the best guaranty of peace. We are ready to aid in any way possible in bringing our country's defense to such strength that no foreign aggressor dare attempt to challenge our supremacy.

When that objective has been attained, America will be in a position to lead a war-weary world into the paths of peace, a peace founded on justice and self-respect, that lasting peace which will give to all peoples the God-given right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. To that end our national-defense program is aimed. With such an objective, we cannot fail.

President's Demand for More Money Constitutes Apology to Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago when some of us Members were protesting against the demand that Congress adjourn promptly for the summer, when a few of us who realized the pitiable state of our defenses insisted that this Congress stay on the job and remedy this condition, we met with scorn from the White House.

President Roosevelt at that time told his press conference that Congress should go home. He said that if we stayed here all we would do would be to make speeches—speeches which impliedly were useless.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the President sent to this Congress an urgent message asking that we appropriate or authorize a total of five billions of dollars in appropriations for national defense. The need, he said, was immediate, and the objective was total defense.

It is a matter upon which the country is to be congratulated, that the President has at last seen the urgency of our defense needs. And further congratulations are due the country that the President has found that under the American form of Government Congress serves a different purpose than merely making speeches—that we are a part of the Government and that under the Constitution which still prevails we have a duty and a responsibility to the people who send us here.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this message of the President constitutes an apology for his former sneering remarks as well as an indication that the President is willing to concede that there are other branches in our form of government besides the executive.

Theater Must Be Purged

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great furor over my remarks of July 4 on the demise of the W. P. A.

theater project. Such terms as "bigotry," "witch's hunt," "liberty," and "red" baiting have been employed in the usual "party line" manner. On the other hand, many warm messages of approval have reached me.

There is nothing so new in all this. The sad thing is that there is not something new—the ridding of the theater of this communistic crowd. When the theater project was debated in the House on May 23 last we were warned against the continued dominance of the Communists and the Workers Alliance in theatrical affairs, yet on the very next day Actors' Equity, at the annual election of council members, showed its preference for leaders of that stripe by electing Sam Jaffe, as I previously pointed out.

The official report of this annual meeting mentions "a disappointingly small turn-out of scarcely 350 members" out of a total membership of over 4,000.

Except for a couple of emotional flare-ups toward the end of the meeting—

The report states—

this was generally a quiet and amicable meeting, which received the reports of officers and committees, cast ballots which elected the entire regular ticket of officers and councilors, and sustained the Chair in its ruling that a resolution which would have committed Equity to nonparticipation in any aspect of the war, or preparation for it, was out of order.

Note that this indicates that the "slate" was "streamlined" through. The emotional flare-ups mentioned in the report were later described. It seems that Philip Loeb has quite a lot to say at these policy meetings. The Dies committee has him cataloged as belonging to or participating in the following communistic projects:

American Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom; Theater Arts Committee; National Emergency Conference for Democratic Rights; American League for Peace and Democracy; in defense of the Bill of Rights; New Masses letter to the President; statement by American Progressives on the Moscow Trials, volume 1, page 375, hearings of this committee.

Let us see what this last tag refers to. I will quote from page 374 of the sworn testimony of Walter S. Steele, representing the National Republic, and chairman of the American Coalition Committee on National Security, representing various organizations:

There has grown up in the United States quite a vast group referred to freely in non-Communist circles as Russians' and communism's "antiseptic squad," meaning small groups devoting its efforts toward ridiculing the idea of a "red" menace and attempting to discredit anyone who charges that there is such a menace. This group also protests attempts of Congress and State legislatures to advance laws to deal with revolutionists and their activities. It carried on a vocal and "in the paper" campaign for recognition of Russia. It condemns the releasing of radicals from college and other professional and political positions. It comes to the front in event of attempted deportations of alien "reds" and for the advancement of citizenship to aliens who refuse to swear allegiance to our country. In other words, its job is to defend Russia and communism and to coo our people into calmness in face of the reality of a "red" menace in the United States, which they claim is but a myth.

In November 1937 over 500,000 of such individuals are reported to have affixed their signatures to what the "reds" entitled the "Golden Book" which was a book of eulogies to the Communist Government of Russia on the event of its 20 years of rule and ruin of the Russian people. This book was dispatched to Mr. Stalin, the dictator, through the Russian Ambassador in the United States.

In April 1938 some of this type even went so far as to declare their support and approval of the widespread epidemic of Government killings of individuals whom Stalin claims were deserters and enemies of his regime. They said:

"The measures taken by the Soviet Union to preserve and extend its gains and its strength find echoes here, where we are staking the future of the American people on the preservation of progressive democracy and the unification of our efforts to prevent Fascists from strangling the rights of our people. American liberals must not permit their outlook on these questions to be confused, nor allow recognition of the place of the Soviet Union in the international fight for democracy against fascism to be destroyed. We call upon them to support the efforts of the Soviet Union to free itself from insidious internal dangers * * *."

And there, among two columns of signatures, is that of Philip Loeb, this spokesman of the Council of Actors' Equity Association. Going back to the official report of this latest annual meeting, Loeb is described as being "particularly disturbed over the campaign against Sam Jaffe, nominated for the council on the regular ticket, whom Mr. Loeb described as 'one of the finest, noblest creatures in the theatrical professional, a man of culture and an asset to the profession.'"

Anyone sufficiently interested in this question to read my remarks will readily recognize in them a constructive suggestion to the theater and to the great majority of patriotic members of the profession to clean house. I challenge the Actors' Equity Council to go publicly on record that the seven members of its governing council that I have named are not Communist "fellow travelers" or Communist members. As to demands for proof, the council may rest assured that the appropriate branches of the United States Government will adequately care for that in due time. It is significant that Sam Jaffe, one of those I named, has issued a statement offering Congress a "swap." He, with others of his ilk, "will resign from Equity Council the day Congress restores the Federal Theater to full activity." That is exceedingly generous of a man who signed, last August 10, a manifesto addressed to many publications in this country, which was characterized by The Nation in its issue of September 2, 1939, as "an unqualified endorsement of the Soviet system."

Perhaps Mr. Jaffe would like to explain also, his membership in the Theater Arts Committee, and the League Against War and Fascism, later known as the League for Peace and Democracy, which the Dies committee has officially designated as a front organization of the Communist Party. He could also amplify his public statement that I would have been entirely incorrect had I offered as an excuse for killing the W. P. A. theater project the fact of his election to Equity's Council. He states he was "not on the council of Actors' Equity when the project was killed."

The United States Senate had restored the theater project in House Joint Resolution 544. Senator ADAMS, in charge of the legislation, stated to the Senate that no inquiry had been made by his committee as to whether or not any Communists were still on Equity's Council, and the Senate was willing to give the profession another chance. It voted the theater project back into the appropriation. This would have given the deserving people in the profession the same status as those in other W. P. A. projects. Local sponsorship is required for all W. P. A. projects, and the Senate's action would have revived the theater project and put it on a par with the others. However, the conferees, 4 weeks after Jaffe's election, struck down the project again.

Mr. Louis Schaffer of the Garment Workers Union, director of the Labor Stage in New York City, has published a booklet entitled "Stalin's Fifth Column on Broadway." He gives convincing proof that T. A. C.—Theater Arts Committee—is a Communist Front organization. To quote a short passage:

To trail in the wake of T. A. C. is to uphold the hands of those who helped wreck the Federal Theater by pursuing the factional ends of the Stalin machine and who will discredit any effort at reconstruction because the world knows them for what they are; the friends of the Soviet Army which invaded Finland, slanderers and demagogue in the service of an alien national interest.

Contrast that quotation with the very brief résumé of Philip Loeb's championship of T. A. C., in the report of Equity's annual meeting of May 24, page 17 of Equity for June. The report represents Mr. Loeb as resenting "the ruling adopted by Equity in April, forbidding the Equity membership to resort to other organizations, and specifically T. A. C., on matters of obtaining Federal relief for actors."

"I do not think it incompatible to be a good member of T. A. C. and a good member of Equity," he declared.

Mr. Loeb, Mr. Jaffe, Mr. Sherman, Miss Marsh, Mr. MacLean, Mr. Hewitt, Miss Van Cleve, and Mr. Heller, mentioned in my July 4 remarks, are all members of T. A. C. and have fought tenaciously to aline Equity with that organization.

Loeb also offers Congress a swap, and has the temerity to utter the word "bigotry." Another swapper is Hiram Sherman. On what meat do these our Caesars feed, who offer to stop their communistic activities in exchange for congressional acquiescence in their demands?

It is my hope that the entertainment professions will weed out the Communists occupying key positions in their organizations. I am convinced that only by doing so, can they hope for the assistance of Congress which they have sought.

Mr. Speaker, let me close these remarks with the reading of two of the communications on this subject I have received representing two viewpoints. Here is a letter from a woman who has seen and experienced the under-cover workings of these Communists. For obvious reasons, I am omitting her name:

Representative LAMBERTSON of Kansas,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: Thank God you see through the Federal Theater Project. There are those of us who are compelled to sit by and see the Communists strangle worthy actors and our profession. It is a horrible feeling. This situation has been going on for such a long time that the stench has finally reached high Heaven and I hope you will personally see that there is a thorough clean-up. I know your job won't be easy for the Communist clings with a tenaciousness that refuses to let go. I only wish I could jump in and help free the theater of this pestilence. These have been hard times for me, but managed to get along somehow without W. P. A. Sometimes I didn't know which way to turn, but I wasn't born in good old Illinois for nothing. I kept my chin up. So it is with a profound feeling of gratitude that I write to thank you for taking your stand against these vultures who not only seek to destroy my profession but all professions, our families, our homes, and finally our Nation.

Perhaps you won't even read this letter, but it gives me courage to write my feelings to a man who has grasped the situation, especially in this hour when we need so much courage to go on.

Thanks to you and God bless you.

Sincerely.

The following is the way in which Horace Casselberry views the situation:

45 WEST 47.

LAMMY:

Ignorance is about the loosest thing that bigotry ever uses to defeat itself. Yours is no exception. We confidently expect your congressional demise in due order. Kansas is John Brown's old stamping ground and the spiritual distance between you and old John Brown is as great as the black bottomless abyss between the young Jew Jesus, and the Pope of Rome. Equity will still be Equity when you are laid out cold by your own Kansas constituents and not a single actor to mourn you. You may fatuously believe that you are "ganging up" on Equity, but you are actually "ganging up" on yourself. "Red" baiting is a thing that comes home to roost, especially when it is as viciously ignorant as yours. What Congress needs just now more than anything else is a few intelligent Communists in seats close to yours. That will come in time. We are glad you used the RECORD to expose yourself so neatly. We earnestly hope to hear more from you of the same high order of ignorance.

HORACE CASSELBERRY.

The Leaf and the Life

OF

HON. JED JOHNSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

ADDRESS BY DR. GEORGE W. TRUETT

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under the special leave granted me, I am including as a part of my remarks a very unusual, eloquent, and inspiring address delivered some 38 years ago by Dr. George W. Truett, who for about a third of a century has been pastor of the First Baptist Church of Dallas, Tex., and for 5 years was president of the Baptist World Alliance.

May I add that this address made such a profound and lasting impression upon my mind when I first read it as a small lad that I feel it will be of genuine interest to citizens of all ages, creeds, or political faiths. It is a literary gem.

This memorable address, delivered by one of the world's greatest pulpit orators, and outstanding religious leader, follows:

THE LEAF AND THE LIFE

The topic upon which I am to speak is, The Leaf and the Life. It at once suggests the wide influence of the printed page upon all human life, whether upon the individual, the home, the state, or the church.

In thinking upon this subject a scene of the olden days passes before me. An old man is confined in the dark, cold, noisome Mamertine prison. Upon him are marks of feebleness by reason of advancing age and also the scars of many a hard-fought battle. The time of his departure is almost at hand. He has fought a good fight and is now complacently awaiting the summons to go hence. But before he goes he must write to his son in the ministry, Timothy, the gifted young pastor of the church at Ephesus. It is all a very realistic picture. See the old man as he slowly writes, "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me." Poor, old, lonely soldier, while the shadows are so heavily gathering about him, it is no wonder that he yearns for the companionship of his dear young friend. He goes on to write, "The cloak that I left at Troas, with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee." You see, Paul was no Christian Scientist. He was just a plain sensible man, recognizing that he had a physical body, and that he needed his cloak in order that he might be somewhat protected against the cold. Then he added these significant words: "Bring with thee the books, but especially the parchments." Just what these books and parchments were, of course, we may not positively say, but it is probable that they were the Holy Scriptures, together with other noble books that had wrought mightily in their influence over Paul, and were unspeakably precious to his great heart.

Though he was first and foremost in all the works and triumphs of Christianity, though he was marvelously endowed by nature and by grace for his incomparable work as an apostle, yet Paul prized beyond all human computation his books. They were his constant companions and fellow helpers through all the eventful years of his matchless ministry. Paul was not only a flaming evangelist, he was a glorious teacher of doctrine as well. The two should always go together. In his far-reaching outlook for the work of the kingdom, Paul employed the leaf as well as the voice. Indeed, the crowning work of his life was the writing of his Epistles.

This scene of the olden days suggests some lessons of measureless moment to the people of God. Prominent among these lessons is that of the possibility of preserving and disseminating truth by means of the printed page. The printing press is man's greatest mechanical triumph. By this means we not only become the heirs of the thoughts of the wisest and best men of all the ages but we have also the transcription of the very thoughts of God. This is a triumph beside which none other of man can begin to compare. Though one may be poor, seeing never the wise and great of the earth, yet by means of the printed page they enter his humble home and become his personal companions and friends. Thus Franklin enriches him with his practical wisdom. Shakespeare reveals to him the worlds of imagination, and Milton sings to him of paradise. Nobly has Milton said of a good book that "It is the precious life blood of a master spirit treasured up unto a life beyond." And strongly does Emerson say, in his great Essay on Books, that "there are books which take rank in our life with parents and lovers and passionate experiences, so medicinal, so stringent, so revolutionary, so authoritative."

We are never to lose sight of the truth that it is utterly impossible for the printed page to take the place of the preacher. The progress of civilization, the vast increase of schools and learning, the amazing triumphs of the press, mighty as are all these agencies, they can never supersede the divinely sent preacher. "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." Let not Christ's minister for one moment lose sight of the divineness of his mission. Of him it has been truly said: "He holds a divine commission, he proclaims a divine revelation, he is animated by a divine purpose, he accomplishes a divine result, he is dependent upon a divine Spirit." As in the past, so shall it ever be in the future, that God's foremost instrument in both the evangelization and civilization of the world is His preacher.

But it is just as true that the preacher can never take the place of the printed page. The preacher and the printed page are correlatives. Hand in hand they always need go, and their union should be as vital and as indissoluble as was that of the Siamese twins. Their conjoined influence finds striking illustration in the rise of Protestantism. The preacher alone did not bring about the great Reformation, and could not have brought it about. The printer had to come in. Luther was the preacher, Erasmus was the writer.

This truth is still more strikingly illustrated in the union of Christ the incarnate word and Christ the written word. The incarnate word was not enough; neither was the written word enough. Therefore, the word "incarnate" and the word "written" stand or fall together. The two storm centers of all religious history and controversy have been Christ and the Bible. The Bible is the complement and counterpart of Christ. They are one and inseparable—the binomial word of God. The porch of Solomon's temple was upheld by two mighty pillars of brass, the names of which were Jachin, meaning strength, and Boaz, meaning continuance. When the ancient Jew went to the temple, though faint and weary from his journey, the sight of those two pillars always brought confidence to his heart and strength to his arm. The leaf and the life, the word "written" and the word "incarnate," are the Jachin and Boaz in the whole scheme of the Christian religion. They must stand or fall together, for the veracity of the one stands pledged for the perpetuity of the other. We do not have one iota of fear as to the destiny of either, but our deepest conviction is that if Jesus Christ is to reign throughout all the world—an ultimate triumph of which we have not a doubt—to a marvelous degree the propaganda must be carried on by the dissemination of the word of God. Its leaves, like the leaves of the tree of life, are for the healing of the nations. Those leaves are to be sent upon the four winds of heaven, bearing the tidings of salvation to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

Would you see the influence of the leaf upon national life? Then you have only to open your eyes to behold illustrations without number. The circulation of the Bible in France, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and England, in the several stages of Protestant development, exercised an immeasurable influence. The iron preacher, the press, could go where the flesh and blood preacher could not go. And when assemblies were unlawful and speakers would be arrested and imprisoned, the leaves from the press were being silently carried from country to country, from city to city, and from house to house.

Take the nations of the earth, and the dividing line between barbarism and civilization, between slavery and liberty, between the shadow of death and the light of life, is the open Bible. In the coronation exercises of Edward VI, three swords were brought to him, the signs of the three kingdoms under his rule. The young ruler demanded that they bring him still another sword, and, when his nobles asked him what it was, he answered that it was the Bible, the Sword of the Spirit, which he preferred to all other swords. That demand of Edward VI was the precursor and prophecy of the coming Reformation. Of this Reformation Carlyle has truly said: "The period of the Reformation was a judgment day for Europe, when all the nations were presented with an open Bible, and all the emancipation of heart and intellect which an open Bible involves. England, North Germany, and other powers, accepted the boon, and they have been steadily growing in national greatness and moral influence ever since. France rejected it, and in its place has had the gospel of Voltaire, with all the anarchy, misery, and bloodshed of the revolutions of which that gospel is the harvest." France would not recognize the indisputable fact that the Bible is the franchise of all civil and religious liberty, and by the same token the security of all national perpetuity. In her Corps Legislatif she condemned the Divine Book, and by resolution said that God should no more have a recognition at the nation's hands. Instead of the Bible, Chambers Encyclopedia, with infidel interpretations by Diderot and others of similar views, was scattered all over the land. A tidal wave was thus and then set in motion that has left its disastrous blight upon France, even to this hour. The Reign of Terror was an inevitable consequence, when mobs marched through the streets of Paris, and the heads of the bravest and the best fell under the guillotine, and the people were plunged into unutterable woe, and their ill-founded temple of freedom went down in fire and blood. All that the leaf can do for a nation's life or a nation's death.

The Reformation began when Luther, rummaging through the library of Erfurt, came upon a dusty copy of the Scriptures and opened it. There he read, "The just shall live by faith," and again he read, "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." He had read enough to change the whole of his life. Here was the search warrant which God himself had put into his hands, entitling him to read for himself, and, without the intervention of priest, pope, or church to interpret for himself God's revealed word. From that came the Reformation. Hitherto the Scriptures had long been hidden away in monasteries, while monks swung their censers and chanted their prayers. But Luther unchained the book, and lo, the truth flew abroad like Milton's angel with the flaming torch. The flying abroad of that truth set tyrants trembling, and thrones tottering, and led to the banishment of the dark night of the Middle Ages, and the mental and moral reformation of all Christendom.

England's noble queen, when she was asked the secret of her country's greatness, explicitly and instantly avowed that it was the Bible. The preamble of our Declaration of Independence was unquestionably borrowed from Paul's sermon on Areopagus, and our whole political fabric is permeated with the teachings of the Bible. Put it down as an inevitable and unalterable truth that wherever God's book has been honored, there national life has been glorious. Wherever it has been dishonored, upon such people have fallen blight and shame and death.

Not only is it true that national life is very largely directed and molded by the printed page, but it is equally true of social life. Do you not recall the influence that was wrought upon London by Thomas Hood, as he wrote in simple verse of the wrongs inflicted upon the seamstresses of that great city:

"Stitch, stitch, stitch,
With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman sat in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread.

"Stitch, stitch, stitch,
O men with sisters dear,
O men with mothers and wives;
It is not linen you're wearing out,
But human creatures' lives."

Those simple words fastened upon the printed page stirred the world's greatest city to its deepest depths. And the leaf has wrought this same result, in greater or lesser degree, in the social life of every community.

None the less true is it in individual life. The word is filled with illustrations of the truth that individual life is often shaped and its destiny determined by the reading of just one book, or even a tract. Let us dwell for a moment upon some well-known instances. Take this oft-mentioned one: An old puritan doctor wrote a book on the bruised reed, which fell into the hands of Richard Baster, and led him to the saving knowledge of eternal life, and thus was begun a ministry of world-wide power. Then Baster wrote a book, the Call of the Unconverted, which speaks on and on to uncounted millions, though the author's lips have long been silent in the dust. Baster's book got into the hands of Philip Doddridge, and was the means of leading him to a broader knowledge and a richer faith and a deeper experience of the things of God. Then Doddridge wrote a book called the Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, which book fell into the hands of William Wilberforce, and so impressed him that he wrote a book called Practical Christianity. And this book in turn made its way far down into the sunny Isle of Wight, and there thrilled the heart of Leigh Richmond. Then Richmond wrote the Dairyman's Daughter, which book has been translated into more than 50 languages of the earth, working, wherever it goes, an immeasurable influence for the extension of the Gospel. Still again this book of Wilberforce made its way far down into a secluded parish in Scotland, and its reading worked an epoch in the life of a young man who was afterward to thrill the world with his glorious ministry—the eloquent Thomas Chalmers. There it is, not a break in the chain, Baster, Doddridge, Wilberforce, Richmond, Chalmers, and after these names another word needs to be added—eternity.

Note again the example of Peter Waldo with his great cargo of tracts, which he scattered in the Piedmontese valleys, the outcome of which was the Waldensian churches, which through 35 persecutions, held fast to the truth of the Bible, although "Gashed by the spear of Savoy and scorched by the fagot of Rome."

Look again at John Wycliff, the great tract writer and distributor, one of whose tracts was carried by a Bohemian nobleman into Bohemia, and loaned by him to a man who would read it and be converted to God, and fill the world with his glorious testimony and service, the immortal John Huss.

Notice that it was a little leaf written by Luther that reached the heart of the Bedfordshire tinker, Bunyan, who was later to write an allegory unmatched and forever matchless.

Take this fact also in the history of French Protestantism: Admiral Coligny was dangerously wounded at the siege of St. Quentin, and during his illness his brother brought him some tracts, the reading of which led him to the acceptance of Christ's gospel, and to become one of its greatest Huguenot champions.

Then, again, some of these tracts went off and somehow made their way into a convent where the lady abbess, Charlotte de Bourbon, was converted to God by reading just one of them, and so thoroughly converted was she, that she fled from France and took refuge at Heidelberg, in the court of Frederick III, of the Palatinate. By and by this good woman did the sensible thing to get married, and her husband was the famous Prince William of Orange. Who knows but that a vast deal of the positive, glorious stubbornness of William of Orange of the Revolution, was inherited from the blood of his ancestress, who was led to God by the reading of this one little tract?

Take a nearer illustration: Yonder upon the upper banks of the Delaware, more than a hundred years ago, a lonely missionary to the Indians, David Brainerd, daily jotted down in his diary the struggles and hopes and triumphs of his checkered experiences. This was probably not written for any other eyes than his own; but after the body of that heroic missionary had been laid away in the grave, that simple diary crossed the ocean, reached England's great university at Cambridge, and was there read by a most gifted student. The student was Henry Martyn, who, through the reading of that little diary, was led to the winning of a wide immortality as a foreign missionary.

You do not have to go beyond your own experiences to observe the measureless influences of the printed page. A tract, dropped into a man's hands between scenes at a theater, led to his salvation. A tract, put into the hands of a humble plowboy, shaped the destiny of the great preacher and editor, Jeremiah Bell Jeter, of Virginia. A tract on Stewardship and Foreign Missions, enclosed in a letter to a plain businessman in his own State, led him to realize for the first time his duty as God's steward, and, at once, out of only a modest income, he gave $5,000 to foreign missions. So little a thing as a tract led to the founding of the great Bible Society in England. If I mistake not, the founding of this great American Baptist Publication Society was suggested by so little a thing as the dropping of a tract from the hat of Samuel Cornelius, which even suggested to Noah Davis the need and power of a great tract society which should send throughout the land a wholesome, God-honoring literature. Ah, it is true that:

"Many a shaft at random sent, Finds marks the archer never meant."

Mr. Spurgeon tells the incident that one day a cabman drove him home, and when the great preacher paid his fare, the cabman said, "A long time since I drove you home, sir." "But," said Mr. Spurgeon, "I do not recollect you." "Well," said the cabman, "I think it was about 14 years ago," and then he pulled from his pocket a little worn and faded copy of the New Testament, and holding it up to the preacher he said, "Perhaps you will remember this. You gave it to me and asked me to read it, and I read it and it led me to the Saviour, and I have been trying to serve Him through all these years." Ah, a simple deed was that; who could not do it? And yet, by service as easy and simple, we may daily batter down the strongholds of sin and Satan, and enthrone righteousness and the Lord of life.

These simple illustrations reveal to us the amazing expansion of thought by means of the printed page. The reproductiveness of truth, by means of the press, may never, even approximately, be measured. Truth may thus be looked upon as a seed, with limitless powers of self-propagation. The author of a good book may die but his thoughts, being fastened on the printed page, live on to cheer and inspire the reader to noblest endeavor. Milton was therefore right when he said: "For books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a progeny of life in them, as active as that soul whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that held them."

The printed page embalms thought. Homer, though dead these hundreds of years, lives far more widely today than when first he wrote his poems. Milton and Dante still sing on to the succeeding generations through the Paradise Lost and the Inferno, though their bodies have long since returned to the dust whence they came. Shakespeare passed away nearly 300 years ago, but his thoughts breathe on and influence today with an incomparably greater power than they did in the days of the Tudors. Longfellow sleeps yonder beneath the blooming flowers, but his beautiful songs of Indian life and Puritan history live on with undiminished power.

Tersely has Dr. Strong declared: "A book is the greatest leveler. It is utterly democratic. As Shakespeare makes Buckingham say in scorn of Wolsey, 'A begger's book outweighs a noble's blood.' The book cover is a door without bolt or bar, which swings open to all alike, admitting the ploughboy and the shop girl to intimacy with the world's four hundred." Dr. Pierson has nobly said of the power of the printed page that, "It unlocks the doors to the treasure houses of the race. It introduces all readers, without invidious distinctions, into the inner circle of authors, admitting all alike to the privilege of communing with them. In other ways we may seek in vain their acquaintance and audience, hindered by the forms of polite society, or their own seclusive and exclusive habits. Many authors are dead and therefore are out of reach; others, yet living, are too remote to be accessible. But the intelligent reader finds himself shut out by no wall of exclusion. He has the right of entrance and of converse, and none can forbid him. The palaces of the kings of letters stand with open gates, and there are no sentries or guards. The beggar's attire, the slave's bonds, or even the taint of crime prevents no seeker after knowledge from this instructive and elevating communion with the good and the great." He goes on to say that: "Books are the undying bodies in which authors continue to live and breathe, speak and act, and so find a sort of perpetual and potential incarnation, moving among men with immortal life."

The destiny-shaping power of the printed page is almost miraculous. The temporal and eternal destiny of many a boy has been determined by 1 hour's reading. A book fell into his hands, the reading of which charmed his mind and gave him a distinct and sublime purpose for all his after life. He rose up from the reading of its pages, to follow after his ideal as a lawyer, or statesman, or teacher, or preacher. No influence will ever undo the work of those few pages. They have given the boy his bow of hope and nothing will ever turn him away from their enchanting influences. It was this that led Henry Drummond to say:

To fall in love with a good book is one of the greatest events that can befall us. It is to have a new influence pouring itself into our life, a new teacher to inspire and refine us, a new friend to be by our side always who, when life grows narrow and weary, will take us into his wider and calmer and higher world. Whether it be biography, introducing us to some humble life made great by duty done; or history opening vistas into movements and destinies of nations that have passed away; or poetry, making music of all the common things around us and filling the fields and skies and the works of the city and the cottage with eternal meanings; whether it be these, or story books, or science, no one can become the friend of even one good book without being made wiser and better."

No tongue is among us that is able adequately to describe the epoch-making influence of the leaf upon the life. Let it be repeated, a good book put into a boy's hands at a certain hour saves him for time and eternity. Another book of opposite character leaves the boy a skeptic and sends him through life a foe to men and a hater of God and into eternity with soul unclothed and doomed. Franklin traced his entire career to the reading of Cotton Mather's Essays To Do Good, which fell into his hands while he was yet a boy. Faraday attributed the arousing of his genius to the reading of a few books when he was an apprentice to a bookbinder. Carey's great decision to be a missionary was made as he read The Voyages of Captain Cook. Emerson's book on Nature made Tyndall a naturalist. Samuel Drew tells us that Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding transformed him from low and groveling views of life to just the opposite. And English tanner of great excellence ascribed the preeminent value of his leather to the reading of Carlyle. The book of Proverbs, used as a first reader in the schools of Scotland, has largely made that people the practical, virile, stalwart people that they are. Who can ever measure the influence of one little American leaf, the Declaration of Independence? It is a model unapproachable in its simplicity, its fearless arraignment of tyranny, and its bold assertion and wise limitation of the rights of men. The echoes of that paper, that all men are created free and equal, with certain inalienable rights, have reverberated throughout all the earth, and will yet, please God, find an acceptance by every government in the world.

Just in proportion as good literature has the power to uplift and ennoble and transform does bad literature have the power to corrupt and drag down and destroy. The assassin of Lord Russell said that the reading of one bad book had made him a criminal and a murderer. John Angell James, one of England's greatest and noblest Christians, said, when an old man, that he had never fully recovered from the ill effects of 15 minutes' reading of a bad pamphlet when he was a boy.

The great thing about the leaf is not so much the information it gives as the effect it leaves upon character. Every stream has what is called its residuum. For instance, where iron is in solution it is seen in the reddish hue of the stone in the bed of the stream. Or, where sulfur is deposited there the green tints may be seen. So it is with the leaf—it leaves its residuum on the life. A strong, stalwart body cannot remain so if it be fed on dainty viands, with here and there a bit of poison impregnated in them. Neither can the mental and moral nature flourish when it is fed on corrupt food, however attractive and sugar-coated it may be. "Let it be observed and remembered," says Noah Porter, "that a book is always written by a man, and that it is never by any magic or mystery any better than its author makes it to be." Holy Writ has told us that "evil communications corrupt good manners." And, again, "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise, but the companion of fools shall be destroyed." There is a companionship of books as real as is the companionship of men. And a man's character may be judged as much, if not more, by the books he reads as by the men with whom he associates. If it be deleterious in the formation and training of noble character to keep company with people who are vicious and bad, equally, if not more deleterious, is it to read bad books.

There is a psychological reason for this, which is, that impressions made upon the eye are much more lasting than those made upon the ear. Impressions made upon the ear are transient. It is not so with those made upon the eye, for the reason that sight appeals strongly to the imagination, while sound does not. The written word abides because it is seen, while the spoken word soon passes because it is only heard. That is not only an amusing incident, but also an exceedingly instructive one, which H. Clay Robinson tells us in his diary. When a little boy he was corrected for misspelling a word. He appealed to his spelling book and proved that he had spelled the word according to the book. When told that it had been printed incorrectly, he said, "I was quite confounded. I believed as firmly in the infallibility of print as any good Catholic can in the infallibility of his church. I knew that naughty boys would tell stories, but how a book could contain a falsehood was quite incomprehensible." That a revelation and testimony this is to the power of the printed page. Oh, ye editors of papers and ye authors of books, with what scrupulous care should you seek ever to write the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, since the printed falsehood, whether subtle or glaring, never fails to get in its diabolical impression. It is well nigh impossible for the young especially not to be impressed by what they see in print, however ridiculous or wicked the printed statement may be. There is a kind of sacredness about the printed page that is the foster child of faith. Who does not know that the most glaring immoralities have been clothed in poems of enchanting beauty, and that the most deadly infidelity has been so deftly presented as to corrupt the morals of a whole generation? There is not the shadow of a doubt that bad reading furnishes the leading instruction in the school of plunder, licentiousness, and all manner of lawlessness.

My heart is heavy here. Oh, if parents and teachers and preachers would but realize as they ought what the young people of our land are reading. A very flood of false and foul literature, much of it worthy to have been edited in the depths of perdition, is by all sorts of devilish ingenuity being pressed upon the people. There are popular books abroad today, without number that are pestiferous in their influences, damaging in their tendencies, and harmful only in their results. They ought never to be seen on a lady's table or tolerated in a decent home. I am ready to affirm that women had far better spend their time fondling poodles and playing with kittens, than to give it to the reading of such soul-stupefying, mind-enervating, jaundice-hued, false-colored, sin-besmirched literature. As one cannot touch pitch without being defiled, or take fire into his bosom without being burned, so neither can he read fouled literature with impunity.

Agitators and reformers tell us much about the drink traffic. They tell us that it is filling our reformatories and prisons with the victims of drunkenness and crime, and I am sure that they speak the truth. But the multiform, corrupting literature of the day, schools the reader for every vice in the whole catalog of crime. Off by themselves, unsuspected boys and girls are reading these subtle and foul productions, thus feeding their minds upon corrupt visions of life, and hopelessly poisoning their lives at the very fountain head.

No other question is fraught with the tithe of the possibilities, both for good and for evil, as is the question of the literature of the people. And the devil knows this and takes every possible advantage of it. Somehow he always finds plenty of money with which to print every species of false and corrupting literature and plenty of agents to see that it is widely circulated. In this way, more than in any other, he poisons the minds and hearts of all classes against the highest and noblest and best. He even gets in his work in Sunday-school libraries. If you have not carefully examined into your Sunday-school library, there is probably quite a surprise awaiting you.

It was the marvelous possibilities of the press that led Cowper to write his ode to it:

"How shall I speak thee, or thy power address,
How god of our idolatry, the press?
By thee religion, liberty, and laws
Exert their influence and advance their cause.
By thee, worse plagues than Pharaoh's land befell,
Diffused, make earth the vestibule of hell.
Thou fountain, at which drink the good and wise,
Thou ever-bubbling spring of endless lies.
Like Eden's dread probationary tree,
Knowledge of good and evil is from thee."

The only antidote for a bad press is a good one. The only cure for bad and cheap literature is to make good literature and much of it, and give it to the people as cheaply as possible. This is the only way that a scavenger press can be suppressed and overcome. It is God's way, for His word to us is, "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." You have read the dream that Gutenberg had of the power of the press. He once dreamed that as he wrought in his cell in the St. Aborsgot Monastery, he heard a voice warning him that the power of his invention would enable bad men to propagate their wickedneess and sow dragon's teeth. The voice further told him that the time would come when men would profane the art of printing and posterity would curse the inventor. And then Gutenberg hurriedly took a hammer and broke the type into pieces. But then another voice was heard, and this voice bade him desist from the work of destruction and to persist in perfecting his invention. The voice went on to tell him that though his invention should be the occasion of much evil, God would make it the fountain of infinite good, and finally give the right the ultimate triumph in all the earth.

A passing word needs to be said about our religious and denominational papers. Who can estimate their meaning to the home? The home may be ever so humble and far removed from the madding crowd's ignoble strife, but the weekly visit of a noble religious paper, supplemented by the occasional visit of a good book, shapes the life and determines the destiny of that home. The picture of such a home passes before me now. Its inmates were poor and lived in a section where they must toil through all the seasons in order to provide a livelihood. But though all thus had to toil, from the oldest to the youngest, and though the home in which they lived was exceedingly humble, yet they held converse with the men and movements of the great, wide world. The parents turned every extra dollar into good literature for their children.

They believed with Erasmus when he said: "I buy books first; after that, if I have any money, I buy clothes." They believed with a great theological teacher, who said to his class, "Young gentlemen, shirts are necessary, but books are indispensable." And so into that home a choice book came as often as it could be afforded, and several of the great religious papers came every week. Those papers and books silently wrought their destiny-shaping power upon all that large family of children, and though far removed from the scenes of the world's great movements, yet they thus became vitally real to all those children and entered into their lives. And when they went forth to the work and warfare of the world all of them had been won to Christ and do joyfully walk in His blessed service to this day. Is this a mean or ordinary result? Nay, it is the sublimest result possible in the history of an earthly home. And more than all things else, the literature provided out of a scant purse for those children, during the plastic years of their childhood and youth, shaped their characters and determined their destiny. Oh, how can parents and teachers and preachers be oblivious to this transcendently important matter of right literature? Carelessness here is worse than being foolish, it is wicked.

A further word needs to be said about the denominational paper, and a plain word it needs to be. It is the bane of some so-called religious and denominational papers that they have lost their great religious purpose and have gone off after matters sociological and semipolitical. I could name such papers that were once as Samson for religious strength, but like him later when his locks were shorn. Once they wrought mightily for the distinctly religious welfare of the churches, but now they are religiously nerveless and palsied and their power is gone. You ask the reason why. There is but one answer—they have lost their distinctively religious passion and purpose. A denominational paper ought to be the counterpart in spirit and purpose of the Acts of the Apostles. Instead of a little missionary corner in the paper there ought to be a pulse beat in every line for missions. The supreme trouble with the missionary work now is that it is crowded off into a little corner. We want a missionary literature that will enthrone the one great passion and purpose of Jesus Christ, and do this in every issue of the paper and in every column of every issue. Until that is done by our papers, our preachers, and our churches, the continuing black plague upon all our religious efforts will be the antimissionary spirit. We are not here primarily to cultivate sociology or to build up civilization. Our primary business is to give the Gospel to the whole world. On no other basis has a church the moral right to the plot of ground on which her building stands. What was our Lord's conception of His church? For what did He build it? His church, He tells us, was to be His body, the instrument of His will, the medium through which He would manifest Himself to the world. It is the business of the body to execute the purpose of the head.

Christ's church is His body, and it is His purpose that the body shall carry forward the work that brought him from heaven to earth. For what did He come? "It is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." This was His supreme mission, and that of His churches is identical with that of their divine founder and King. For this cause He brought them into the world, and for this cause He keeps them here. Our supreme danger is that we shall perish, not so much from our wickedness as from the littleness of our conceptions and efforts for God's kingdom in the earth. It was Archimedes who said, "Give me a lever sufficiently long, and a fulcrum upon which to rest it, and I'll turn the world over." Yes, and let the hosts of our Baptist people enthrone as their dominant purpose and passion the salvation of this whole world for Christ, and sound this forth, in every possible way, by leaf and by voice, and ere long the banner of Emmanuel will wave over every acre of this earth's soil.

May I refer for a moment to colportage work? It suggests a prospect that is thrillingly glorious. It is getting back to first principles. It is the gospel way of going into the highways and hedges to reach the people. Brethren, the wheels of the chariot will drag on, oh, so slowly, and the coming of the kingdom will be so long delayed, unless we go back to the Christ-appointed way of reaching the people. The colporter has this opportunity as has no other man. Therefore, every Christian ought to be a self-appointed colporter. Every church ought to be lighthouse for the constant distribution of life-giving literature. It is indeed a sad day for Christianity when churches of individuals become too dignified to do this work.

All hail to the colporters! They are doing for God and for men a work the greatness and glory of which may only be read in the golden glory of the land and life eternal. In the congested populations of our great cities, they are silently scattering the leaves of life. Out yonder in the quiet country places, whence come the men who are to dominate the world's thought and life, there the colporter is getting in his glorious work. One of his books will mark the destiny of that eager, awkward country boy. Pass over a few years and you may see that same boy in a great city, where the black tides of worldliness and sin surge against every life, and as a flaming herald for Christ he will rally the tempted, wavering people to the standards of truth and righteousness. Another one of those boys will preside over the destinies of a great railroad. Another will stand at the head of a great institution of learning. And still another will shape the religious life of uncounted thousands through a great paper. O brothers, isn't this kind of work worth our while? Is not this the transcendent question before our churches? If the vendors of foul literature can find money to print it and agents to scatter it, will not Christ's blood-bought people see to it, by the grace of God, that all needed moneys are provided for the printing of life-giving God-honoring literature, and that every man of us shall be an unceasing colporter in its widest distribution? In one of our Southern cities there lives a cultured and wealthy woman, who travels much, and whenever she travels she scatters seeds from the multitude of packages she carries with her. In a few months the fruitage of this sowing may be seen in the upspringing of beautiful flowers in all the wake of her travels. Why should not every Christian thus daily scatter the leaves of life?

Some earnest words need also be said about the circulation of the word of God. The fields of such opportunity today are surely white unto the harvest. We marvel at the progress of Christianity in the early days, when few individuals owned a copy of the Holy Scriptures. The multitudes could not own it. It took years to write out one complete copy. Even 100 years ago the printing of the Bible was amazingly expensive, and its circulation was therefore correspondingly limited. A copy of Carey's Bengali Bible cost about $20. Now it may be had for a few cents. The Red Seas of difficulty to the circulation of the Bible, so far as mechanical or financial considerations go, have all parted asunder, and it is now easily possible, so far as cost is concerned, for the speedy putting of the Bible into every home in all the earth.

What is to be our reply to all the attacks made upon the old Book? It is just to print and scatter it all the more. When men tell us that it is not inspired, or if inspired it is only in spots, and nobody knows where the spots are, we are not to waste our lives in cavilling with them. We are not called upon to answer every fool who has escaped from the mortar in which he was brayed. When the old Book is attacked, we are just to go on putting and scattering it all the more, and God will see to it that it will survive every conflict.

To be sure, it has been unceasingly attacked through all the passing generations, and is sorely attacked today. Foes without and within have plotted for its destruction. The Trojan horse is sometimes carried within our own gates, and a company of clever gentlemen, some of whom even wear the garb of theological leaders, and call themselves ministers of the word of the New Testament, have been attempting to draw the bolts of the citadel gates. Numbers of these clever gentlemen have sought to play the role of Jehoiakim; but the old Book has not been harmed. Its bonfires may be red throughout the passing centuries, but out of them all it has come without the smell of fire upon its garments. Voltaire said that he would pass through the forest of Scriptures and girdle all the trees, so that in 100 years Christianity would be only a vanishing memory. The hundred years are gone, poor Voltaire also is gone, with none so poor to do him reverence, while Christianity is still here, and the leaves of the forest of Scriptures are filling all the earth. The very press upon which Voltaire printed that direful prophecy is now used for the printing of Bibles, and the very house in which he lived has become a great depository from which is scattered the word of God. On the very spot in London where the council condemned the bones of Wycliffe to be dug up and burned, there the great British and Foreign Bible Society has its central offices.

The old citadel stands, though every stone in the wall has been attacked. Like Eddystone, despite all the swirling tides and buffeting storms, the old Book stands to cast its steady light over all the broad and storm-swept seas. Like Gibraltar it stands, while the wreck of uncounted hostile fleets lies shivered about its base. Gloriously does Cumming speak of its triumph: "The empire of Caesar is gone; the legions of Rome are mouldering in the dust; the avalanches that Napoleon hurled upon Europe have passed away; the pride of the Pharaohs is fallen; the pyramids they raised to be their tombs are sinking every day in their desert sands; Tyre is a rock for bleaching fishermen's nets; Sidon has scarcely left a wrack behind; but the word of God still survives. All things that threatened to extinguish it have only aided it; and it proves every day how transcient is the noble monument that man can build, how enduring is the least word that God has spoken. Tradition has dug for it many a grave, intolerance has lighted for it many a fagot, many a Judas has betrayed it with a kiss, many a Peter has denied it with an oath, many a Demas has forsaken it, but the word of God still survives." All flesh is as grass. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the word of our God shall stand forever. The mouth of the Lord has declared it:

"A glory gilds the sacred page,
Majestic as the sun,
It gives a light to every age,
It gives and borrows none.

The hand that gave it still supplies
The gracious light and heat.
Its truths upon the nations rise;
They rise, but never set."

After her departure, as well as while she lived, many beautiful incidents are told of England's world-famed Queen Victoria. But this one, more than any other, has thrilled my heart. When the time came, while she was yet a girl, for her to be crowned queen of England, among the many other arrangements for the coronation exercises, it was arranged that the climax of those exercises should be the singing of Handel's Messiah. The young queen had been reared in modest seclusion, and, therefore, did not understand the dignified ways of the court. And so she was informed by the court ladies that though everyone else should rise during the singing of that great oratorio, she must not rise, it would not be proper for royalty, her position was too dignified. The exercises began and went on until the concluding moments, when the great oratorio should be sung. This was begun, and the sublime strains swept on, thrilling every heart. "He shall reign forever and forever." At those words the young queen was seen to tremble with deep emotion, but according to instructions she did not rise. Then the singers reached those all-glorious words, "King of kings, and Lord of lords, King of kings, and Lord of lords." The young queen could no longer remain seated, but, against all the instructions given her as to the proprieties, she rose, lifted her eyes heavenward, then bowed her head and wept. Wasn't it appropriate and beautiful and glorious?

"Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all."

Oh, brothers, I pray Almighty God that your heart and mine from this hour may be bound under a spell, from which we shall have neither the wish nor the power to be disenchanted, and which spell shall hold us until we pass into eternity, that we will give and pray and toil and lay our every power under tribute to enthrone Jesus Christ in the realm of all the literature of this whole broad earth.

Magnus Johnson—The Man and His Cause

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN, OF MINNESOTA

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial speech which I delivered on the occasion of the dedicatory exercises for a memorial monument to the late United States Senator from Minnesota, Magnus Johnson, at Dassel, Minn., June 30, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAGNUS JOHNSON—THE MAN AND HIS CAUSE

In dedicating this memorial today to the memory of Magnus Johnson, we are paying tribute not only to the memory of a man who succeeded, by dint of perseverance, hard work, application, and ability in overcoming great handicaps and in reaching the top, but even more so in paying tribute to a man who truly lived to serve his fellowman.

Magnus, as he was familiarly known to all of us, was a true representative of the people. They placed their trust in him, and that trust was never violated. Magnus never compromised the people's interest. He was severely tested and he was found not wanting.

A study of the life of Magnus Johnson is both inspiring and stimulating. It fills us with hope for the future—hope that the common people can and will find leaders from their own ranks who will carry on the battle for them until victory is won.

BORN IN SWEDEN

MAGNUS JOHNSON was born in Sweden, where so many of the fine pioneers who built this great Northwest came from. He was born on September 19, 1871. His birthplace was a cottage in a rural parish of Varmland Province, on the northern shore of rugged Lake Vanern, about 10 miles west of the city of Karlstad. It is interesting to note that the mother of Minnesota's and America's first Farmer-Labor Governor, the late Floyd B. Olson, was born in a nearby parish in the same province.

Magnus was the son of a Swedish sea captain, and when he was not attending school he went on voyages with his father. He thus came in contact with the world and its cold realities at a very early age. The elder Johnson died when the boy was only 12 years old, and Magnus' mother followed his father 5 years later. His schooling thus came to an abrupt end. From then on he had to obtain his knowledge largely from the school of hard knocks.

JOINS SWEDISH LABOR MOVEMENT

Confronted with the need of earning a livelihood, MAGNUS soon found work as a glass blower and bottle maker in the factory town of Liljedahl, Sweden. It was here that he first came into contact with the rising labor movement. Of this movement he soon became an enthusiastic adherent. It was during this period, also, that he came to know and to work with the great Hjalmar Branting, who later was to become Labor Party premier of Sweden.

This influence had a lasting and wholesome effect on Magnus' life.

The nineties were the final years of the large migration of Scandinavians to America's West, and Magnus was one of those caught up. He was then nearly 20 years of age—and he set out for the new land, his belongings packed into a single trunk.

In the United States, Johnson made his way directly to the pine forests of northern Wisconsin and upper Michigan. There he worked as a lumberjack. And once again he found himself in the midst of a union-labor movement. He joined the woodworkers' branch of the Knights of Labor, which was the forerunner of the present American Federation of Labor. That was in 1891.

AIDED POPULIST MOVEMENT

America at that time was seething with political ferment. The Populists, under the leadership of Minnesota's famous Ignatius Donnelly, Iowa's Gen. James Weaver, and Kansas' Mary Lease and Jerry Simpson, were preparing their historic test of strength with the forces of finance capital in the election of 1892.

Johnson became greatly interested in this movement. As a member of the organized-labor wing officially supporting the Populist crusade, he was directly involved in the exciting drive for popular government. Even though he lacked the privileges of a voter, he, however, participated actively in the campaign in favor of the Weaver-Donnelly forces. Although American politics might then have been strange to him, Magnus did grasp the underlying economic forces involved in the struggle, and he chose his side without hesitation. He chose the side of the people.

BECOMES A FARMER

The young lumberjack worked in the woods scarcely more than a year before he had saved the grubstake necessary to carry him to the next step. Having saved $400, he moved on west to Meeker County, Minn., where in 1893 he purchased 40 acres of woodland and pasture in Kingston Township. Here he made his lifetime home.

The first year Magnus had to cut the wood from his small place and haul it by sledge and wagon 14 miles to the county seat, Litchfield. That was during the black depression days of 1893–94, which made so desperate the condition of millions of American workers and farmers.

While the bankers of Wall Street ferociously struggled for control of the country's expanding enterprises, and the great trusts were in their first flush of organization, the common people were paying in hunger and suffering the costs of economic dislocations.

The wood which Johnson sold that winter brought little more than a dollar a cord. So, with characteristic energy, the young woodcutter organized a local strike protest which won for the farmers a desired raise in prices.

KNEW WORKER-FARMER PROBLEMS

Thus did the early life shape the public man to come. He began as a worker, at hard tasks, and learned what the worker thought and desired. He knew at first hand the valiant spirit of the union-labor movement. His knowledge was deep rooted. He himself had these desires and struggled for their realization.

Further, he was coming to know well the problems of the farmer. He was equipped fully to speak with authority and to champion the cause of the great army of people who toil in the cities and on the farm.

MAGNUS THE COMMONER

Magnus Johnson's early life made him impatient with artificial niceties of public life. Magnus, as he grew into manhood, was not a person of slick pretensions. On the contrary, he was rugged, hearty, a man of rough-hewn language, and salty good nature. He was a commoner and wanted everyone to know it. No one ever called him Mr. Johnson if he could help it. He was Magnus both to his friends and to the entire world.

He gloried in being of the common people, of having had to fight stubbornly for the chances to step out of the harness of daily labor in order to improve his intelligence and take the offered places of leadership.

What he learned he learned at night by the kerosene lamp, taking in slowly the words of a foreign language and forming his opinions from them. He was never afraid of books—but life in the lumber camps and behind the plows leaves little time for them.

Nevertheless, he read and he studied. If he was no polished scholar, he did know instinctively what was progressive and what was reactionary, what was right and what was wrong. That is the true test of knowledge, after all. It is the acid test of clear thinking. And always there was a deep well of common sense—the common sense of the people—which served to nourish his mind. That, and his Viking courage and abundant energy, were the qualities he brought with him into manhood.

BECOMES LOCAL LEADER

Because of these early qualities and training, Magnus was looked upon as a leader in many things. It was not long, for example, before he was elected justice of the peace in his locality; next he became clerk of his school district. At one time he held no less than 12 such positions in his community.

Born with the quality of leadership, it was natural that he become a leader in the new cooperative movement at that time sweeping over the Corn Belt.

Magnus had gone through the Populist uprising and had seen its substance stolen and distorted by the large conservative parties. Progressive farmers became discouraged. "No more politics," they said. Of what avail? To them the farmer's cause seemed hopeless. And it was then that the cooperative movement came forward to take the place of politics in the farmer's struggle for better conditions. It was a natural development.

GROWTH OF COOPERATIVES

By 1900 there had already been organized in Minnesota more than 600 cooperative creameries and cheese factories. Mutual telephones also were becoming common. Insurance mutuals were springing up in increasing number.

Marketing cooperatives dealing in poultry, wool, eggs, and livestock could be found here and there, and in some respects most important of all the consumer's cooperative movement now took great strides forward with the need of farmers and workers to reduce their costs of living. These continued to rise higher and higher with the pressure of the great trusts and monopolies ushered in by the McKinley-Roosevelt-Taft Republicans.

By 1910 two-thirds of the State's creameries had become cooperatives. Magnus Johnson was named president of his local creamery. In 1919, 45 percent of the State's farm families could report sales or purchases through their own cooperatives. Minnesota was the great banner State of the Union in this progressive economic development.

MAGNUS IN FRONT RANKS

And in this tremendous forward movement of cooperation place must be made in the honor rank for Magnus Johnson. It was Magnus and his neighbors around the town of Litchfield who developed one of the most successful types of cooperatives of the period—the livestock shipping association.

This type of cooperative accounted for a large share of the cooperative business reported in the years 1913–19.

Litchfield's was the first livestock-shipping cooperative in the State. The Johnson group of farmers, already owners of a creamery and an elevator, organized it in 1908. Within 5 years there were at least 115 of these groups in Minnesota, handling 12 percent of all the animals then being sent to the packers; and by 1920 these shipping associations handled $300,000,000 worth of animals yearly.

SOCIETY OF EQUITY

The great new cooperative movement also had an education group, the now largely forgotten Society of Equity. This group had a strong nucleus in Minnesota; its grain-department offices were in Minneapolis.

The late George Loftus, of St. Paul, Progressive and farm leader, was engaged as manager of the Equity Cooperative Grain Exchange, the society's commission brokerage. This group came into rapid prominence in the years before the advent of the Nonpartisan League.

And again we find Magnus Johnson in the leadership, but now as a State-wide figure. He became the first president of the Minnesota Union, American Society of Equity. Likewise he was elected vice president of the Equity Exchange. The latter position he held until the merger of the exchange 10 years later, in 1923, with other groups that eventually helped build the famous Farmers Union cooperative group.

THE NON-PARTISAN LEAGUE

The Non-Partisan League afforded an outlet for Magnus Johnson's urge to accomplish something for the worker and the farmer through political action, in which he always believed. With its coming to Minnesota in 1916, he leaped into the work of organization with his customary drive and did much to build the league in his section and throughout the State.

This set the stage for Magnus to move into political life, in which he won for himself an envious position in the Northwest's and the Nation's progressive political history. He was to become one of the founders of a political movement, the Farmer-Labor Party, which already has done great things and still has places to go in these United States.

ENTERS THE POLITICAL SCENE

In the days before the last World War the cooperative movement had to fight bitterly for every inch of ground gained. Friends of the movement were needed in high places. So Magnus was urged by his neighbors to make the race for the lower house of the State legislature. He did, in 1914, and was elected; in 1916 he was reelected.

In 1918 the Non-Partisan League farmers and the organized city workers entered the political struggle independent of the two old political parties. They realized, rightly, that if social and economic emancipation were ever to be achieved through political action, it must come through a movement of their own, a movement really representative of the common people and of their aspirations. Political parties that get their campaign chests from Wall Street can hardly be depended upon to wage the battle for those who earn their livelihood by honest toil.

LABOR AND FARMER UNITE

In the primary election, the League-endorsed candidates were defeated, but by a margin so breath-taking that it brought terror into the hearts of their enemies. The workers and farmers realized their potential strength. Immediately after the primaries the labor unions, in conjunction with their political comrades on the farm, held their historic political convention to map out a program for the future. That was on August 25, and 125 unions sent representatives. That State committee of the Non-Partisan League named a committee to meet with the union representatives to map strategy for the fall campaign.

History will record the fact that out of the parleys of the farm and city worker representatives was formed a political party destined to play a vital role in the destiny of our State and of our Nation. That was the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota. A slate of candidates was selected for the coming campaign and they were designated on the ballot as "Farmer-Labor," the ticket headed by that wonderful liberal, Dave Evans.

JOHNSON, ONE OF FOUNDERS

Magnus Johnson, representing the Non-Partisan League, was one of that committee of ten that launched the Farmer-Labor Party. He was one of those who saw clearly the need for such a party. He was one of its real founders. The others on that committee, some now dead, some still carrying forward the banner, were: A. C. Welch, David Evans, Tom Davis, Ray C. Smelker, Fred Pike, Fred Tillquist, William Mahoney, Thomas Fraser, and Julius Reiter.

And thus, in its very first campaign under the name "Farmer-Labor," this political movement of the workers and the farmers, who also invited the independent merchants, the professional groups, and all those who believed in social and economic justice to join them in a great crusade for economic justice, moved into the position of the chief threat to the domination of the Republican Party of this State.

ELECTED TO STATE SENATE

In that election Magnus Johnson, who was urged by some to make the race for Governor, was sent by the adherents of the new party to the State senate, where he served with untiring energy for 4 years.

These years as State legislator, first in the house and then in the senate, fulfilled the hopes of his supporters. He was one of the hard-working members of the legislature, constantly raising his voice for a square deal, as he frequently called it, for the working and the farm population. To Magnus Johnson a square deal was another word for justice. Naturally, he was a leader of the farmers' bloc. This first fight was for laws legalizing cooperatives—something that the conservative State administrations of those days refused to grant. He also demanded more taxation of the well-protected Steel Trust. He fought and voted for woman suffrage and for those cherished reforms of the earlier Progressives—the initiative, referendum, and recall. He called for closer control by the State of public utilities. He favored county option of the dry question when the problem was a real one in Minnesota, due to the unsavory alliance between the wealthy liquor interests and the old political parties.

VOTING RECORD 100 PERCENT

Above all, knowing that the farmer paid twice and thrice as much taxes in relation to his income as the rest of the State, he demanded tax reforms based upon the ability to pay.

Johnson's fight in the State legislature for the common people of the State gave him a commanding position of leadership. His 8 years' voting record was pronounced as 100 percent progressive by the late Carl J. Buell, legislative expert. Few were placed in that distinguished honor role by Mr. Buell. The labor unions likewise proclaimed this dirt farmer's labor legislation record flawless.

FAMILY AIDED HIM

It must not be overlooked that during those busy years Magnus had the sympathy and support of his family, without which the farm home, now grown to include 200 well-developed acres, could not have been maintained. The lady he married in 1897, Harriet Dorman, and the three sons and the three daughters who had blessed that union helped make his public career possible by their assistance on the home front.

With his legislative background and personal popularity over the State, it was only natural that the workers and the farmers should consider Magnus for nomination for Governor in 1922. The league farmers endorsed him, the workers, on a basis of complete agreement with the farmers, also gladly accepted him.

RACE FOR GOVERNORSHIP

Magnus made the race for the governorship against a Harding Republican, in the midst of the frenzy of Harding's so-called good times. But the workers and the farmers felt little of the good times they talked about and were determined to elect their man. To have done so, however, would have been regarded as almost tantamount to performing a political miracle. As it was, the result of the election was almost a miracle. Magnus came within 14,000 votes of defeating his Republican opponent. In the same election the Farmer-Labor Party sent to Washington its first United States Senator. The Progressive movement in Minnesota, which Magnus Johnson helped to found, has very definitely gained national attention.

CAMPAIGN FOR UNITED STATES SENATOR

The following year the workers and farmers of Minnesota again girded themselves for battle, with Magnus Johnson leading the fight. The sudden death of United States Senator Knute Nelson on April 28, 1923, left a vacancy for that high office. Who else should the workers and farmers of Minnesota call forth to make that race than their true and tried warrior. And who else should the Republicans call out than the man who had defeated Magnus for the governorship by a small margin. Both put their best foot forward.

The campaign which followed will go down in Minnesota history as one of the most exciting and most astounding ever witnessed. Because Magnus was a genuine plow-handle farmer, a real representative of the common people, and because the Republican Party determined to win at all costs to maintain their fast-slipping hold on the State, the contest assumed intense national interest.

A huge fund was amassed for the Republican candidate. Here was a contest, they determined, they could not afford to lose; they could not permit a fire that would set the prairies aflame.

AID FROM PROGRESSIVES

But the Progressives of the Nation were not asleep. They lent a helping hand. Old "Fighting Bob" La Follette entered the State with an appeal to the voters. Said he, "We in the United States Senate need Magnus Johnson—his vigorous personality, his integrity, his courage, his voice, and his vote." It was a crucial time in Congress; every vote counted against the flood of special-privilege legislation loosed by the Republican majority.

Into the State also came other distinguished Progressives as volunteers—Senator Burton K. Wheeler, Senator Lynn Frazier, the Progressive Congressmen from Wisconsin, Beck, Voigt, and Schneider.

It was a forward-looking, progressive platform upon which Magnus Johnson campaigned for the senatorship. It included such planks as Government control of the Federal Reserve banking system; Government control of coal mines, water-power sites, and other natural resources; a graduated tax on incomes, inheritances, and excess profits; cash bonuses for ex-service men; restriction of courts in the use of injunctions in labor disputes and in nullifying acts of Congress; friendly relations with all nations and entangling alliances with none; stabilization of prices of farm products through Federal legislation and legislation making constitutional the rights of free speech, free press, and peaceful assembly effective.

I submit that this program is still a fine program today, and its achievement would mark a new era of progressive advancement. Relatively little of that program has since been realized.

The president of the State federation of labor, the late Edward G. Hall, willingly took the stump for his farmer friend.

CAMPAIGN A CRUSADE

The tone of the campaign became that of a crusade. Over the rural areas spread a network of county boosters—farmers or their wives who sent word down the party telephones whenever a Magnus rally was to be held. The railroad workers, always the stanchest of progressives, contributed needed funds. Their paper, Labor, covered the State in a special edition.

And, on the other side, the campaign was most furious. The Republican candidate had seemingly unlimited funds to spend for sound trucks, billboards, brass bands, and newspaper space. In desperation one of his backers broadcast the slogan, "Send Magnus back to the pasture." That remark was most unfortunate for the Republican candidate.

MAGNUS—UNITED STATES SENATOR

The results of that memorable election brought gladness to the heart of every liberal and Progressive not only in Minnesota but in every other State of the Union. It likewise brought gloom to the camps of the reactionaries—a deep impenetrable gloom.

Magnus was elected United States Senator by an overwhelming vote of the people. His majority over his principal opponent was 95,000 in a total of about 500,000 votes. He became Minnesota's second Farmer-Labor Senator. In his own township he received 334 of the 339 votes cast, a tribute such as few men in America ever receive at the hands of their neighbors, at the hands of those people who know him best.

PRESS COMMENTS

The Minneapolis Star, at that time owned by the workers and farmers of the Northwest, hailed the election as "a shot that will be heard around the world." The late Samuel Gompers, leader of the American workers, joyfully greeted the election as "a sign in the sky." Commented the Freeman, a national liberal publication of those days, "the Republican-Democratic debacle in Minnesota is a symbol and a sign that the farmer is exceedingly low in his mind about the old parties and their respective styles of trumpery and gimcrackery. The farmer has been scalped so often by old-line Republican and Democratic politicians that he is at last becoming wary of both breeds.

The Progressive magazine, the New Republic, while laying the result of the election largely to economic conditions that ruined the farmers, pointed out that it also was the "reward of the last 6 or 8 years of organization and education by the Non-Partisan League and the more recent efforts to effect an alliance with labor, to the success of which there is good testimony in the fact that in Minneapolis the vote was practically a tie."

One of the large, conservative Minneapolis dailies attempted to explain away the election by saying that it was a temporary political phase, "an act of protest inspired primarily by dissatisfaction with economic conditions." My answer to that is that it not only was inspired by dissatisfaction with economic conditions but, even more significantly, by a feeling on the part of the masses that they could not look to the old political parties to correct existing economic injustices.

One of the other conservative Twin City dailies accepted the Republican defeat even less gracefully, but nevertheless grudgingly paid the new Senator a tribute by saying that he was "not a 'rubber stamp' type of radical."

The tone of the press throughout the country ran all the way from downright abuse and indignation in the conserative publications to the prediction of liberal writers that it meant the dawning of a new age.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE

In Washington they didn't know how to receive the man who had the reputation of wearing no collar and who, when out campaigning, did not hesitate to remove his own collar if comfort demanded it. They didn't know how to receive a Senator who had never worn a "swallowtail" and who told them in advance that he never intended to wear one.

They didn't know how to receive a real dirt farmer who came to the Halls of Congress to serve the farmers of the country, and the honest toilers everywhere, rather than the bankers of Wall Street and the coupon clippers of the Nation.

Many of the newspapermen in Washington, representing conservative papers, attempted to make capital out of the fact that Magnus, because he had to shift for himself very early in life, had not acquired a college education. They thought that they would find an unlettered man. But they were surprised, when they came to know him, for he had acquired knowledge on many subjects through reading, through study, and through application. They found him to be a man who sought out all available information on all questions, and who arrived independently at conclusions based upon these facts.

COMMANDED HIS FACTS

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is replete with references when Magnus Johnson arose in the Senate to call some learned Senator to task for presenting erroneous facts to substantiate his assertions. During one of these debates—and I may say by way of observation that nobody ever got the best of Magnus in a debate—he remarked, "I am neither a scholar nor a lawyer, but I thank God I have some common sense."

On another occasion he remarked, "I saw in the papers a couple of days ago that the Senator from New York made a speech in Washington informing us that 90 percent of the Senators are lawyers. Why is it, then, that these able lawyers, lawmakers, have not provided in the laws which they have for years and years been putting on the statute books some means of giving a leeway to certain officials of this Government to use common horse sense?"

Magnus took his seat in the United States Senate in December 1923. His easy good nature and his rugged manners won for him the admiration of everybody in Washington who appreciated genuineness and not sham. Here he at once lined himself up with that sterling group of Progressives led by the elder La Follette and Senator GEORGE NORRIS, whose voice is still being raised in the battle for human justice.

PLEADS FOR FARMER

"I have been here for nearly 3 months," he said in his first long speech in the Senate, "and I have been thinking about that member of the American family who is sick, namely, the American farmer. In a family the sick one should be taken care of first. I know what the common people want, and I want to say so that every Senator may hear it that there is today among the people of this country a great suspicion of government."

In joining discussion on the agricultural-diversification bill and further extension of credit to the farmers, Johnson reminded the elite Senators that what the farmer really needed was not further credit in order to solve his problems, but rather stabilization of prices of farm products.

On another occasion, he told a Senator from North Carolina that "if we had the opportunity to set the price [of agricultural products] as the owners of spinneries in the Senator's section of the United States have had for years, we would have been in a position to pay a living wage to the people who work for us. The reason we [the farmers] are hard up today is that we have not had the opportunity to set the price."

FAVORED TAX PUBLICITY

In speaking against the Mellon tax plan and in favor of publicity on personal-property taxes, he said: "Some of us do not need to pay any more because we lost everything we paid taxes on, but I want to say that the Steel Trust of this country, which was forced to pay three or four million dollars into the treasury of a State like Minnesota, will not help the people of the great United States if under the laws of this country it will have a right to take back the taxes paid from those who buy the things it produces. God knows we need more publicity and there is going to be more publicity if the progressive forces of this country have anything to say about it at this session of Congress."

SPIRIT OF CHARITY

If all people had the spirit of charity in their hearts that Magnus Johnson had, this world would be a much happier place for all in which to live. There wouldn't be so much rancor, bitterness, and prejudice. He was one of those who pleaded fervently to aid the war sufferers in Germany after the World War. "Professor Patterson," Magnus told the Senate, "testified that the total number of people in Germany that are in need of more or less relief is approximately 20,000,000, or one-third of the population. Let us not forget the words of Abraham Lincoln, 'with malice toward none and charity for all.' We should look upon this relief measure as a matter of humanity and civilization, having a direct bearing on peace and good will throughout the world."

Study of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD indicates the rugged championship of Magnus Johnson. When he spoke on agricultural conditions, diversified farming, farm mortgages and foreclosures, he spoke of something close to his heart and indelibly imprinted in his mind after his years in Minnesota. He never got so far from the farm that he could not speak vigorously in the behalf of his fellow farmers.

Nor was he bound to discuss only the problems of the farmer. He remembered the Chippewa Indians who needed justice to right the wrongs done them in the early days of America. He submitted a resolution for the furtherance of world peace and submitted a bill in behalf of the independence of the Philippine Islands. Freedom for them was for him the only consistent course for America.

Mr. Johnson's common sense made him wary of foreign junkets. He opposed spending $48,500 for United States participation in the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy. He raised this query: "Does the gentleman know that we have a group of people in this country today informing us farmers how to raise more, and that we also have another group who are telling us to raise less and even destroy the things that we have planted and tried to raise in this country?"

He never forgot the needs of his constituency—farmers and laborers. Any study of his record reveals his thoroughgoing liberalism untainted by any regard for red tape or bureaucracy. He was a fighter. He did not sleep on his job. He was wide awake at all times. He lived close to his people and proved a tried-and-true spokesman. Their best interest was always uppermost in his mind. He was not always dabbling in foreign wrangles and disputes. He was a dirt farmer and he remembered them in Washington. He fought for them and he died in the harness talking cooperatives, Farmer Labor, and the square deal for all men.

RETURN TO THE DISK AND HARROW

In 1924, Magnus Johnson was the Farmer-Labor candidate to succeed himself to the United States Senate. It was a Presidential year, and the independent Progressives of the country ran La Follette for President. Magnus waged an excellent campaign. He told the voters he stood firmly for Government ownership of railroads, mines, water power, and forests. While the national Progressive slate lost Minnesota by some 80,000 votes, Magnus Johnson came within 8,000 votes of winning.

Defeated, Magnus returned quietly to the disk and harrow. The interlude, however, was brief.

CAMPAIGN FOR GOVERNOR—1926

In 1926, his party again made him its nominee for Governor, as it had done 4 years before. His continued popularity was evident in the result. The contest was conducted in the height of the Coolidge stock-market prosperity—a prosperity which eventually brought the Nation to ruin. Nevertheless, Johnson's vote of 266,000 in a light election revealed that the ranks of the Minnesota Progressives were holding. It also cast a warning shadow over the glittering results of the wild stock-market boom.

HEADS FARMER-LABOR ASSOCIATION

That year also saw the reorganization of the liberal forces of Minnesota into the Farmer-Labor Association. Magnus became its first chairman. It was a well-deserved honor.

Another organization also claimed much of his attention and much of his time. That was the Farmers Union, with which the Equity Society and its cooperatives had lately been merged. Addressing groups of his own kind, explaining in his own inimitable manner, salting with hearty stories his lessons of cooperation, politics, reform—this was work that Magnus liked.

As one of the veteran liberal leaders who worked closely with Magnus has pointed out, he was a man of such abundant bounce and energy that it is likely he talked to more people than many public figures address in their lifetime.

His work with the organizers of the Farmers Union was as effective as the work he had done 15 years before in the building of the equity exchange.

In 1930 his old seat in the United States Senate was again to be contested. Many of his friends urged him to make the race, certain that he could win. He decided against it, however, and the chance to return to that body passed forever.

WINS SEAT IN LOWER HOUSE

But 2 years later, with the congressional elections of the entire State thrown into an open contest, Magnus filed for a seat in the House. He led every other candidate for the 10 available seats. His total was 388,000 votes, the finest tribute from the voters that any man had ever received. His popularity had increased year by year.

In the first New Deal Congress he was considered a stalwart of the reform forces. He fought for the common people with the same force and the same fearless energy that he displayed in the Senate.

Politicians who talked glibly about solving the problems of the farmer, the laborer, and of social security but did nothing by their votes to do something constructive didn't fool Magnus. "It is disheartening, indeed," he told the House, "to be a participant of the actions of the present Congress when Members will rise and take the floor denouncing some of the parts of these farm bills and pleading the cause of the farmer and the desire to once again see the farmer get better prices for his products, and then watch these same Members when the roll is called and have them vote against the farmer's interest."

COST OF PRODUCTION

A remark quite typical of Johnson was when he arose in debate on the question of adjournment and said, "If you attorneys and other professional and business men will see that we farmers get the cost of production plus a little profit, you can go home with the satisfaction that the farmers are going to produce enough so that the people of this country will live."

His views on social security were expressed when he told Congress, "Government owes all its citizens, who are willing and able, the right to work, and in fulfilling this obligation to its people it must also promote the public good and public welfare. To this end it must, and I am sure that it will, establish in carrying out the public welfare, a broad and adequate system of old-age pensions."

Johnson's love of liberty was neither narrow nor restricted. He wanted it extended to everybody. It was an ideal. Pleading for granting freedom to the Philippine Islands he declared, "Ever since the United States signed the treaty with Spain and took over the Philippine Islands it has pledged these people their freedom, and President after President has repeatedly made the statement that, when the Philippine Islands were ready, they would be granted their independence. The Filipinos have been ready for this for many years, and yet the past administrations have failed to grant them their freedom that they are so deserving of."

ENTERS STATE SERVICE

Johnson's Congressional career ended in March 1935. But he was not to relax on the farm very long. A new post in the State service, during the second administration of the late Governor Olson, opened with the creation of the department of livestock, weighing, and inspection. Magnus became supervisor—a job he held until his death. A primary campaign for Governor in 1936 was his last political effort.

Magnus was now past 60 years of age. His life had been full; his public service long, faithful, and fruitful. A weaker man might have been tired. Johnson's family in vain urged him to rest. But early and late he attended to his job.

A LEADER PASSES

In the spring of the year he had suffered both an automobile accident and a siege of pneumonia. Afterward his health was not of the best. Suddenly—on the day following the death of his great friend, Floyd Olson—Magnus came down with a chest cold which quickly developed into pneumonia. Both lungs were soon badly affected. For several weeks he fought off the attack, hovering between life and death. He got better. His friends, who had made the Litchfield hospital their headquarters, began to breathe easier. But the change for the better was brief. On September 14, 1936, he died. In 5 days he would have been 65 years old.

THE FARMER-LABOR CAUSE

I mentioned that Magnus Johnson was one of the founders of the Farmer-Labor Party. When we dedicate this monument to his memory we at the same time dedicate the monument to the cause he represented. The two—the man and his cause—go together; they cannot be separated. Has the Farmer-Labor cause justified its existence? What of its future? Will it continue, performing the tasks that Magnus Johnson and its founders set for it? Will it go forward to reach its goal, adding luster to the memory of those men of vision and idealism who gave their lives to the cause?

The Farmer-Labor Party campaigned for social security long before the New Deal was ever heard of. The party demanded adequate pensions for the aged, not as a matter of charity but as a matter of right; opportunity for our youth; cost of production for the farmer and placing agriculture on a parity with industry; the right of labor to organize and to bargain collectively; unemployment-insurance compensation, a proper return to all who labor of the wealth that they create; release of the public from the tightening shackles of monopoly; Government ownership of power; management and control of our natural resources in the interest of all the people, to whom they rightfully belong, rather than in the interest of a privileged few; care of the unfortunates; social security for all; government of, for, and by the people in actuality as well as in name.

PARTY ACCOMPLISHMENTS

In conformity with its principles and its ideals, the Farmer-Labor Party, during its short period of control of the executive branch of the State government, without at any time having the aid of a sympathetic State legislature, accomplished, among other things, such outstanding reforms as tax revision based on ability to pay, which included passage of a graduated income tax; the homestead tax preferential law; the homestead exemption law and increased taxes upon wealth; passage of the mortgage-moratorium law, which saved thousands of city homes and farms to their rightful owners; State-wide old-age pension; pensions for the blind, crippled children, and care of other unfortunates; a youth program upon which the National Youth Administration was patterned; a State public-works program to relieve unemployment; adequate relief appropriations; seed and feed loans for the farmers through the Federal Government; higher educational standards and equalization of educational opportunities through State aid to schools, particularly schools in rural districts and in poor sections where local taxes were not sufficient to maintain decent educational standards; an anti-injunction law in labor disputes; prison reform; human treatment of the State's wards; outlawry of detective agencies that had maintained spy systems in labor unions; use of the National Guard for the first time in this country to protect the civil rights of the workers and the public rather than as a strike-breaking agency during strikes; and innumerable other far-reaching and enlightening reforms.

SAME OBJECTIVES TODAY

The objective of the Farmer-Labor Party today is the same as it was when Magnus Johnson and that militant group of champions for human rights gathered and laid the cornerstone of the people's political movement.

The late Floyd B. Olson defined this objective in its broad terms when he said that it was to make government serve "in the interest of the common happiness of the people."

Is there need for such government today? I say that there is just as much need for it now as there was when Magnus Johnson raised his powerful voice for a square deal for all who labor. Let us look into the present plight of agriculture.

CONDITION OF AGRICULTURE

In 1910 the debt of owner-operated farms in the United States, according to United States census figures, was $1,700,000,000. By 1920 it had risen to the staggering total of $4,000,000,000. The 1935 figure is $3,700,000,000, which is the latest figure available, but estimates now place it at approximately $3,500,000,000.

This farm debt, you can thus see, has been reduced but very little in recent years. But the true picture is worse than even appears on the surface. Fact is that whatever slight reduction there has been in the Nation's owner-operated farm debt was brought about through mortgage foreclosure and not by reduction of principal through farm income. The heavy debt load of the farmer lies as heavily upon him today as it did in 1930. Delinquency on farm loans by the Federal Government today is 26 percent. This means that any time that the Federal Government decides on a rigid policy of debt collection, one-fourth of these farmers would lose their farms.

But let us pursue that picture a little further. It is not a pleasant one, to be sure, but sometimes we have to face unpleasant facts if we are to do something about relieving the unpleasant situations.

FARM REFUGEES

The refugees of farming are on the march. Every year thousands of farmers flee the land to the city, to the West, to other States—if possible, other jobs. The Bureau of Agricultural Economics estimates that 1,315,000 persons in recent years have migrated from the land to other parts.

But what is happening to those who stay on the farms? Government statistics show that big farms—corporate farms—are getting bigger and bigger, small farms, smaller and smaller. Of the increase in the number of farms from 1930 to 1935, only 1½ percent were large-scale farms, but it is significant that nearly one-half of the increased acreage of all farms in the country was on large-scale farms.

And the number of tenant farmers within recent years has been increasing by approximately 40,000 yearly. Government estimates for the number of farm tenants in 1939 was considerably in excess of 3,000,000. Almost one-half of the farmers of the United States today do not own their own farms. That certainly means that agriculture in this country is in a perilous condition.

The same thing holds true for other important classes of our population. It is not necessary to go into detail. The picture is quite clear. Unemployment, despite Government efforts to bring relief, is variously estimated at from ten to twelve million. Our young people, devoting themselves to years of study to prepare themselves for life, leave college only to find the door of opportunity closed to them.

Of the total number of unemployed, more than 30 percent are youths. They are tramping our city pavements walking about aimlessly looking for something to do, losing their morale, their grip on life. There is need for serious ponder. When we destroy the spirit of our youth we destroy the future of our Nation. It is upon our young men and our young women that the future of America depends. We can still say that one-third of the Nation is ill-housed, ill-clothed, ill-fed.

And in this state of affairs we have resorted to an economy of scarcity instead of an economy of abundance. What a travesty for a country that can produce enough wealth to provide every conceivable need and comfort for every man, woman, and child in the land.

TASK STILL LIES AHEAD

The need of a Farmer-Labor Party today is as great as it ever was. The big task lies ahead, the big job is yet to be done. Magnus Johnson and his fellow workers gave us the start. Theirs was the work of pioneering, the hardest work. Our's is the work of completing the job. That we must do, or we will prove faithless to our trust; we will have proved unworthy of carrying on in their name and under their banner.

This is not merely a State job. Whatever good can come to the people through a progressive State government; whatever benefits can be derived, social reform and economic emancipation can come only through a national movement. Magnus Johnson realized this. On February 14, 1924, he arose in the United States Senate and told the country that eventually there would be a national Farmer-Labor Party, to which the common people of America could turn.

The common people of America need a national political party of their own as much as the common people of Minnesota need a State political party of their own. They have nothing to gain from political movements directed from the offices of big business.

Today we dedicate this monument in the memory of our beloved Magnus Johnson. Let us also resolve to perpetuate his memory in another way—a way that he would want us to if he could speak to us now—by dedicating ourselves to the task of making the Farmer-Labor movement a vital, living force in this State and Nation.

"The heights by great men scaled and kept
Were not obtained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night."

CHRONOLOGY OF MAGNUS JOHNSON

September 19, 1871: Born in Varmland Province, Sweden.
1883: Left school after the death of his father and went to work as glass blower and bottlemaker in the factory of Liljedahl, Sweden.
1891: Came to America and started working as a lumberjack in northern Wisconsin and Michigan.
1893: Moved to Meeker County, Minn., and purchased 40 acres in Kingston Township, 14 miles from Litchfield.
1897: Married Harriet Dorman; to them were born three sons and three daughters.
1899: Became naturalized citizen of the United States.
1899: From this time on he was very active in his community and the State. He served as justice of the peace and clerk of the school district and in many other civic capacities.
1910: Headed his local cooperative creamery.
1914: Was elected to Minnesota House of Representatives.
1916: Reelected to Minnesota House.
1916: Worked energetically for the Nonpartisan League.
1918: Organized with other leaders the Farmer-Labor Party.
1918: Elected to Minnesota Senate, 1918–22.
1922: Ran for Governor on Farmer-Labor ticket and lost.
1923: Ran for United States Senate to fill unexpired term of Senator Knute Nelson and won.
1924: Ran to succeed himself and lost.
1926: Ran for Governor and lost.
1932: Entered open congressional race and led all the candidates by receiving a total of 388,000 votes.
1935: Appointed supervisor of department of livestock, weighing, and inspection.
1936: Lost in primary campaign for Governor.
September 13, 1936: Death at Litchfield, Minn.

Congress Recesses

OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I received a rather significant letter yesterday. A friend of mine in Minnesota wrote me to the effect that Europe was on fire and that, after all, Congress in this country was a part of the fire department. Headlines in today's papers indicate additional world-war developments in Europe. I make this comment in connection with the fact that a recess of Congress is planned which will continue for some time to come. In my opinion, this is a mistake. I say this in spite of the fact that it will be my purpose to return to my district if this recess plan becomes effective. Naturally, we want to find out what is going on at home, but it seems to me that the national-defense program is too important to justify these time-out periods when Congress apparently is doing nothing. We have in this country a system of government which is a little different from that in any other country. We have the executive, the judicial, and the legislative, and it seems to me that the legislative branch of the Government should be in session, ready to do its part in connection with any world-wide developments and in connection with the grave domestic problems which confront our Government in the United States.

Highways in War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HAYDEN
OF ARIZONA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ARTICLE BY THOMAS P. HENRY, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN AUTOMOBILE ASSOCIATION

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, in the Military Engineer for March-April 1940, there appears an article by Thomas P. Henry, president of the Automobile Association, entitled "United States Highways in Peace and War." I ask unanimous consent that that portion of the article under the heading Highways in War be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Military Engineer of March-April, 1940]

HIGHWAYS IN WAR

America has been at war only once since the beginning of the motor era. When it was called on for the first time to do its share for the Nation in time of war, America's highway system failed dismally. The winter of 1917–18 was unusually severe and the subsoil under the black-top roads of the period loosened; freight traffic, unable to move by railroad, took to the highways, and heavy Army trucks added their share to the work of destruction. It was more than the roads, built for light vehicles and a small flow of traffic, could stand. In many sections of the country, the highways broke down completely, and both military and civil operations were dangerously impaired. The roads in the first place were poorly located for military purposes, but even those that could be utilized failed when the unexpected burden was placed upon them.

Said a highway engineer of the period, explaining the breakdown of the roads in his State: "From horse-drawn vehicles with a concentrated load of 3 or 4 tons at most traveling at the rate of 4 miles per hour, there has sprung almost overnight the heavy motortruck with its concentrated load of from 8 to 12 tons, thundering along at a speed of 20 miles per hour."

To us, who are becoming accustomed to loads ranging up as high as 100,000 pounds moving at 60 miles per hour or more, the tribulations of this engineer 12 years ago seem almost quaint. But it was a real enough problem in those days, and there is no question that the breakdown in highway transportation reduced our speed if not our efficiency as a warring Nation.

The highway failure of the World War was just one part of our general unpreparedness. There had been little or no effort to devise a highway system that would be useful in wartime and correspondingly little effort to adjust the Army's transportation equipment to the highway facilities of the period. From the failures due to highway unpreparedness we have learned valuable lessons.

Every citizen should feel infinitely more safe and infinitely more secure because of the fact that our highway system, although it possibly may not measure up in every respect to the demands placed upon it, will never again fail to perform its proper function in a time of national emergency. At the present time, the American highway system is geared within at least a reasonable degree of the needs of national defense.

There would be little more than historical interest in a study of the reasons why so little attention was paid to our highway needs before we became involved in the World War. It has long been axiomatic that in order to achieve victory, men and material must go through on schedule to their proper destinations. Caesar's succeses based on the excellent system of Roman roads, the difficulties of defending our Western frontiers because of the lack of roads, the axiom that engineers build the roads over which the armies march to glory—all these, to name but a few, were there for everyone to see and consider. But it was not until our highway system had demonstrated its inadequacy in time of war, and a war far removed from our shores, that effort was made to bring our highway system in line with the needs of military operations.

The fact that our present highway system will meet, to a large extent, practically every military demand that can be made upon it is due to a very fortunate circumstance. When civil and military experts gathered about the conference table after the conflict was over and considered the highway needs of the Nation in times of war and in times of peace they found that the two needs were almost identical.

Although it has been widely publicized recently. I should like to highlight briefly the terms of the agreement reached by representatives of the War Department, and the Bureau of Public Roads (now the Public Roads Administration) at that time. They agreed, first, that highways constructed for commerce and national development are, in general, the same as those required for military operations; second, that the War Department in ordinary circumstances would refrain from recommending specific highway routes except in the most critical strategic areas; third, that general networks connecting important depots, mobilization centers, and industrial centers are more important than transcontinental roads; and, fourth, that while civil authorities would have principal say in highway matters during times of peace, they would give due consideration to the National-defense needs of the Nation.

When it was seen that the military and civil highway needs of the Nation were almost identical, it was easy enough to work out a program of highway development suitable for both war and peace.

There were other fortunate circumstances. Shortly after the war the gasoline tax was invented. On its twenty-first anniversary in February of this year, this tax had collected some $8,000,000,000, the major portion of which had been spent on road development. As was foreseen, many of the roads built by this golden flood followed along the major routes most needed for military operations as indicated by the so-called Pershing map of military priority roads.

The military priority roads, as indicated by the latest revision of this map are sometimes thought of by the public as military roads. Of course, they are not. They are primarily national-development roads, following the routes of peacetime traffic needs. But the roads built for peacetime needs fit the Pershing map as the hand fits the glove.

Moreover, the standards desired by the War Department for the military priority roads are well within the standards demanded by modern private and commercial traffic. All the War Department asks of its priority roads is that they have a hard surface capable of sustaining a 9,000-pound wheel load; be at least 20 feet wide; have a grade of not more than 5 percent for distances greater than 500 feet; have a curvature of 6 degrees or less, a vertical clearance of 14 feet and a sight distance of 1,000 feet. Less rigorous standards are established for mountainous territory. And of bridges, all that is asked in the priority requirements is that they be capable of sustaining an H–15 loading and be at least 4 feet wider than the approach road. In many respects, these standards are far short of those established by highway engineers and planners in meeting the needs of today's motor vehicles and making preparation for tomorrow's traffic movements.

The recent difficulties encountered by Admiral Byrd's ponderous snow cruiser in moving along the highways might naturally raise the question whether or not heavy ordnance might experience the same difficulties. The answer is that, while highways are being built up to the agreed-upon standards, equipment that will use the highways are being designed to fit within those standards. Through this two-way planning—building highways up to wartime needs and keeping military machines within the range of highway facilities—we now have a road plan that will be in large degree capable of measuring up to any demands that may be placed on it.

But while stating that the road system will never again fail in time of need, it would be idle and untrue to intimate that the system is adequate to meet every requirement in times of either war or peace.

The principal peacetime needs can be briefly summarized: We need a system of nationally planned interregional highways; for the most part these should be of the highest-type construction, with limited access and with opposing traffic streams divided. Intersecting streams of highway or other traffic should go under or over the main route. Such highways are particularly needed into and through urban areas, where such a large proportion of traffic now moves and where congestion is most prevalent.

From the military standpoint, the principal highway deficiencies are in grade and alinement and in the inadequacy of bridges. It is widely recognized that bridges are the weakest link in our highway system, with authoritative estimates placing the number of substandard bridges on main highway systems in the neighborhood of 20,000. To widen or rebuild these "horse-and-buggy" bridges will cost about $400,000,000—a large enough figure, but one that can be amply justified by the removal of danger from those that must now use these unsafe facilities, to say nothing of the military requirements.

In urban districts main highway routes already are highly congested. During time of war congestion on these routes would be tremendously increased, particularly in the industrial mobilization centers. Access roads leading to military posts and garrisons are at present inadequate, but these special roads constitute only 2,000 miles of the 80,000-mile military priority system.

Despite these shortcomings, the highway plant appears on the whole to be in good shape to meet any military emergency. Fortunately for the security of us all, the more the highway system is built up to meet normal peacetime needs, the more nearly it will comply with military recommendations. And in planning for possibility of war, surely no General Staff ever had at its disposal a greater highway system than is offered in the United States. There are 1,000,000 miles of surfaced highways spanning the Nation in every direction. In addition there are some 2,000,000 miles of unsurfaced highways that could be utilized in maneuvers if conflict were ever brought to our shores. In the event of need for evacuation, the high degree of automobile ownership—about one car to every five persons—would help greatly to solve such a problem.

With increasing mechanization of armies, roads are assuming increasing importance in the military scheme of things. Railroads, of course, will continue to be a prime mover of men and supplies over long distances. But highways were important back in the days when horses were the swiftest transportation and a division could be moved only 20 miles a day. Today, when staff cars can travel at 70 miles per hour or more, and when divisions equipped with over a thousand vehicles can go more than 300 miles in a day, highways of necessity will play an increasingly important role.

With the major part of the globe now in the grip of conflict, threatening to draw in those neutrals still enjoying a more or less precarious peace, a stronger sense of security is brought by the knowledge that an immense system of roadways is backing up the program for national defense. These roads, built so laboriously and at such tremendous expenditure, will not again falter in an hour of need.

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

LETTER FROM DR. ALEXANDER GUERRY

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a letter from Dr. Alexander Guerry, vice chancelor of the University of the South, at Sewanee, Tenn. Dr. Guerry is one of the South's foremost citizens, and has given a great deal of study to our national defense. His suggestion merits close scrutiny.

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH,
Sewanee, Tenn., July 1, 1940.

The Honorable ESTES KEFAUVER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KEFAUVER: The United States should have a larger and better Army, Navy, and air force. That is our immediate need in order that we may meet the crisis of the world situation, the threat of war, and the danger of economic, political, and physical aggression of the totalitarian states against us.

We should provide for an expanded Army, Navy, and air force, modern equipment in ample quantity and of the best quality—rifles, machine guns, antiaircraft and antitank guns, artillery, and tanks for the Army, and munitions and supplies of every sort for our military forces.

We should provide for this expanded Army, Navy, and air force a personnel sufficient in numbers and exceedingly well-trained soldiers, sailors, pilots, officers, and noncommissioned officers, mechanics, and men qualified for every post and every duty.

If men do not volunteer in sufficient numbers for an Army, Navy, and air force of the size deemed necessary for the present crisis, Congress should pass a selective draft law which will make it possible for the Nation to secure the men desired and needed. Such a law would carry, of course, reasonable exemptions for married men, men in particularly useful or necessary occupations, and boys in school and college.

Having taken the steps necessary for a stronger and more effective Army, Navy, and air force, Congress should make provisions for the expansion of the National Guard, the R. O. T. C. and the C. M. T. C. These three organizations present an excellent opportunity for an increase in the number of available soldiers and officers and for enlargement of the program of military preparedness.

There is a large number of men who would join the National Guard at this time to take military training and to be ready to respond to a call to the colors in the event of war. A number of schools and colleges desire to obtain R. O. T. C. units, and these should be able to secure an Army officer and the necessary equipment. The C. M. T. C. could train many thousands more boys and men than it trains now if the C. M. T. C. had more facilities, more funds, and doubled its training period. I have been civilian aide to the Secretary of War for Tennessee for 12 years, and my chief responsibility has been the enrollment of the C. M. T. C. and the support of the C. M. T. C. as an important part of a program of military preparedness. The C. M. T. C. can play an increasingly vital role.

Congress should not pass, in my opinion, a universal compulsory military training law. It would be a most stupendous undertaking for a Nation of 130,000,000 people to embark upon a program of compulsory training for all males between certain ages. To carry out effectively the steps which I have outlined in the preceding paragraphs and to launch a program of compulsory universal training at the same time would be a task impossible of accomplishment. To attempt both courses now would result in confusion and inefficiency.

What this Nation needs at this time is a modern, mechanized, perfectly equipped Army, Navy, and air force of sufficient size with a capable and trained personnel, and not millions of men taking a hastily provided program of military training, in many cases under very unsatisfactory conditions. As a matter of fact, there are not enough Regular officers and competent Reserve officers for a program of universal military training and a program of a stronger Army, Navy, and air force and an expanded National Guard, R. O. T. C., and C. M. T. C.

Furthermore, the strength of a Nation at war or facing the possibility of war lies not alone in its military forces but in the strength of its economic order, in industry, agriculture, commerce, and manufacturing. To enlarge and equip our Army, Navy, and air force, to expand the National Guard, R. O. T. C., and C. M. T. C., and then to call all other men of certain ages not in these units to universal training will dislocate industry and agriculture and cause confusion to an extent that will be harmful to the general strength and general preparedness of the Nation.

With best wishes, I am

Cordially yours,

ALEXANDER GUERRY,
Vice Chancellor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES I. FADDIS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1940

REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS ON COAST DEFENSES

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF A SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON COAST DEFENSES

Like every other component of our system of national defense, our coast defenses, if they are to be effective, must keep step with the progress in armament. It should be quite obvious to anyone that guns suitable to cope with battleships at the time of the Spanish-American War, would be inadequate when matched against the guns of a modern dreadnought. It should be equally obvious that the advent of the airplane in warfare would make many changes and additions necessary in order to bring our coast defenses up to date. Coast defenses are strictly protective installations. They must stay on our shores and cannot be used offensively. Their mission is to protect the vital sea coast centers and thus leave the Navy free to be used on other missions.

The coast defenses of the Atlantic Northeast are in a deplorably weak condition. They protect, insofar as they are effective, the area of this Nation nearest Europe on the Great Circle course of both ships and planes. This area is most vital to our national security, in that in it are situated great manufacturing centers, especially valuable to the munitions industry, as well as the harbors and installations vital to the maintenance and operation of our fleet. If we are to prepare to protect this Nation on land, on sea, or in the air, the factories, transportation facilities and skilled workmen of the Northeast must be permitted to perform their tasks without interruptions. The loss of this vital area to an invader would be an irreparable blow to this Nation in time of war. Here, also, is the strategic point for an entering wedge to separate this Nation and Canada.

There is no O. A. H. U. offshore to hang as a threat on the flank or the rear of an invading force. Even if bases were strongly fortified and securely held in Nova Scotia and Bermuda, the harbors of the Northeast must be denied to any enemy seeking to land mechanized forces on destructive raids or full-scale invasions.

Full protection calls for long-range gun batteries to protect the harbors from penetrations by hostile surface ships, to secure the docking and servicing facilities for our own fleet and to deny these services to the enemy. These defenses must be sufficient to protect the entrance or debauchment of the fleet to and from its anchorage bases. This is the mission of the Army, since at these times the fleet cannot protect itself. These gun batteries must be supplemented by bombing planes, motor torpedo boats, and mine fields, both controlled and contact.

The harbor facilities, defensive works and naval service installations, must be protected against attack from the air by our own planes and by antiaircraft batteries. Airfields must be available in the near vicinity to service and facilitate the operation of our own planes.

Mobile land forces must be on hand to prevent any landing, between coast fortifications, for the purpose of attacks on the flank or rear. High-speed modern mechanized divisions, reinforced by aircraft and by heavy mobile road and railroad artillery are best adapted to this mission. Their operations can, of course, be expedited by a system of well-constructed roadways.

Our coast defenses were located and constructed before the airplane became a weapon in warfare. They are especially prominent from the air, to planes on mission of observation or reconnaissance, either visual or photographic. Because they were located and constructed to withstand fire from ships at sea, they are very vulnerable to attack from the air.

We find the coast defenses of the Northeast deficient in the following respects:

Guns: Heavy gun batteries of limited range exist in considerable numbers. These are generally in good mechanical condition. Some would require a few days to be placed in firing condition. Some few are in need of new parts. Many of them are of short range, but even so, the range is equal to the probable visibility generally existing in this region. A few long-range modern batteries exist.

Ammunition: In general, the guns are well supplied with ammunition, which is stored in well-protected magazines.

Protection: The guns are in general, well protected from fire from the sea, but not at all from bombs from planes. The latest types of guns are almost unprotected from fire from either sea or air.

Camouflage: One particularly noticeable feature connected with the coast defenses included in our itinerary was the almost total absence of any attempt at camouflage. From the air these concrete scars on the landscape are very noticeable and we believe are unnecessary. We believe every effort should be made to conceal the gun emplacements, magazines, tracks, observation points, etc. We believe in this connection, dummy emplacements, only partially hidden should be employed and that the position of the guns and other installations should be kept masked as long as possible.

Observation and fire control: The observation posts were in no case protected from attack from either sea or air. Some of the most modern guns are lacking in equipment to direct and control their fire.

Antiaircraft: Except for a very few mobile regiments stationed at the harbor defenses at this time, the antiaircraft defense of the gun batteries consists of obsolescent guns, poorly placed to meet modern attack methods and totally lacking in modern fire-control equipment. Air fields in the area are few in number and, except those in the larger metropolitan areas of Boston and New York, are too small to accommodate large planes.

Mines: The control mines to be planted and operated by the Army exist in fair quantities, but cable and other control equipment are in poor condition or nonexistent. There is need for more mine planters.

Personnel: In very few of these forts is there any force except a caretaking force, which is inadequate even for this purpose. Provisions are made for this force to be supplemented, in case of an emergency, by National Guard troops, but if the emergency were not preceded by a 2-week notice, it is extremely doubtful if these troops would be of much value.

Quarters: In most of these posts any additional personnel or equipment would have to be quartered in tents, as there is a dearth of quarters for existing personnel and equipment.

W. P. A.: We were somewhat surprised and much gratified to learn that a great deal of assistance had been rendered these posts by the W. P. A. program. Many buildings had been and were being constructed and many old buildings had been repaired by W. P. A. labor. Those in command reported that in general the local authorities had been cooperating splendidly in this respect.

It is recommended that the present program be supplemented and speeded up to provide the following, most of which has been many times recommended, by those in charge of the various posts in reports, now on file.

1. Immediate additions to the personnel sufficient to provide a full complement of enlisted men and officers to man the existing harbor defenses, the antiaircraft batteries, both for protection of the gun batteries and vital harbor installations, less the National Guard personnel assigned for wartime duty.

2. Immediate rehabilitation of all serviceable guns, regardless of caliber or character and construction of such protection as is possible for all batteries and other installations against bombs or bomb splinters. It seems to us that the mechanism for elevating and traversing the guns are particularly vulnerable to bomb splinters.

3. Improvement of existing and construction of new air fields for use of larger air force. We believe these fields should be sod throughout, with the buildings of the type of ordinary farm buildings. The field at New London, Conn., is a good example of an inconspicuous landing field. More airplanes and airplane personnel should be assigned to these units to operate with and be trained with them.

4. Speed up acquisition of mobile antiaircraft matériel, aircraft, motor torpedo boats of the Navy, mines, fire-control equipment and heavy, modern, long-range seacoast batteries.

5. Procurement of equipment and organization and training of personnel for fixing antiaircraft batteries of large caliber around cities containing vital installations. This personnel can come from additional National Guard or State militia units, but the equipment should be constructed at once by the Federal Government.

6. Organization and equipment as rapidly as possible, of additional mechanized divisions of the Regular Army. At least one corps, consisting of two armored divisions with medium and mobile artillery, should be maintained at all times in the New England area, in addition to the present National Guard forces, which are only partly trained and partly immobilized and immobile, is New England's only present protection.

7. The training in mine planting of former Army mine planters, now in the service of the Coast Guard in this area for use in servicing the lighthouses.

8. An immediate study of the matter of camouflage with the idea of adopting the same to whatever may be the natural surroundings and a constant system of inspection of same from the air, both by observation and photography.

9. The acquisition and fortification of bases for our fleet and air bases in Nova Scotia and Bermuda.

10. Program of progressive replacement of obsolescent guns and equipment to begin as soon as possible.

Conclusion. Although we have not visited the other coastal areas of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, from what we have seen and from what we know of the general subject, we have no doubt but that the same general conditions prevail in other areas. We therefore make the above recommendations for our entire system of coast defenses on continental United States.

Burke-Wadsworth Military Training Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEE E. GEYER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. LEE E. GEYER, OF CALIFORNIA, DELIVERED JULY 4

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech delivered by myself over KFVD on July 4, 1940:

My friends, this is Congressman LEE E. GEYER reporting to you by transcription directly from Washington, D. C.

Today we celebrate Independence Day. How thankful we should all be that we still have that independence with all it means to us. Think of the countries of the world who in the last few months have lost the privilege of celebrating Independence Day.

And, by the way, in speaking of privileges, how fortunate are we to have such a radio station as KFVD. There is no station in these entire United States that is giving such service as this one. This station is absolutely uncontrolled. All sides of all questions may be discussed over this wave length. I personally am very grateful for the opportunity afforded me by this station to bring to you each week the news from Washington, D. C.

Last Sunday evening I had the pleasure of speaking on the American Forum of the Air. This is a program that comes to the west coast each Sunday at 4 p. m. There are always six persons to participate. There are two main speakers, who present the two sides of some live topic. After both sides have been presented, the other four persons carry on an informal discussion of the topic. This is always an interesting part of the program, as the four are not allowed to have prepared speeches but must match wits extemporaneously. No doubt many who are listening now heard the program last Sunday. We discussed the Burke-Wadsworth bill, providing for compulsory military training.

The speakers presenting the case were Senator BURKE, of Nebraska, author of the bill, who spoke in favor of it, and Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, who spoke against it.

The four members on the panel were Col. John Taylor and Col. William Donovan, of the famous "Fighting Sixty-ninth," who supported Senator BURKE in advocating the passage of the bill; and opposing these three, on the side of Senator CAPPER, were Congressman HAMILTON FISH, Republican, of New York, and myself.

This was indeed a strange line-up. So far as I know, there is but one other major controversial issue upon which Mr. FISH and I are in agreement. That is the right of the people to vote on a declaration of war.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding, let me say at the outset of my discussion of this bill that I do not hold that some form of universal military training might not be necessary at some time. Whether or not we have reached that place now in our history I have not definitely decided.

I might be induced to support a bill if it were correctly written, provided I could be convinced this was the only way to continue the existence of our free Nation. But of one thing I am sure, the bill would need to be very, very different from the one we discussed last Sunday afternoon.

Let us examine briefly the provisions of the Burke-Wadsworth bill.

It provides first for the registration for training of all males between the ages of 18 and 65. After registration these persons shall be divided into 2 great classes. Into one class are put all persons between the ages of 21 and 45. Into the other class—let us call them the "home guard"—are put all persons between the ages of 18 and 21 and between the ages of 45 and 65. Thus, we have the one class of 21 to 45 who are to serve in the armed forces of the United States—that is, the Army and Navy. These lads are to be the backbone of our Nation's defense.

Let us see what ages will be used mostly in this Nation's defense and from what walks in life they are to be taken.

The bill which I have here before me says that "not more than 87 percent nor less than 78 percent of the men selected shall be between the ages of 21 and 31."

Thus, you see this Army backbone shall in the main be between 21 and 31 years of age. Now, that sounds fine. But from what classes of society shall these youngsters come?

The way to arrive at this is to see who is left after those whom the law exempts are removed.

The bill allows the following to remain at home for no training—those men whose employment in industry, agriculture, engineering, physics, chemistry, medicine, dentistry, or other occupations found necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest.

To this group, the bill adds those physically, mentally, or morally unfit, ministers of the gospel, and conscientious objectors. Also all those with dependents are exempt.

Oh, yes, lest we forget—there is another class made safe from service either at the front or at home. Whom do you think that group is?—Why, Congressmen. Isn't that nice?)

If you will review the list carefully, you will note that about the only ones that may be called for service are the single men between 21 and 31 who do not have jobs. Thus by this bill we will establish an army from the ranks of those whom industry and government no longer have use for. These men who have been denied the right of a family and a home and job to which they have a right under our form of government are forced to defend the interests of Congressmen, industrialists, businessmen, farmers, professional men, and their more fortunate brothers who really have something to be defended.

Now that we have chosen as our defenders the stepchildren of this great country, how are we going to treat them?

Each one forced into the service must serve a "sentence" of at least 8 months and may be kept there indefinitely if the powers that be so desire. Then, if he is so fortunate as to get his discharge, lest he might get back at a permanent job in civilian life, he is to be interrupted for a period of 1 month each year for further training.

Now, what shall he receive as pay for this service of defending the persons and property of his more fortunate fellows? Why, the beneficient sum of $5 per month. About enough to buy his cigarettes.

How high do you think the morale of such an army would be? You know an army is only as strong as its spirit. Do you think our young people are dumb? Don't you suppose that they'll know that they are the ones protecting those who are making millions out of this defense program because this Congress refused to tax those war profits? They know that out of the last war this Nation got 18,000 new millionaires. Will they be anxious to give their lives to protect such a system that means only exploitation for them?

I, for one, do not expect to place my stamp of approval on this "war slave" plan.

Yes, and I, for one, will not be content to have the security of my country based on such an army recruited in this manner and so shamefully treated.

The President, to my knowledge at least, has not put his stamp of approval on this bill either, and I don't think he ever will. No, this proposed Burke-Wadsworth bill is most decidedly undemocratic and un-American. It is not a military-training bill. It is a bill to make cannon fodder out of our unemployed youth so that jobs need not be provided for them.

Now, let me repeat for those who may have tuned in late—I might be induced to support some universal-training bill, but it will need to be much different from this one and I'll have to be convinced the danger to the Nation is greater than I believe it to be now.

Audi Partem Alteram

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

ARTICLE BY A. WHITNEY GRISWOLD

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, there are two sides to every question and because of this bilateral truth we should have an open mind toward the other side of the Japanese problem. If we do we can employ the Latin statement "audi partem alteram." We can then say that we have heard both sides of the question.

This article, entitled "Facing Facts About a New Japanese-American Treaty," by a distinguished scholar of the Far East, Prof. A. Whitney Griswold, of Yale University, is a study based on deep and profound research and worthy of the utmost reflection.

FACING FACTS ABOUT A NEW JAPANESE-AMERICAN TREATY

(By A. Whitney Griswold)

The European war, together with the upheaval of world politics that preceded it, has offered the United States an exceptional opportunity to settle some of the issues with Japan that conflict with the fundamental national interests of the United States in the Pacific area.

The history of American relations with Japan reveals certain recurring patterns of conflict emerging from time to time as American diplomacy pursued its objectives in eastern Asia. These objectives may be summarized briefly as follows: (1) The security of the Philippines, Guam, Samoa, and all other American possessions in or bordering the Pacific Ocean; (2) peaceful commercial and diplomatic relations with all Pacific nations, including both China and Japan, on terms of equal opportunity; (3) strict regulation of Oriental immigration into the United States and its Territories; (4) maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine in the Pacific as in the Atlantic; (5) enforcement of laws and regulations governing American coastal fisheries; (6) respect for the lives and property of American citizens resident or traveling in China, Japan, and all other nations in Asia as in Europe, Africa, North and South America. Americans may disagree as to the means or relative urgency of attempting to realize these objectives. They may regard them as more or less vital to the United States than, say, the Mexican oil question, the revision of the neutrality laws, or the Temporary National Economic Committee's investigation of the building trades. But within the single perspective of our Pacific relations they have accepted them with unfailing regularity as the fundamental ideals and interests of American diplomacy.

On July 26, 1939, the United States brought to an end a treaty relationship with Japan of 45 years' standing. The 1911 treaty of commerce and navigation, now scheduled to expire January 26, 1940, revised and superseded an earlier treaty concluded in 1894, in which the United States renounced the right of extraterritoriality in Japan. Attached to both instruments, on American initiative, were clauses protecting the right of each signatory to enact and enforce "laws, ordinances, and regulations" governing immigration. Indeed, Japan's chief motive in negotiating the 1911 treaty was to fend off statutory exclusion by reaffirming the most-favored-nation principle and reinforcing it with a promise to uphold the "gentlemen's agreement." Together the two treaties systematically laid down the legal basis for the commerce, navigation, residence, travel, property rights, protection of laws, and access to courts of each party's nationals within the other's territories.

The motives underlying the abrogation of the 1911 treaty were mixed, as they always are in practical diplomacy. There was no double entendre in Secretary Hull's assertion that the treaty contained "provisions which need new consideration." The "gentlemen's agreement" has been gathering archives' dust since the passing of the immigration law of 1924. The most-favored-nation clause of the 1911 treaty was conditional in character, and hence out of line with the unconditional most-favored-nation principle of the Hull trade-agreements program. Since 1911 Japan has added to the territories originally covered by the treaty new conquests over which her sovereignty is ambiguous, and to which the application of the treaty was therefore in doubt. Here, within the treaty itself, were at least three good reasons for revision.

World politics supplied the others. Ever since the beginning of the China incident there has been agitation within the United States for an embargo of the sale of war materials to Japan. By the spring of 1939 American sympathies for China had expressed themselves in the form of an official loan to the Chinese Government and an unofficial and yet fairly effective embargo of the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to Japan. Needless to say, no such loan had been offered to Japan, and weapons and war materials of all kinds continued to be sold to China. But the demand was growing for more stringent measures, for an extension of the unofficial munitions embargo to include the sale to Japan of materials that could be put to military usage—oil, trucks, steel, scrap iron, and so on. The measure found its popular support among individuals and organizations into whose motives it is not our present purpose to inquire. One broad, publicly acknowledged purpose commended the project to all, and lent it strength even in the eyes of persons who had no particular knowledge of, or interest in, far eastern affairs. This was to attack the collaboration of Japan with the Rome-Berlin axis and so redress the balance of world power in favor of Great Britain, France, and, it was hoped, peace. The United States could not honorably impose an embargo on Japan while still a party to the 1911 treaty. Hence it was abrogated. The action was immediately acclaimed as a step toward breaking up the axis and averting a world war.

Soon after it was taken, however, a revolution in world politics and a long-dreaded European war intervened to shatter these hopes and to modify, perhaps fundamentally, the premises from which they sprang. Like a series of earthquakes, the Nazi-Soviet pact, the Russo-Japanese truce in Outer Mongolia, and the "red" army's invasion of Poland shook pre-war political alinements to their foundations and toppled their ideological superstructures. As the dust cleared, two things became apparent: First, the German-Japanese partnership was, at least momentarily, dissolved; second, a balance of power had been restored to the Far East that had not existed there since 1931, perhaps not since 1914. Stalin did not, as was at first expected, turn his back on Europe. But, even if his Polish adventure should whet his appetite for further conquests along the Baltic, in the Balkans, or in the Near East, the very fact of his treaty with Germany, added to the fact of Germany's preoccupation with Britain and France, increases his freedom of action in the Far East as it decreases Japan's. The Outer Mongolian truce immediately inspired rumors that a much more comprehensive Soviet-Japanese understanding would follow. Suppose it does? Japan will now have to reckon with a vastly more potent Russia than the former butt of the anti-Comintern pact. She will have to concentrate on maintaining a strong front against her old antagonist. That is the only way to keep such an international friendship. And, as Mussolini could testify, it requires considerable concentration.

Will Stalin assume the role of honest broker between China and Japan? Will he treat China as he did Poland? Has he fixed his eyes on the ice-free harbors lost by the Czar to Admiral Togo and General Nogi? For the first time since the rise of Hitler Russia is free enough, and for the first time since the World War strong enough, to move in any of these directions with impressive chances of success. Whatever bargain may be struck by Russia and Japan will be more Russian than heretofore—perhaps more Russian than Japanese. Meanwhile, what plans is Britain making? Will Britain, Japan's ally from 1902 to 1922, and since then ever watchful of her entree in Tokyo, find a basis for reviving, in some form, her old association with Japan? Or will Japan pursue an opportunist neutrality, poised between Russia and Britain and awaiting only the chance—or provocation—to overrun the latter's far eastern possessions? Until these murky elements settle themselves into more definite patterns, an anti-Japanese move in the Far East might acquire an anti-British significance in Europe. An effective American economic sanction, directed exclusively against Japan, might prove a shot in the dark that struck a friend instead of a foe.

The possibilities are raised not to prove the unwisdom of abrogating the 1911 treaty but rather to suggest that present circumstances, unforeseen at the moment of abrogation, may call for a broader, more constructive American policy than the mere imposition of an embargo—something in addition to, if not instead of, an embargo. In the first place, if the neutrality laws are revised so as to permit the sale of war materials to Britain and France, there will be little or none available for sale to Japan. Even with the laws unchanged, domestic needs will probably be increased by the exigencies of national defense. Secondly, the war must inevitably enhance the importance to Japan of her commerce with the United States. Normally not less than 64 percent of her exports and 53 percent of her imports are bought and sold in the United States and the British Empire. With the entire resources not only of the British Empire but also of France and Germany concentrated on the war in Europe, Japan's dependence on American raw materials and heavy industries should increase proportionately. As the belligerents progressively restrict their imports to war necessities, in which Japan is herself deficient, her dependence on the American export market should increase even more drastically. Add to these economic factors the return of Russia as a far eastern power and you may perceive the enormously improved bargaining position enjoyed by the United States vis-à-vis Japan as compared with last July.

How shall we make use of it? On the practical answer to that question hinge many historic issues. It is always easier to define the objectives than it is the conduct of a policy. The latter falls necessarily within the sphere of professional diplomacy, into which public knowledge rarely penetrates. So much depends on the timing of diplomacy, on the opportune relation of apparently unrelated factors, that the most thoroughgoing democracy must delegate vast administrative responsibility to its diplomats. Not even in peacetime, much less in wartime, can the American public know the exact current details of international relations, no matter how far inside Europe or inside Asia its enterprising reporters manage to crawl. What the public can know, and use at least for its own instruction, is the always important, often decisive, historical background that produced the events concealed in the diplomatic pouches.

It seems inevitable that the two predominant powers of the Pacific, whose trade with each other is voluminous, should redefine their commercial-treaty relations. Could they not, at the same time at least, break ground for a settlement of some of their outstanding political differences? For 40 years Japan and the United States have been drawn together by powerful economic forces, despite almost constant friction in the realm of politics. Though at odds over the integrity of China, naval ratios, salmon fisheries, and immigration laws, Japan is our third best customer and we are Japan's best customer. Contrary to the sanguine prophecies of a century, China's share of our foreign trade—a polar magnet of our far eastern policy—has, since 1900, averaged less than one-half (often one-third) of Japan's share. Three decades of diplomatic bickering with Japan have not reversed this stubborn trend. May it not now serve as a bridge over certain hitherto insurmountable political obstacles? Would it not, in short, further the immediate, material interests of the United States and lead to a political dispensation in which others besides the United States might profit, to negotiate with Japan a new, unconditional most-favored-nation agreement identical with the trade agreements of the Hull program?

The project has long been under discussion. Two primary objections have been raised against it. Protectionists warned of a deluge of cheap Japanese-manufactured goods, and the public identified Japan as a partner of Germany and a member of the aggressor bloc with which no such agreement was desirable—the first objection has been encountered in the negotiation of every one of the existing score of trade agreements. For a detailed consideration of it we must look to the State Department experts, who have doubtless made the most thorough analysis of the commodities and regions likely to be involved. The validity of the whole underlying assumption of the trade-agreements program is likewise a matter for special discussion. It is here taken for granted that, although the program has not proved a wonder-working providence in the furtherance of American prosperity or world peace, it is a practicable and eminently desirable means of promoting American commerce. In particular, it affords one possible approach to the immediate problem at hand.

Japanese competition in domestic and world markets has become a favorite American nightmare. Let us snap the light on and see if it goes away. Since 1937 Japan's chief threat to the American market, cotton textiles, has been dispelled by voluntary quota agreements between Japanese and American producers. Since 1930 the trade balance between the two countries has been in favor of the United States. In 1936 the United States accounted for 11 percent of the world's total imports, 11.9 percent of its exports. Japan's corresponding percentages were 3.6 and 3.8 percent. In Latin America, where she is thought to have been making inroads on our business, Japan's sales in 1938 amounted to a mere 2.6 percent of that region's total imports. The United States' share (twice as large as our nearest competitor's) was 36.1 percent. Japan must sell somewhere to raise the exchange from which to buy from the United States, especially in view of Japan's unfavorable trade balance. Her cheap labor and low standard of living can scarcely compensate for her lack of capital and natural resources. They should hold no terrors for the United States, infinitely richer not only in capital and natural resources, but in technical proficiency and per capita productivity—the true qualities of success in foreign trade. In any case, a trade agreement admits of quota limitations, and the chief supplier formula has been used in most of the pacts to insure American producers against an inundation of competitive goods.

What about Japan's efforts to build up an imperial autarchy? What about Manchukuo and the Yen bloc? Great Britain, possessed of the oldest, largest, and richest empire in the world, has not freed herself from dependence on American markets, industries, and raw materials. The United Kingdom is our best customer today, with a British Dominion, Canada, ranking second. Japan's changing needs may periodically alter the type and quality of her imports from the United States. But can she ever dispense with them entirely? A trade agreement might help to induce her not to try.

Is not the very elasticity of such an agreement a point in its favor? It could be extended to cover not only Japan proper but also all Japanese-controlled areas on the Asiatic mainland, that is, all areas in which Japan maintains garrisons, regulates the currency, or collects the customs. Or it could be limited to the Japanese Empire as it existed, say, in 1931. We could match its expansion or contraction by including or excluding our own colonies and areas of special influence. For example, we maintain a preferential trade agreement with Cuba that is an exception to the unconditional most-favored-nation rule. Moreover, we protect our trade with our own colonies (the Philippines, Guam, American Samoa, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands) and the Panama Canal Zone by specific exemptions in the trade pacts. That is, we place all third parties on an equal footing before the tariff applying to the colonies, with which we ourselves maintain free trade. The open door to colonial trade on equal terms with the mother country is practically nonexistent in the present world. The not-quite-so-open door to colonial trade on terms of equality with all other third parties via the unconditional most-favored-nation clause is the only kind worth talking about today.

Actually, this is the only open door that has ever existed in China. John Hay's famous notes of 1899 failed to elicit any more generous treatment from the various powers holding territorial concessions in China. Even in their spheres of influence, areas over which they had no legal sovereignty, one and all employed a variety of means to discriminate against competitors in favor of their own nationals. A Japanese guaranty of unconditional most-favored bloc would, therefore, come very close to approximating the historical open door in China. If it would not place American exporters on an equal footing with Japanese, it would at least place them on an equal footing with all other foreign exporters. This in itself would be an advantage. Even should the scope of the pact be limited to the Japanese homeland, the latter could be regarded as a funnel for imports destined for Manchukuo, and commodity categories could be drawn up accordingly.

As for the political dividends the pact might be expected to yield, as well as the political objections heretofore confronting it, the new alinement of the powers may have increased the former as it appears to have decreased the latter. As compared with Japan's economic relations to the United States and the British Empire, Germany normally takes only 1.3 percent of Japan's exports and supplies but 4.2 percent of her imports. Japan's membership in the axis did little to increase her German trade. Do these relations not speak for themselves? An economic affinity that defied the most impressive ideological barrier in modern history served as a cornerstone of the Nazi-Soviet pact. Why should not the same factor lead Japan into better relations with Great Britain and the United States?

A trade agreement could not, obviously, end all the earthly woes to which the American Embassy is witness. The time seems scarcely ripe to discuss American recognition of Japan's "new order," on the one hand, or Japan's repudiation of it, on the other. There may never be peace in our time in China because our time is finite. Japan and China may only have entered the second quarter of a modern hundred years' war, in which it will take the Chinese as long to drive the Japanese across the Yellow Sea as it did the French to drive the British across the Channel. And even though the Hundred Years' War came to an end in 1453, the British and French did not really make peace until 1904, the year of the Entente Cordiale. Two things only appear to be certain: Japan's attack on the Chinese people has blasted the pan-Asia myth in all its aspects—the yellow peril massing its legions against the west—as high as Napoleon or Hitler blasted pan-Europeanism. That Japan will gain by her imperialism in China the military resources with which to assault the United States in the Western Hemisphere is one with the ideas the Kaiser tried unsuccessfully to sell to even so ready a customer as Theodore Roosevelt.

These problematical vistas of the future do not, however, exclude breathing spells during which China could, if she would, gain strength. The United States has no political ambitions nor any primary national interests that need draw her into China's wars. A powerful China is not likely to be much more hospitable to the foreigners of the treaty ports than is a victorious Japan. On the other hand, the American people will always sympathize with the victims of oppression, and as long as there is fighting in east Asia, there will always be dynamite for American diplomats to handle. To sever ourselves from all trade and commerce with the Far East until the last battle is fought is another chimerical notion. Why should we not continue to do business there, holding fast to the objectives outlined as our national interests, pursuing a flexible policy that seizes the advantages of the moment and places all American national interests in their true proportions? If we cannot cure all China's ills with a trade pact, the latter might provide the atmosphere, possibly even the occasion, for armistice proposals to both China and Japan.

If this possibility proves to be Utopian, there are few less complicated problems that might be solved. An exchange of nonaggression pledges covering the islands of the Pacific should be not more difficult now than it was in 1908, the year of the Root-Takahira agreement, or in 1924, the year of the Four-Power Treaty. Would it be worth any more? If accompanied by a renewal of the nonfortification agreement (art. XIX of the Five Power Naval Treaty) even though restricted in geographical scope, but including provisions for systematic joint inspection of the territories covered, it certainly would be. This would require a concession from Japan. So would a definitive settlement of the Alaska salmon fisheries dispute, a source of acute infection of the diplomatic blood stream. Japanese floating canneries operating off the mouths of Alaskan rivers have given rise to Alaskan and west coast demands for legislation reminiscent of the immigration and alien land laws. Japan would have as hard a time bucking these currents today as she had in 1924. She might better yield to them. Another Japanese offering that would win both popular and official approval in the United States would be a firm disavowal of political ambitions in Latin America.

Such Japanese concessions as these, we suggest, are not Utopian. With what could the United States meet them? We are in no mood for appeasement. Fortunately, we are not confronted with that melancholy alternative. A trade pact of equal value to both parties would not be appeasement. Neither, in the historical context of our far eastern policy, would certain other concessions. A nonfortification agreement would save us money and perhaps, if the European islands of the Caribbean are any sample, prove the most secure defense of Guam and the Philippines. Recognition of racial equality, no more than a formality to the United States, would still win confidence from the nation that has always looked in somewhat baffled friendship to the American people. Placing Japanese immigration under the quota system (the mere fulfillment of an old intention) would imrove the consistency of our most-favored-nation claims on Japan. The volume of immigration could thus be maintained at its present level and, at the same time, an ancient blight on Japanese-American friendship be removed. Were this done, Japanese students might reappear in American universities, from which they have tended to absent themselves since 1924. By the process of example and emulation they might then take home to Japan ideas and principles that we have not been able to impart to them by diplomatic notes and maneuvers. The United States may some day awake to the realization that example is often a better teacher than coercion—especially ineffective coercion.

We have said nothing of naval limitation, for at the moment this appears definitely Utopian. It might only stir futile controversy to remove it from that shadowy realm. A navy is a tool, not an objective. Larger and wealthier than Japan, faced by more widespread and more exacting needs, we cannot, in the nature of things, accept a treaty obligation of complete equality. Moreover, we should not forget that, whatever the future holds for Japan, she remains the world's third greatest naval power and the Pacific's second greatest, with no other power on earth capable of serious menace to her maritime security except ourselves. China and Russia might defeat Japan's armies. They cannot sink her navy. While we can, and must, maintain superiority, it should be clear to Japan that we desire no war in the Far East and are not maintaining our fleet for any such purpose. A restoration of more amicable commercial and diplomatic relations would help to convince Japan of this.

Here, then, is the outline of a Japanese-American settlement that seems real enough to deserve consideration. It is submitted in the belief that any effective policy must offer encouragement as well as admonishment to the nation from which concessions are sought. It costs the United States no sacrifice of national interest or national honor. It is consistent with American neutrality. Might it not bring stability to an increasingly important part of an otherwise unstable world? If the Germans had any such opportunity thrust into their hands, it is not hard to imagine how they would use it. We may have scruples against taking even an imaginary cue from the Wilhelmstrasse; we should be quixotic to ignore a tangible advantage it has let slip our way. We should at least be ready to examine it critically. With peace in Europe apparently a forbidden fruit, we should be grateful for any far eastern windfall.

The Cigarette Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the privilege given to me to extend my remarks, I desire to make reference to a bill which I introduced today, at the request of the American Federation of Labor, amending section 811 (a) (2), title 26, of the Federal Code.

The above section is amended by adding the words "eighteen and nineteen."

In view of the recent increase in the Federal internal-revenue tax on cigarettes from $3 to $3.25 a thousand, it is no longer possible for cigarette manufacturers to manufacture and sell cigarettes at a price which would enable the public to purchase a package of 20 cigarettes for 10 cents. It thus appears that the so-called 10-cent cigarettes can no longer exist, but must sell for 11 cents. It is the firm conviction of the Department of Agriculture, and it is believed of the farmers and of the consumers, that the sale of a package of cigarettes at 10 cents has been of great advantage to farmers and consumers in moving and bringing about the consumption of large amounts of tobacco that would not otherwise have been consumed and in bringing to the consumer a good cigarette within his purchasing power.

The internal-revenue collections have been increased by the increased consumption brought about by there being on the market 10-cent cigarettes, as many cigarettes which would not otherwise have been sold have been sold and revenues collected thereon. It is estimated that the 10-cent cigarettes constitute from 15 to 20 percent of all the cigarettes sold, and that if there be no 10-cent cigarettes, which would be the case with the present increase in tax, a great majority of all the persons now smoking 10-cent cigarettes will probably smoke roll-your-own tobacco or pipes taxed at 18 cents a pound as against a tax on cigarettes of approximately $1.25 a pound.

It would appear from the Treasury Department's estimate that the increased revenue collections from the increased tax of 25 cents would only be approximately $34,000,000, whereas, if the normal rate of increase in consumption of cigarettes for the last 5 years were had in the year 1940–41, the increased collections of revenue should be $46,256,000. It thus appears that the Department of Revenue estimates a decrease of about $12,500,000 over what the cigarettes would be if there had not been any increase in internal-revenue tax. It is fairly estimated that all of this decrease in business will come out of the 10-cent cigarettes. It is proposed that a good 10-cent cigarette to retail for 10 cents a package could be sold if there were a provision in the statute for statutory packages containing 18 and 19 cigarettes, respectively.

To effect this, it is suggested that section 811 (a) (2), title 26, be amended to provide for statutory packages of 18 and 19 cigarettes. This amendment could be effected by inserting after the word "sixteen" and before the word "twenty" in section 811 (a) (2) the words "eighteen, nineteen." Such an amendment to the law would enable manufacturers to sell and give the greatest value possible in a package of cigarettes for the 10-cent price. It is difficult to see how there could be any argument against any such amendment.

The information is that the Bureau of Internal Revenue, Treasury Department, has stated there would be no objection to any such amendment. With such an amendment a manufacturer would thus be able to sell the greatest possible value in cigarettes for 10 cents. It is believed that the farmer would be aided by increased consumption in tobacco, the consumer would get the greatest possible value, and the Federal revenue would be increased.

Money Is Not Enough

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, neither the President nor his political supporters, combined with the hundreds of thousands of Federal employees and with the Army and the Navy officials, can make cannons, airplanes, trucks, warships in sufficient quantity and of a quality that will insure our national safety. This country needs peace between industry and labor, and first of all a definite, constructive program which at this time the President does not have. The country needs, and it will undoubtedly cheerfully get, the best efforts of those the President has been pleased to call economic royalists; but before industry can swing into the full peak of production, the President and the Congress must see to it that organizations controlled by Communists, by public enemies, shall not stand in the way of a preparedness program.

Along that line let me here read an editorial in the New York World-Herald of May 15, 1940:

THE FIRST LESSON

President Roosevelt, most Congressmen, and most American citizens have come to the conclusion that the time has come to strengthen our national defenses. That is wise.

But thus far only two important proposals have been made.

The first, coming from the President, is a request for an extraordinary defense fund of, perhaps, a half-billion dollars. The other, coming from various congressional leaders, is that the authorized national debt "ceiling" be increased, in order to allow more deficits for defense purposes.

In other words: Borrow more money, hand it to our generals to buy a few defense knickknacks, and then settle back in our chairs for another snooze. That, for the moment, seems to be the Government's program for chinking up the holes in our security.

It is a program which ignores one of the principal lessons of the European war.

For years France, England, and the Scandinavian countries, like the United States, have been concentrating on "the more abundant life, with mandolin accompaniments." They have been struggling to achieve a 40-hour week, 3 weeks vacation with pay, unemployment insurance, pensions, and housing projects.

That is all very pleasant. But it happened that the natural enemy of those countries was engaged in other pursuits. Germany wasn't on a 40-hour week. It wasn't even on a 50-hour week. People worked until the Fuehrer said they could quit—or until they dropped.

As a result Germany is today, without doubt, the most productive nation on earth. If it is beaten in war it will be only after other nations have matched its productivity.

For in these days of mechanized warfare it should be plain to anyone that no country can be stronger than its productive industries.

Nazi labor is slave labor.

We who live in a democratic country believe that free labor is better—that in the long run it will produce more than forced labor. That may be true. At any rate the war may test the theory.

But it has already been proved that a nation which works—under whatever compulsion—is stronger than a nation which dreams about living without work.

In this country we have taken it for granted that our way of life would not be challenged, that we would never again have to exercise our national strength in a physical encounter. We have turned soft. Our Government has spent tremendous sums for various good purposes, but still our industry staggers. There is still unemployment, still overproduction in some lines, underconsumption in many. Even if our coasts were lined with forts we could not say that our Nation is strong, for we are not using our strength.

We don't know when, if ever, the World War will come to this hemisphere. But we do know that a cruel and dangerous enemy is marching against civilization, and that America's test may come within our times.

If we are to meet that test successfully we will need not only a first-rank Army and Navy, but a hard-hitting industry capable of matching any in the world. That can't be obtained by passing a bill. It can come only from the friendly, effective cooperation of an intelligent government with a patriotic people.

The time has come to examine, not only our national practices, but also the frame of mind into which we have drifted in recent peaceful years.

Many editorials from other national publications have expressed the same thought and the President will do well to listen to their advice.

The President's Defense Message and Newly Announced Antiwar Stand

OF

HON. J. FRANCIS HARTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, yesterday we heard the President's message asking for appropriations and authorizations totaling $4,848,171,957. Unlike previous messages accompanying similar requests, significantly he has spoken words indicating a desire to defend administration defense activities of the past 7 years. He says he foresaw the danger of a great war, but does not explain failure to make definite recommendations for plugging the glaring holes in our defense.

He gives Congress credit for granting his previous requests but admits his inability to foresee our great needs. His piecemeal upping of defense appropriations apparently is because "the changes in the world situation are so great and so profound" and to him and his State Department so unexpected. If unexpected to him, with all of the confidential information at his disposal, unexpected is a mild word to describe results of world events to the ordinary citizen and Congressman as well. We lack the information of the executive department. Yes; we were refused information concerning foreign affairs when the House majority, at the instance of the State Department, defeated the resolution of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts. Had her resolution passed, our Foreign Affairs Committee at least might have such little from day-to-day information on foreign affairs as would not interfere with the Department's handling of foreign relations. Consequently, we are in the dark and are quite thoroughly in the dark on what has really been accomplished to date in plugging our defense holes.

We have every reason to expect that thorough and complete information will be obtained by our House committees in charge of legislation intended to translate the President's request of yesterday into recommendation form for our consideration. The American people who are to be defended, do the defending, and who will have to pay the $10,000,000,000 new burden are entitled to have facts showing just what is being done and what is to be done. We are glad to have the President "take this occasion to report the excellent progress being made for the procurement of the equipment already ordered," but we should know how much and what has been delivered, how much is on order, and when delivery of various on orders will be made.

After war-framed words and actions of the past, we were happy to note for the first time in Presidential utterances some assurance, in his definite statement, that "we will not send our men to take part in European wars." The favorable public reaction to the positive position in the Republican platform, "The Republican Party is firmly opposed to involving this Nation in foreign war," indicates almost universal American opposition to sending our soldiers "over there." I sincerely hope that the Democratic platform, when it is adopted, will also take the cue from the foreign-war stand in the Republican platform.

So, Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, when we get legislative translation into dollars of the President's July 10 request let us hope that a concise picture of progress—not in mere words but facts—can and will accompany committee reports.

The Progress of Barberry Eradication in South Dakota

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, a cut was made this year in the appropriations to the Department of Agriculture for the work of the Bureau of Plant Entomology. The application of that cut means that the work in barberry eradication in South Dakota will be interrupted.

I shall not maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this of itself will be a national calamity; I recognize that when appropriations are cut they have to be applied somewhere. This happens to be our turn, perhaps, because very good progress has been made in the barberry work in my State. The only question is whether it should be stopped until the program has been completed. There will be some lost ground when it is resumed.

In order, however, that the stopping of the work at this time will not be regarded as an invitation to stop it permanently, and in order that the work thus far done may be properly evaluated, I wrote to Mr. A. M. Eberle, director of extension at South Dakota State College, and from him secured the facts on which this report is made. I respectfully call it to the attention of the Members of the House and to the Bureau of Agriculture.

The records indicate that for a small expenditure, the barberry crew reduced an average annual loss of more than $8,000,000 to an average annual loss of approximately one and a half millions, by eradicating the plants which were the home of the rust that destroyed and reduced yields of wheat. The story of the barberry eradication in South Dakota is interesting indeed.

Barberry eradication for the control of stem rust has made marked progress since its start in South Dakota in 1918. At the close of 1939 a total of 135,921 rust-spreading barberries had been located and destroyed on 1,484 different properties. Bushes were found in 59 of the counties in the State; however, the larger number was in the eastern and southeastern part of the State and in the Black Hills territory. Various allotments of emergency funds since 1933, together with the limited regular appropriation made it possible to recheck numerous areas in the State where barberries had escaped from cultivation and to clean up a number of areas of native timber.

It is estimated that between 75 and 80 percent of the work toward completion of this program in South Dakota has been accomplished, but additional work remains to be completed.

A considerable amount of rechecking must be done, particularly in those areas that have yielded escaped barberries in the past. These areas clearly show that seeds were scattered by birds from the original planted bushes. In order to accomplish a thorough job of eradication, it is necessary to recheck such areas at 5- to 6-year intervals until no more bushes are located. Barberry seeds have a thick seed coat and may lie dormant for at least 10 years. This accounts for the needed reinspection of properties.

As the eradication program nears completion, the use of labor crews obtained from relief rolls is impractical and uneconomical. The final clean-up work must be done by well-trained and competent individuals.

Occasionally situations arise where labor is needed, particularly in limited areas like those in and near Hot Springs in Fall River County, Hermosa in Custer County, Sturgis and Piedmont in Meade County, Spearfish in Lawrence County, Yangton in Yankton County, and Vermillion in Clay County. When such is the case, if trained men are on the job, the needed manpower can be secured in the community and the area of bushes eradicated.

Other counties where barberries have escaped from cultivation and some rechecking of areas will be necessary are: Brookings, Deuel, Grant, Kingsbury, Lake, Lincoln, Minnehaha, Moody, Turner, and Union. All of the 1,484 properties upon which bushes have been found should be given at least one more recheck.

Two trained agents have been working in Fall River County, using 17 laborers to intensively survey the territory. During the past few weeks these men have located and destroyed a total of 41 barberries, thereby eliminating these sources of stem-rust inoculum. Because of lack of funds, this work stopped on June 30, 1940, before the area had been completed. Additional work will be needed in this area about 1945.

It would be unwise and false economy to stop the program now when the end of the job is in sight. One individual in charge of the work, aided by at least three trained men, should be able to bring the program to the stage of limited maintenance within 6 years. This would call for funds amounting to between $8,500 and $10,000 per year. This would also take care of any local labor that would be required in some areas.

There has been a decided reduction in the amount of damage because of the various control practices, namely, eradication of rust-spreading barberries, development of rust-resistant varieties of grain, early sowing of spring grains, and properly prepared and well-drained seed beds. From 1915 to 1926, inclusive, the average annual loss to wheat alone in South Dakota because of stem rust amounted to approximately $8,404,500. From 1924 to 1938, inclusive, the average annual loss to wheat in the State was approximately $1,520,700. Stem rust also causes damage to oats, barley, and rye.

The eradication of barberry bushes in South Dakota has practically eliminated stem rust on rye, and the damage to oats has not been more than a trace since 1929.

The total average annual valuation of wheat, oats, barley, and rye produced in the State during the period 1930–38, inclusive, based on December prices each year, was in excess of $33,000,000. One should remember that this includes several bad crop years and low prices, but the fact still remains that crops of such value must be protected from the ravages of insects and plant diseases.

Although the work is interrupted at this time, I feel sure that with the splendid record of results obtained, the work will be resumed in good time and carried to completion. The barberry can be eradicated. Rust can be reduced. The job is nearly done, and it should be completed.

Our Diocese

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. CURTIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

ADDRESS OF REV. JOHN J. CAREY, OF HEARTWELL, NEBR.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert a speech made by a distinguished constituent of mine, the Very Reverend John J. Carey, of Heartwell, Nebr., which contains considerable historical data.

OUR DIOCESE

(A toast given by Very Rev. John J. Carey, Heartwell, Nebr., on the occasion of the sacerdotal silver jubilee of the Most Rev. Louis B. Kucera, bishop of Lincoln, Nebr., June 10, 1940)

There is a joy in our hearts as our bishop celebrates today a landmark in his career. His ordination was like a view for the first time from a mountain peak; his consecration and installation as bishop of Lincoln was like a lifting-up that gave experienced eyes a greater range for greater service; and now this sacerdotal jubilee crowns the ambition of his youth with a quarter of a century of service. These years saw many cares, many worries, many victories; but with him it was always onward and onward. Today, however, he takes a little time off to say a word or two amid the greetings of friends.

The toast assigned me is Our Diocese. Three years ago this diocese celebrated its golden jubilee. The record then showed Bishop Kucera the fifth to rule over the see of Lincoln. In looking back through these five administrations, we observe a differentiating note in each of them, due to either the conditions of the time or the quality of soul of him at the helm. Touching only the high points, we begin with the first.

The more the passing of the years puts us older priests away from the time of Bishop Bonacum the greater he looms up before us. Perhaps this may be a variation of the fact that the nearer one gets to his second childhood the more glorious are the days of the long past. Be this as it may, we, however, choose to think that men and things appear in their true light only when tested in the tube of the years. Bishop Bonacum was truly a pioneer bishop. In saying that, we hardly need add anything more. He was a builder. He knew his duty and loved it. He thought not of himself, only of the work to be done. He put a mission wherever possible, he located a resident priest as soon as he was able, he established a school where it was at all feasible, and he insisted on the priests grasping every opportunity to improve their parishes. He was fully aware of the peculiar needs of each parish and personally knew the committeemen of every church. Let us remember, too, this was in the "horse and buggy" days. With his unusual sense of values, he wisely guided each pastor while building, and that is why such operations were always successful. In building St. Thomas' Orphanage, he visited a number of farmers in south Nebraska and asked each one who owned 320 acres for a donation of $100. That is how he built and paid for the orphanage. Taking all in all, Bishop Bonacum's 22 years in Lincoln was just 1 long working day.

The second bishop was the Most Reverend J. Henry Tihen. He was a lecturer on the Chautauqua platform when that institution was at its best. At the time Lincoln was a prominent town on the circuit, and immediately after the announcement of the new appointee a flood of recommendations inundated the city. As a result, no new bishop anywhere came to a more friendly people than Bishop Tihen did when he first arrived in Lincoln. During his 6 years' stay in the diocese, he was always the lecturer. At the time of his coming, 11 churches and 2 schools were nearing completion; and the dedicating of these brought him out almost immediately amongst his people. Everyone everywhere just wanted to see the new bishop. Between these dedications and soon thereafter he visited many other parishes with his lecture, "Social Conditions." These various trips, together with his Knights of Columbus activities, made him a popular figure all over the diocese. Not counting replacements on account of fire losses, Bishop Tihen built 5 churches, 4 schools, and 8 rectories. This showed he kept up the good work so well begun by his predecessor.

With the transfer of Bishop Tihen to Denver, Bishop O'Reilly came here from Baker City, Oreg. He had been a bishop for 15 years at the time of the change, and his health was not what it used to be. Five years in Nebraska brought an end to his labors. During this short time, however, he took hold of the helm with a determination worthy of a man in his prime. His main idea was to put schools in places that had none. In this he was quite successful. He also handled the finances of the diocese very ably. But what we remember him most for was his tender devotion to both priests and people—in a word, a kind-hearted pastor's pastor.

The next bishop to come was none other than the present archbishop of Dubuque. His chosen work was that of the missions. As head of the seminary at Cincinnati he organized the Mission Crusaders. This cause was always dear to his heart, and its needs took him away from the diocese quite frequently. He never, however, neglected his work here.

Thus far, next to Bishop Bonacum, the present incumbent has been the longest in Lincoln. Just as he assumed charge of the diocese a general change in the affairs of men was in the making. A new epoch in economic world history was gradually opening up. Whether we knew it or not or whether we like it or not, a changed condition was upon us. Communism thought they had the green light but the church noticed it was all red. The result was danger, especially to our youth. So to prevent there being empty pews in churches and vacant desks in our schools of tomorrow, the church said, "Save the youth." Thus the youth movement became Bishop Kucera's grand objective. Even in spite of the greatest depression of the years and the greatest drought in our history, the Bishop threw his whole soul into this work. The enthusiastic response from the parishes shows that success is almost within his grasp For this we desire to felicitate His Excellency.

A bishop rules a diocese, but he always operates through his priests. He commands; they execute orders. Consequently, it is within the scope of the present remarks to say a word about the priests of the diocese. Pardon a personal allusion. At the time of my ordination the diocese was 15 years old. My impression of those early priests who built up or were laying the foundations for future building up of the diocese was one of childlike admiration. They were hard-headed, two-fisted men. Without attempting a eulogy let us merely say that not one of them would ever tolerate it to be said that he failed in any way in the care and management of his parish. They were all pastors but whether young or old they were just one body, standard bearers of the greatest banner that ever appeared on the horizon, adjutants of Christ the King.

With the youth movement so important a part of the priest's work today, more is now necessarily demanded of the younger priests. We older priests wish them every success. Our fervent hope is that when they become the older priests their work with the youth shall have been so successful that, with eyes upon the cross, they will be able to sing with pride that soul-stirring song, God Bless America, My Home Sweet Home.

Production in Spite of Communists

REMARKS

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday June 5, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, just how does the President expect to get production of aircraft or other munitions of war with the Communist adherents of the C. I. O. in strategic positions in essential industries?

Note the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune of May 21:

THE "FIFTH COLUMN" HERE

While the third terms talk of national defense in Washington they are harboring aliens, radical enemies of the existing order, and communist saboteurs not only on the Government pay roll but in industries and services upon which the country is dependent. Nearly every country in Europe took alarm when the "fifth column" arose in the Netherlands to meet the Nazi invaders. No internal enemy has been removed from a place of vantage here.

Harry Bridges, Communist in everything but name, remains in control of west coast shipping and as a consultant of the Labor Board. That is to the satisfaction of Mme. Perkins who kept him there but it would scare anyone responsible for military services on the Pacific side. John Lewis allowed Communist activists to go into the major industries along with his C. I. O. organizers and they are still there where they can wreck tools and tie up production at a word from Moscow headquarters. It would be obeyed instantly.

There is another section of the "fifth column" in this country which is trying to wreck the peace. It consists of those American citizens whose hearts are in foreign countries and who use their American citizenship to help the land of their choice at the sacrifice of the land in which they live. Many of these internal enemies in the various sections are political allies of the third termers. They trade support for protection, an alliance which the American people cannot afford to ignore. They must rally in self-defense.

Many similar articles have appeared in other papers. Everyone except the New Dealers seem to be aware of the weakness of our present industrial system, due to the failure of the President to protect industry from subversive influences.

Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILL M. WHITTINGTON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. WILL M. WHITTINGTON OF MISSISSIPPI, JULY 4, 1940, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE AMERICAN LEGION, POST NC. 2, INDIANOLA, MISS.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered on Thursday, July 4, 1940, under the auspices of the American Legion, Post No. 2, Indianola, Miss., to wit:

PREPAREDNESS

This is Independence Day and Congress is in recess. I am, therefore, privileged to accept the invitation of the American Legion Post No. 2, Indianola, to speak to you on this occasion.

On this, the anniversary of our independence, our thoughts turn to our country. We are thinking of freedom and democracy. We know that democracy is not merely something to be inherited. We know that every generation must earn the privilege of enjoying democracy. We know that every generation must practice democracy. We renew our loyalty to our country. We pledge anew fealty to our flag.

On this day we recall the high purposes of the American Legion. For more than 20 years, as a voice crying in the wilderness, it has stood for adequate national defense. It has advocated universal service. It has insisted upon equal service for all and special privileges for none. It has fought subversive influences, and it has opposed foreign ideologies. It has stood for country and for God. As your Representative, and as your spokesman in the Halls of Congress, I have been heartened and strengthened by the spirit of the messages and resolutions that have come to me from every post in the district that I have the honor to represent.

DEMOCRACY

The twentieth century began with democracy challenging dictators. Man has made unparalleled progress in science and in industry. It is a paradox of the ages that with all of man's boasted progress, nations cannot live in peace with other nations. It is a lamentable fact that while the century is not half gone, today dictators are challenging democracy. This is a dark hour in civilization. Democracy and totalitarianism are in death grips in the second world war.

Democracy is not a mere form; it is not wishful thinking; it is a way of life; and the democratic way of life is in danger in our own and all other countries.

Small and peaceful nations have been ravaged by dictators. Millions in Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France have been driven from their homes and their country by the ruthless hordes of the unspeakable Hitler. Beautiful Paris has been deserted, and the rivers of France have run red with the blood of patriots; and, as the most unkind and despicable cut of all, Italy, under Mussolini, has blackened the character of her civilization for centuries by attacking France, her former ally and protector, while she was down and almost out. Treaties have been broken and compacts, solemnly agreed to, have been ignored. Brave and heroic France has surrendered to the invaders, and today democracy in Europe is paying tribute to totalitarianism. England has her back to the wall while the hordes of the monstrous Hitler and the ghoulish Mussolini are howling and attacking at her gates and shores.

Ruthless war has been waged for more than 3 years by militaristic Japan against peace-loving China. Totalitarianism is on the march the world over, and democracy is threatened today as it has not been threatened for 164 years and since the Liberty Bell pealed forth independence for the Thirteen Colonies on July 4, 1776.

THINKING

It is time for sane thinking. The people of Mississippi and of the United States are more serious on this day than they have been since 1917. This is no occasion for mere words, for high-sounding phrases, for vain glory, or for patriotic boasting. This is no occasion for grandstand patriotism. It is time for reflection; it is time for zeal; it is time for morale; it is time for reverence for the ideals of democracy that were meat and drink for our forefathers; it is time for a rededication to the ideals of government that constitute the very warp and woof of our institutions; it is time for action; it is time for determination; it is time for high ideals and for sacrificial living.

We have been bred to ease and comfort. We have boasted of our rights. We have thought that we were secure. We have acted as if liberties grew on trees. We have forgotten that our fathers paid a high price in both blood and sacrifice for the freedom that we enjoy.

Free speech has been perverted. Freedom of speech has never included the right to advocate the overthrow of the Republic by force. The collapse of heroic France shows that no nation, no matter what its potential might may be, can ride two horses going in the opposite directions at the same time. No nation can practice self-indulgence and expect self-preservation. No nation can preach soft economics and practice preparedness. No nation can surrender to groups or blocs and be strong. No nation can serve two masters. There can be no exceptions. If there be false security, or if there be false economics, there will be national decay and loss of freedom.

In assuming the Premiership of France in her darkest hour, Marshal Petain, the hero of Verdun, said: "Since our victory 22 years ago the spirit of enjoyment took precedence over the spirit of sacrifice. We thought more of our personal claims than of personal sacrifice. Our desire was to avoid effort. Today we face misfortune."

Freeman, in his biography of Robert E. Lee, chose this incident for the last paragraph of his four volumes: "A woman, whose husband had been a soldier in the army of northern Virginia, brought in a baby, a boy child, for Lee's blessing. He took the child in his arms and spoke these sacred words as he handed him back to her, 'Teach him to deny himself.'"

We have come to the cross roads. The United States must travel the straight road ahead. There must be no turning to the right nor to the left. The Government of Washington and of Jefferson must and shall be preserved.

YOUTH

The youth of America do not lack courage, either moral or physical. They are different from the youth of 25 years ago. They have often lived the easy life; they have been misguided; they have often listened to the cynics and they have often destroyed the moral values. The elders are frequently to blame. The youth of today has been taught by post World War writers that that war was fought for the munition makers and the international bankers. The truth has not been emphasized. The youth is not altogether to blame. There has been much in our books and literature in contempt of the high purpose that animated the United States in going to war in 1917. Defenseless men, women, and children were murdered and American ships were sunk without warning. It is time for youth and age to know the truth.

The youth of today must realize, as did the patriots of 1776, that a free government is worth fighting for, and citizens of the Republic must show to the youth that the Government for which the youth is asked to die is worth living for.

No liberty that is unwilling to fight can survive. Freedom must be strong to defend itself. There must be conviction; there must be faith. There are some things for which democracy will fight. The strength of Germany today is the youth of Germany. They have been bred with a passion for the state. They have been taught that the state is supreme; they have a zeal for the Fatherland. The youth of America will do no less for their country than the youth of Germany is doing for the government of Hitler.

The American youth will be unworthy of its high heritage and of its noble traditions if in this hour it does not rededicate itself to the high ideals and to the noble convictions of liberty and of freedom. A country that is not worth dying for is not worth living for and living in. Unless the youth of today finds itself, unless the youth of today reconsecrates and rededicates itself to the high ideals of the founders and defenders of the Republic, we might as well leave our planes unbuilt and our battleships on paper.

I have journeyed from Washington to Mississippi to tell the people whom I have been permitted to serve and, I trust, to lead, that their country needs the service of all her sons and daughters. I call young men and old men to high and noble living, to service, and to sacrifice, and to live the life that retains its savor.

Leopold of Belgium is a pitiable figure. He is an example of the decay in moral values. He overlooked the essentials of character; he was confused and uncertain when the decisive hour came. Germany invaded Belgium and he pled with France and England for help. Three hundred thousand English and French men responded. They were fighting by his side. Without warning he laid down his arms and left his allies and protectors to their fate. It is not for me to judge him; he will be judged by history. There is a lesson for us in his surrender. His real tragedy was 4 years ago. There was moral decay in the King of the Belgians. In times of peace, when there was tranquillity, he canceled and refused to renew the treaty that his heroic father had written in blood with France and England. Leopold could see no difference between right and wrong in government; he could not distinguish between democracy and despotism; he could not tell the difference between the patriot and the dictator. The decay of morals, the lack or character resulting from ease, and the indulgence in peace and tranquillity were fatal to him. in the day of his decision.

It takes a crisis to bring out the best in our civilization. I believe in the youth of today. They are trained. I envy the youth of today. Great men are always developed in crises. It takes a crisis to develop leadership; it takes a crisis to bring forth the best that is in our manhood. We are large or small in an emergency. Our fathers sacrificed for liberty; our fathers bled for freedom.

The youth of today is the hope of tomorrow, our institutions are in their hands. They will not fail. They will be worthy of the rich heritage that they enjoy and will transmit to posterity the United States a better and more glorious country than they found it. May it always be said of the youth of today: This was their finest hour.

NEUTRALITY

A year ago we heard much of neutrality. I advocated then and I advocate now the neutrality that is based upon international law, the neutrality that has obtained through the centuries. I have never advocated a neutrality that was indifferent to right or wrong, a neutrality that made no distinction between godless and rapacious governments and democracies, a neutrality that made no distinction between oppressors and those who love justice and mercy. I have never favored a neutrality that could not hear and heed the piteous cry of thousands of innocent people in peaceful nations, that were attacked without cause and without warning. There can never be neutrality in fact in the face of oppression. We must not engage in foreign wars, we must not participate in the wars between other nations, but we can and should as patriots always stand for the right and oppose the wrong, on moral issues. Notwithstanding the neutrality laws of our country, we can never be neutral between justice and injustice except at the loss of our immortal souls.

It is said that the war in Europe is none of ours. Since when can patriots stand by and see the soul ripped from a quivering land without a protest? Since when can patriots acquiesce as a monstrous tyrant, with lust to kill, murders, and destroys? Since when did it become no concern of ours that freedom die and truth and justice perish from the earth? Freedom is in the blood stream of the world organism. We are a part of that organism. A disease that attacks the blood stream cannot be localized. If freedom die in other lands, freedom will decay in our own.

ISOLATION

There is a word in the vocabulary of many. We hear it often; it is "isolation." We are Americans first and we are Americans always, but we are also today, as we have ever been, conscious that we are our brother's keeper. We are interested in peace in the United States. We are opposed to war in this and other countries. At the same time, we are citizens of the world; we are our brother's keeper.

I oppose foreign alliances, but I also oppose a national isolation that does not abhor the sufferings and cannot hear the pleadings of the innocent dead and dying of other lands.

America cannot escape the impact of the European war. We cannot remain unscathed or unaffected by the misery of Europe. We will suffer not only in a material way but our conscience will suffer for any part we have played in the underlying political and economic causes of war. We cannot sleep well as long as the flame of war burns in Europe. We must play well our part as a Nation. I believe that all of us will do well to turn to the classics and recall the noble lines of Juvenal's Eighth Satire which, in English paraphrase, is:

> "Count it a baseness if your soul prefer
> Safety to that which honor asks of her;
> And hold it manly life itself to give
> Rather than lose the things for which we live."

In our own land and in our own country, Theodore Roosevelt put it another way when he said:

"Only by putting honor and glory ahead of safety shall we stand erect before the world, high of heart and master of our souls."

Today we have forgotten all other "isms." In our vocabulary there is but one—we stand for Americanism as the first line of defense and the American way of life.

We are interested not only in keeping America out of war, but in keeping war out of the world.

UNPREPAREDNESS

There is one lesson above all others that we have learned from the second world war: America is neither prepared to defend itself nor to wage war. We might as well be frank; it is best to face the facts. It can serve no good purpose to find fault for the state of unpreparedness. Nothing can result from criticizing political parties or administrations for unpreparedness. We are all responsible.

I have always stood for adequate national defense. I have voted for all appropriations through the years for the Army, the Navy, and the Air Corps.

There is no occasion for hysteria. We are not actually at war. We should be calm, but at the same time we should be resolute. We must arm, not for offense but for defense. Our national defense, however, is not as bad as some have pictured it. On the other hand, it is not as good as it should be. It must be strengthened. Now is the time. We are better prepared than we were a year ago. We are much stronger than we were 10 years ago. We have a stronger Army, we have a better Air Corps and I think we have the very best Navy in all of the world. There is not much comfort, however, from these facts, for if we are lulled into a state of ignorance or of false security, national suicide will result.

PREPAREDNESS

Preparedness is as old as the Government itself. In his fifth annual message to Congress at Philadelphia on December 3, 1793, George Washington said:

"If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, it must be known that at all times we are ready for war."

I am not an alarmist; I am not a belligerent, but I believe that preparedness is necessary to preserve and to promote peace.

Let us review the past 20 years. When the World War ended we had the most powerful Army in the history of the world. Our Army numbered 5,000,000 men, fully trained, and almost one-half of them were battle-seasoned troops. Our Navy was the most powerful on the high seas. Our industry was geared to wartime production. The armistice brought victory; and with victory the thoughts of the victor turned to peace. There was no enemy capable of marching against us. The Army was demobilized, and we gave away enormous quantities of important supplies and munitions. Industry undertook to adjust itself to peacetime production. Then came the Washington Arms Conference. It was noble in conception, but it was deadly in its results. We sank American battleships; we destroyed those under construction. Our Navy dropped from first to second place.

Our Army slipped from first place down to eighteenth place among the nations, smaller even than that of little Greece. There was clamor on all sides for subsidies, for gratuities, for relief, for unemployment. The lobbies of Congress were infested by men and women who urged that all Army and Navy appropriations be further reduced. The battle cry in 1917 was a noble one. After the armistice we turned aside from high resolution and noble endeavor and we wandered far into the wilderness of selfishness. We substituted the dollar for sacrifice; we were bent on ease and security. He who dances must pay the piper. The day of reckoning is come.

Life is a contest and a conquest. If there is to be liberty, there must always be preparedness. We now know that the time is come to pay the piper. Congress has appropriated $5,000,000,000 in recent weeks to enlarge and strengthen our Army, to equip from five hundred thousand to a million men with mechanized and modernized tanks, machine guns, antiaircraft guns; to modernize our Navy and to make our air forces better than the best.

All must do their part. There must be military training. We are coming to compulsory military training. The volunteer system has failed. Volunteers mean that the finest of our youth respond, as a general rule, to the call of country. But if there is to be the compulsory military training of our youth; if there is to be the conscription on land and sea and air, there must be the conscription of wealth and labor. We are determined that no war millionaires shall result from the sacrifices of war or of preparedness. If men are conscripted to die for their country, they should be conscripted to work for their country.

INDUSTRY

The industrial organizations and resources of the United States are unsurpassed. We recall the World War accomplishments. In 1917, 55 planes were being produced per year. In 12 months the annual production was increased from 55 to 22,000 planes. There has been marvelous expansion in industrial plants in America since 1918. If in 1918 we could produce 22,000 planes in a year, in 1941 we can produce 100,000 planes a year. If America can build 2,973,775 automobiles and 754,197 trucks annually as in 1939 it can build, if necessary, 500,000 planes per year.

Germany is producing 4,000 planes a month. Within the next 3 months Germany will be producing 72,000 planes a year. Is there any patriotic American who will rise in his place and say that with our vast industrial plants, with our raw materials, and with our resources, we cannot surpass Germany in the production of planes, just as we surpass Germany and all other countries combined in the manufacture of automobiles?

No country in this or in any other age has ever equaled or can equal the United States in the production of machines. Our industrial plants far outstrip those of Germany or any other country. Red tape should be eliminated; labor restrictions should be removed. The genius of American organization and the possibilities of American industry should be utilized. The administration has called into service the leading industrialists of the country. They should be given a free hand.

STRIKES

The laborer is worthy of his hire. I always sympathize with those who toil, but France and England owe much of their unpreparedness to the regimentation of labor and to a socialistic endeavor to help the laboring man by regimenting wages and hours. I can never forget that the sit-down strike originated in France. I can never forget that when Germany was working night and day France embarked upon a socialistic dream. Today England and France are paying the penalty for clinging to the wage and hour law. They ignored the truth that labor's only road to plenty lies in increased productivity. As we prepare, as we manufacture tanks and airplanes, as we build guns and construct battleships, there must be no strikes in our industrial plants. Whatever may be said respecting wages and hours and similar legislation in times of peace, all of which I have opposed consistently, they should now be suspended or repealed for the duration of the second world war. They should not hinder or delay as we prepare to defend our country.

ENEMIES

Democracy has its enemies within and they are more dangerous than the enemies without. There must be no sabotage in industry. Modern warfare is not being fought by tanks and airplanes alone. The "fifth column," the parachutists, and the Trojan horse have preceded the tanks and the flame throwers.

I advocated the creation of the Dies committee. I have sponsored it from the beginning; it has rendered a conspicuous service; it has located the "fifth columns"; it has found the Trojan horse; it has located subversive influences in our industrial plants; it has exposed undesirable aliens.

I say to all who do not honor the American flag and pay tribute to the Stars and Stripes that there is no place in this broad land of ours for the undesirable or subversive alien. In the future, as in the past, I shall advocate his prompt deportation.

Punishment for sabotage and for traitors and subversive activities must be swift and commensurate. Death only is fit for the traitors. It is far better for a few traitors to die promptly than for many patriots to be ultimately murdered. There is no time for compromise. We are either for our country or we are against it.

RELIEF

The Government has been most generous the past 7 years. All have been aided and helped. We have borrowed to give. A generous country that has helped those in distress now calls upon her sons and daughters to help her. In war-torn nations in Europe, jewelry, coins, and iron of all descriptions are being laid upon the altars of the country. An opportunity will be given to all able-bodied men and women to work in the preparedness program. The opportunity is here for all to show their gratitude. Relief was to enable people to help themselves—it was in an emergency; it was to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked. It is now time for all to support their country; it is time for all to give to country rather than ask country to give to us. Today the beneficiaries of the social programs of the liberal government of France are the most pitiable sufferers. In free France the laborer was free, but in a subjugated France, the laborer and the poor man will be enslaved. If one class above another in the United States is more interested in freedom and liberty, it is the laborer.

RESPONSIBILITIES

In the soft and easy security of the past 20 years, we have been speaking too much of our rights, and we have thought too little of our obligations. We have neglected our duties; we have overlooked our responsibilities. It is now high time for us to discharge our responsibilities as citizens of the greatest of all Republics.

COSTS

The costs of preparedness will be high. Congress has just passed a defense tax bill. It is the largest single tax bill ever passed in peacetimes. It taxes largely those who are already taxed but the citizen who is able is willing to pay taxes for his defense; he is determined that the costs of his defense shall not be passed on to his descendants. They will have to defend in their own day.

Thoughtful citizens know that economic preparedness is essential to military preparedness; they know that borrowing must cease; they know that the United States should place her financial house in order. No one can foresee the perils of tomorrow. No one can tell what a day will bring forth. All know, however, that credit is essential both in preparedness and in war. If we exhaust our credit in peace, all of our preparedness will be in vain. No appropriation should be made in excess of the income of the Government.

WAR AND MEN

Some have thoughtlessly advocated a declaration of war. I oppose engaging in a foreign war. I will vote for billions for defense, but I will not vote to send a single youth to fight in a foreign war. I say again, as I said in the beginning, that it is time for clear thinking. There is not the semblance of the justification for our entering the present second world war that there was in 1917. In the first place, we are not prepared to defend, much less to attack. We are not prepared to declare or wage war. For my part I agree with the sentiment of Theodore Roosevelt: "It is better to speak softly and carry a big stick." It is no time to speak loudly and to carry an empty gun.

My central thought today is preparedness. To be prepared is to prevent attack; to be unprepared is to invite attack. After all, our Army, our Navy, and our Air Force are the police forces of the Nation, just as police protect towns and cities. Weapons are the only language that Stalin, Hitler, and Mussolini can understand; they have no regard for ideals, and they have only contempt for democracy. They cannot hear the groans of the dead and dying; they can only hear the whirring noises of airplanes, they can only see the advance of flaming tanks, and they can only understand the thunders of mighty battleships.

Our forefathers came to these shores to escape the intermittent wars that have characterized Europe for a thousand years. They came to America to avoid the old hatreds and the old quarrels of Europe. We must arm; we must be prepared; we must escape the horrors of war. At the same time, if we are attacked we must be prepared to defend not only the United States but the Western Hemisphere and maintain battleships in the two oceans surrounding it.

The United States must be prepared to salvage civilization following the world war. Some day America's opportunity for peace will come. Some day America can save civilization from destruction as a result of the second world war. Only America will be strong enough to act as a mediator.

Men after all are the determining factors in war. Machines cannot think. Guns without men who love their country and without men who believe that their country is worth saving, are not sufficient. Men are more essential than guns, tanks, or airplanes. In the last analysis, there can be no substitute for trained and disciplined men in war as in peace.

I said in the beginning that we lived in the darkest hour of civilization, but it is always darkest just before the dawn. We must banish pessimism; we must face our tasks with confidence and with determination. There will be rough sailing. The need of the hour is men who, notwithstanding rough waters, will bring their ships and their cargoes into safe ports. They will make mistakes, but they will serve; they will navigate both large and small ships, but they will know the hardship and the sacrifice; they will dare and they will risk on the seven seas. The supreme need in preparedness is men of tough fiber.

Walter Scott, in Old Mortality, tells of one who spent all of his days and years in going from graveyard to graveyard throughout Scotland with his mallet and chisel, deepening the inscriptions on the tombs of her great. The names were being erased by the erosions of time. His purpose was to make legible the worthy names so that the youth might read and emulate their deeds of heroism.

Today let us think deeply, let us search profoundly our souls so that we may emulate the heroic deeds of the good and great of our country. May we never forget the advice of George Washington:

"If to please the people we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterward defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hands of God."

UNITY

Above all, it is time for unity and cooperation. We must all join hands for the defense and for the progress of the Republic.

A father and mother, with their darling boy, walking through the golden wheat fields of southern Canada on a beautiful evening just at sunset in the harvest time were so entranced by the marvelous view of the ripening and golden wheat and the wonderful golden glow of the evening that father and mother did not observe their little child had disappeared. A search was immediately instituted. All night long the father, mother, and neighbors walked and searched through the wheat fields. The next day the search was continued. Through the second night the vigil went on. Finally on the morning of the third day a neighbor suggested that all join hands and thus walk from one end of the field to the other. With hands joined the search was continued. Finally one of the searchers stumbled upon an object. Closer view revealed the glassy eyes and the pallid face of the dead boy. The searcher handed the little child to his parents, whereupon the father exclaimed, "Why did we not join hands before?"

In France, in devastated cities and in destroyed countryside, dejected and discouraged patriots, industrialists, and laborers, statesmen and citizens, rich and poor, high and low, are now exclaiming, "Why did we not prepare before? Why did we not join hands before to prepare?"

Today England, our mother country, the bankers and the workers, the captains of industry and the laborers have their backs to the wall. I can hear them say over and over again, "Why did we not all join hands to prepare the defense of the noblest and oldest of all democracies?"

It is now time, in the land of the free and the home of the brave, for all, the rich and the poor, the young and the old, to join hands to prepare to defend with their lives and to promote with their service the greatest and the best country in all of the world. May it always be said of us as Marvell said of Cromwell:

"He nothing common did, or mean
Upon that memorable scene."

Lest We Forget, Mr. Speaker, Lest We Forget!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, no government in the history of the world has ever accomplished so much for the uplift of mankind in the same length of time—indeed, over any period of time—as has the Government of the United States under the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

To appreciate the real significance of the fortunate conditions under which we in the United States live today, and to fully realize the extent to which this great President has made our land a better place in which to live—to live in peace and security—truly a God-send at this time when half the world is resounding with the thundering of cannon and the roar of bombs, it is necessary to turn the clock backward to March 4, 1933. That was the day—momentous for America—that Franklin Roosevelt took over the reins of a then stricken and tottering Government.

No President save possibly Abraham Lincoln ever was sworn into office under more threatening skies or a darker outlook for the future of his Nation than the new President faced that day. It is easy and convenient now when the sun of prosperity is high in the heavens—due to his foresight, courage, and administrative genius—for those hordes of paid claquers at the Republican convention in Philadelphia who haranged the delegates with chants of "We want Willkie" to black-out from their sight and memory recollections of the calamitous conditions that existed when he took office on the fateful 4th of March 7 years ago. But it is not playing the game the American way, it is not fair to that brave and noble man in the White House to do so, and I do not propose to allow anyone, unreminded, to do it.

BANKS STILL REMAINING OPEN WERE CLOSED FOR BENEFIT OF DEPOSITORS

Mr. Speaker, even as Mr. Roosevelt was riding down historic Pennsylvania Avenue—the tired, weary President Hoover at his side—on his way to the Capitol to take the oath of office, long lines of haggard, anxious-faced men and women might have been seen standing at the doors of the banks in every town, city, and hamlet throughout the United States. Many banks had indeed already failed. Before each timid, frightened depositor in the crowds about the banks still remaining open, was the specter of the loss of his life's savings, his all, the tragic fear that nothing would be left with which to feed his wife and children.

The late inimitable Will Rogers, America's all-time greatest, wisest, and tenderest humorist, referring to these people gathered before the banks, with that characteristic sly smile of his, whimsically declared:

You've got to hand it to this man Roosevelt. He sure is a mighty fast worker. He had only reached the Peace Monument on the way back to the White House, after being sworn in, when he closed every bank in America, every single one of them. And it's a good thing for the country he did work fast. If he had waited until he got back to the White House, the depositors would have beat him to it and closed the banks for him, and millions still in line, who hadn't had time to get their money out, would have lost every penny of their life's savings.

What Will Rogers said was only too true. Realizing that most of the banks still remaining open were in straitened circumstances and that very few banks, even if solvent, can withstand a sudden run of their depositors, the far-seeing President-to-be had made all necessary advance arrangements for the immediate, temporary closing of all banks to avoid a national catastrophe that was at his very heels as he stepped down from the inaugural stand on the front portico of the Capitol Building at Washington, D. C., on March 4, 1933. Treasury officials, at Roosevelt's behest, had in the meantime worked out a plan to go to the relief of the beleaguered banks, and while all could not be rescued—the hopelessly insolvent ones were never permitted to reopen—millions upon millions of depositors were, thanks to President Roosevelt, ultimately saved from ruin.

THE UNITED STATES WAS NEVER CLOSER TO A REVOLUTION

The shaky banks, however, were but one detail of the complete picture of despair that hovered like impending doom over America the day Franklin Delano Roosevelt was sworn in. Sixteen million people were out of work. Hundreds of thousands of hungry; yes, starving men and women marched through our streets to city halls, county institutions, and to the State capitals, demanding work and food. More than 75 percent of the plants and factories were closed, and those that remained open worked only 2 or 3 days a week. Those fortunate enough to get work were paid $1 a day, and thousands of women were glad to receive $3 a week. More than 50 percent of the stores were closed, thousands of manufacturing businesses were thrown into receivers' hands in bankruptcy. Insurance companies were insolvent. Homes were being foreclosed on everywhere throughout the land, tenants evicted. Robberies, burglaries, hold-ups, suicides, even murders, increased at an alarming rate. Angry mobs congregated in the big cities, smashed the windows of grocery, hardware, and clothing stores, raiding the interiors, carrying their loot home in triumph to their wives and children, who, hungry and cold, condoned their lawless acts as justifiable, and even heroic. Vagrants in large cities like Chicago, New York, St. Louis defied the police to arrest them, considering it would be a luxury to get into a warm station house where they knew that at least they would be fed, and not freeze to death. The police could not arrest half those that desired to be arrested, for the jails were filled to overflowing.

Sheriffs attempting to serve farmers with dispossession papers were met by groups of armed men, and ordered to leave the premises under threats of death. Municipalities were unable to pay their school teachers, classes were discontinued, children turned out on the streets. Destitute families living in huts on the dumps at the edge of cities were a common sight throughout the land. In many places court orders were ignored, or resisted. Discontent, resentment, chagrin over inability to obtain work of even the most menial kind turned into near anarchy. A pall of hopelessness and despair hung ominously over the entire Nation.

PRESIDENT HOOVER REFUSED TO RAISE A FINGER TO HELP

An attempt was made to appeal to President Hoover time and again. But his answer had been always the same, "Prosperity is just around the corner." But it was not prosperity, it was revolution that was just around the corner on March 4, 1933, the day Franklin Delano Roosevelt moved into the White House. The American people, the American voters, should take these facts into consideration. They should give their President due credit for the fact that he saved the Nation when it was on the very brink of revolution and disaster.

But those terrible days, reminiscent of nothing American but of the bread riots of the great capitals of Europe centuries ago, are no more. They marked the end of the trail of desolation and despair following the "old deal" administrations of Republicans Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover.

Soup kitchens and bread lines—long to be remembered as symbols of the Hoover administration—disappeared from the American picture as Franklin Roosevelt stepped into it. He had not resided in the White House very long before new and strange sights began to make their appearances in the poorer sections of large American cities. A truck would draw up before the most dilapidated row of tenement houses. Two or three men would leap out, each carrying a box on his shoulders, and disappear inside the worn and weather-beaten homes. I happened to be present on the occasion of one of these at first mysterious deliveries, and I saw first hand what each of those crates contained. I took careful note of each article, and can enumerate them now without, I am certain, having overlooked a single item: 2 dozen oranges, 2 dozen apples, 2 pounds raisins, 2 pounds prunes, 6 tins corned beef, 2 dozen eggs, 12 pounds flour, 5 pounds corn meal, 2 pounds oatmeal, 15 pounds potatoes, and beets and cabbages. That was for 4 persons, a mother and 3 children, and was to last 2 weeks. Milk was to come separately. There was no father in that particular home. The mother was ill; she had tried to get work, but after several efforts had been obliged to surrender from sheer weakness. I could not help but wonder what, in God's name, would have happened to this needy and deserving family if it had not been for Uncle Sam's new New Deal policy of seeing to it that no person in this rich Nation shall hereafter starve for the want of food or freeze for the lack of clothing, heat, and shelter.

I am afraid you and I, Mr. Speaker, and our colleagues here, do not know what the word "relief" really means. But the man out of work, who has had nothing to eat for as long as 3 days—he knows. And, make no mistake, there have been many such in this country, even rich and bountiful as it is.

And the mother, whose children nonchalantly ask for food, as if the cupboard were full of it, but it is empty—she knows.

O Mr. Speaker; shame on those wealthy heads of the power and utility and other great corporations whose salaries alone run from $25,000 to $450,000 a year; who have, from the very first, fought us and maligned us for voting for relief and other humane social-security legislation in the interests of men, women, and children and who, right at this very moment, are scheming and planning and plotting to strike down the man who has led us in this all-too-long-delayed effort to do something for the poor.

The irony of it all is that these great corporation heads and Wall Street speculators were themselves saved from disaster at the end of the Hoover reign by the increased prosperity resulting from the policies of the very man they seek now to destroy. Today they are making greater profits than even during the palmy days of 1928 and 1929. That the greed of these men who are already rich beyond the dreams of avarice knows absolutely no bounds is evidenced by their cries of anguish at being asked to pay but a fair share of taxation on their enormous profits toward the support of the President's just and reasonable social reforms, his new big preparedness program, and the always-necessary cost of government. This, in spite of the fact that the general rate of taxation in the United States is not within 50 percent of that of any other country in the world.

THERE ARE SOME WHO WILL NOT FORGET FRANKLIN ROOSEVELT

Mr. Speaker, I admit it is true that Mr. Roosevelt is unpopular, quite unpopular, in some quarters, especially in the very highest quarters, Mr. Speaker. Corrupt, greedy, rich, and powerful big business does not want him. Wall Street financiers do not want him. And the power interests especially do not want him, Mr. Speaker. They want to get him out of the White House so that they may move their Mr. Willkie in.

But not everyone, not quite everyone, I am glad to say, Mr. Speaker, is against Franklin Roosevelt. For instance, it is difficult to imagine that poor widow and the multitude of other similarly afflicted—the aged, the destitute, all without hope then and knowing not which way to turn, who had plenty of reason to fall to their knees and thank God for their very real friend Franklin Roosevelt and his New Deal—it is difficult, very difficult, I repeat, to imagine that all these, Mr. Speaker, recalling now as they must that they were rescued at the very edge of the precipice of destruction, will be able very vigorously, very enthusiastically, to take up the chant, "We want Willkie."

Adequate National Defense Calls for Universal Educational Preparation

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, America is now embarking upon a vast program of national defense. We have heard it said time after time that this great rich country of ours has never properly given itself over to the problem of adequate preparedness. It is pointed out from our history that every war which we have ever entered upon has found this Nation unprepared. But apparently at this moment the Nation is thoroughly aroused and determined to see that it can never again be said we are unprepared. How much better it is to be prepared and not need it—which is our hope—than to need preparation and not have it. No doubt it has been the startling suddenness and the overwhelming completeness with which democratic and free peoples have crumbled before a war machine in recent weeks that has keyed our Nation up to its present determination. This is not to be a mere paper program of defense for us but the real thing.

What ought to be the nature of this total national preparedness for our country? Because war today is fought by machines and relatively fewer men, but men of a different and more technical training, it may be answered briefly that our first-line defense should consist of a sufficient number of highly trained men to handle an adequate supply of every type of machine needed in modern warfare. It is plainly evident that former equipment, the best and standard for its day, is now obsolete. We must change both the type of equipment and manner of training for our men.

I recall that when I went before the Appropriations subcommittee on the military appropriation bill on February 18, 1938, that there were before the committee just ahead of me a Congressman from Pennsylvania who pled for motorization of our artillery, and also a Congressman from Springfield, Mass., who put in a plea for the Garand semiautomatic rifle. When my turn came, before putting in my plea for Fort Huachuca and for other defenses along our border, and for additional funds for C. M. T. C., I joined my plea with the colleagues who preceded me for motorization of our artillery and for a very generous appropriation for the new rifle. It makes the Springfield rifle as antiquated now as the Springfield did the flintlock rifles of Revolutionary days. At that time it was plainly evident that motorization, mechanization, and the most modern equipment would be necessary in any adequate defense scheme. I merely mention this because it occurred before the outbreak of the present World War. However, I do know that some of my colleagues, who have been here many years before I came, have worked strenuously for modernizing of our military equipment.

THE TRADITIONAL IS OBSOLETE

Much that was traditional in our Army will have to go by the board. It is to be earnestly hoped that our military authorities will not be too conservative or so bound by tradition as to hesitate to make this readjustment. A sufficient number of men is still important, but not to the degree that it was in the first World War. Relatively fewer men and more machines is the order of the day, with a still larger number of men to serve those machines. If the German forces under Hitler have been built up in spite of the restrictions placed upon Germany's permitted army, it must be that a comparatively few men were trained by him openly and directly for military service, and a vast majority of men were trained secretly and indirectly, but no less effectively, to play a basic part in the functioning of that war machine as it functions today. Perhaps America should take note of one part of that procedure.

Since wars of the present and future will be wars of machines, one essential step will be to build and provide all necessary machines. We should have no trouble in doing this. America has always been a Nation of inventors and mechanics and our people are outstanding in the production and use of machinery. It may be that we gained that preeminence in peace, but we ought to be able to hold that preeminence in war or in preparation for war. No nation has the facilities for manufacture of every kind of machine that we have. In fact the major part of the world's productive capacity in machine tools and in machines is in this country. We can outstrip the world in mass production. Regrettable as it is that our peace-loving Nation must dedicate so much of its wealth and energy to such production, we ought to enter into it with no misgivings as to our capability or as to the ultimate outcome. Surely the men who have put us in the lead in the manufacture of automobiles, airplanes, and tractors and all other power machinery can also put us in the lead in regard to war machinery, both as to quantity and quality. Of course, we shall increase our plants and the number of workers in them.

MEN ARE MORE IMPORTANT THAN MACHINES

The question of furnishing men to man these machines and to service them is not second to the building and furnishing the machines themselves, for we have not yet been able to make monsters of steel which will fight our battles for us without a human crew. In addition to highly trained and expert men to operate these machines and a much larger number of equally trained men to service these machines, we must have a still larger number of highly trained technicians to manufacture these machines in a continuous quantity production. All of which means as high a degree of mechanical training for young men, with a sufficiently thorough scientific background for each of them, as our schools and other training agencies can give.

We hear talk these days about universal training. Sometimes we speak of universal compulsory training and still again we hear mentioned universal compulsory military training. All of these suggestions have to do with our plan for national defense. I am not competent to speak on all of these, but as a school man of years of experience, I would like to speak on a part of this program. While universal compulsory military training would be new to our people, universal compulsory educational training is not new. We have had it for a number of years to a sufficient degree to say that it is a characteristic of our educational system. All children are now compelled to go to school and a certain minimum of instruction is required to be offered. Therefore, if adequate national defense seems to require it, we might resort to compulsory mechanical or vocational training as a part of our educational plan without breaking with any accepted American ways.

THE NEWLY NEEDED TRAINING IS POSSIBLE

Difficult as it would be to give scientific, mathematical, mechanical training, say to all young men, it would not be as difficult as some fields of instruction which we have attempted to make universal. And if our very safety as a nation depends on this type of universal training, I believe it could be carried on with remarkable success, partly in our present schools and partly in factories. I am thinking of no new educational agency but an intensified use of what we now have. Of course, not all individuals have the same ability to acquire scientific information or develop manual skill. Therefore, they could not be all trained to the same degree of proficiency. However, educators have devised fairly accurate testing means to determine beforehand mechanical aptitude and also later the acquired skills, and thus the degree of fitness for defense of each young defender, and some fairly accurate classification can now be made. Since ours must employ a selective plan by which the most expert are used to man the war machines, the less expert to service those same machines, and the still less expert to build those machines, it would seem that every young man could receive some degree of this mechanical, vocational education with benefit to himself and to the general welfare and safety of his country.

I can see no objection to some such general plan of compulsory, mechanical, educational training, universally applied in this country to whatever degree the individual may be capable of receiving it. A passenger on board an ocean liner might not be able to read the compass, or fuel the engine, or plot the course for the vessel, but at least he might be able to put a life belt on himself or on a fellow passenger. Safety requires him to know a few things and be able to do them. If he knew how to lower the lifeboats, so much the better. However, even if it were ideal and possible for our training system to take every young man and give him all the scientific training of which he is capable, and require that this be done in the interests of national defense, we would still be far from our desired goal.

TRAINING OF MIND AND HAND IS NOT ENOUGH

What else would be needed? We need, in addition to this scientific training, a cultivation of heart and spirit which will make these defenders of our land not only the best fighting men in the world but the best citizens in the world. Before a man can be a good soldier he must be a good citizen. The type of training I have in mind now cannot be made compulsory, but it can and should be made universal.

Pericles in ancient Athens explained that the Athenians were better soldiers than the Spartans because the Athenians had a city worth fighting for, and appreciating that truth they were willing to live and to die for it. If we could engender that same spirit in our defenders, added to their efficient scientific training, it would make their preparation complete and their power irresistible. This is the more difficult part of the training of an American soldier.

Flag saluting and formal study of the Constitution are important, but alone will not suffice. The object here is to appeal to the emotion and fix a loyalty and affection upon our country and its institutions so that every defender will feel it worth while to spend himself in its defense. Such a loyalty can be inspired and grounded upon an intimate knowledge of American history, for surely no nation in the world has had a more unique, thrilling, and inspiring past than has our own country.

In the training of young men in mechanical knowledge and skill the process is canceling the difference between the mind of the teacher and the mind of the student, or between the high skill of the hands of one and the low skill of the hands of the other. But in engendering true loyalty and patriotism it must be a canceling of the difference between two spirits—the spirit of our greatest teachers and writers and the emotional spirit of our young defenders. Surely our religious leaders, our social-science teachers, our best statesmen can tell us how this final and higher type of preparation may be had.

As a nation, then, we are embarking upon the most extensive and thoroughgoing programs of national defense ever planned within the realm of probable reality. It is true our leaders of thought have heretofore conceived and from time to time suggested ideal and thorough plans for adequate national preparedness, but—like all human planning—there has heretofore been a wide gulf between conception and realization. In this very critical period we must eliminate that gulf of difference between plan and accomplishment. The very seriousness of our present situation demands our very best planning for defense and our highest possible average of attainment of defense objectives. Can we today surpass all previous plans and efforts at adequate national defense? We know we can. Let us not "sell America short" even by doubts or in our thoughts.

Republican National Convention

OF

HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. Herbert Hoover at the Republican National Convention on June 25, 1940:

Ladies and gentlemen of the Republican National Convention, we are here faced with the task of saving America for free men. Two-thirds of the world has become the stamping ground of militant despotisms. Almost everywhere in the Old World the light of liberty for which men have struggled and died has gone into a long night. Men and nations have lost their moral and spiritual moorings. Even in America our system of liberty has been weakened. We are divided in mind and fearful. And confusion in liberal nations is made worse by the spread of incompetence in government. The whole world is in confusion.

The world has survived confusion before. And men have grown in soul and safety. But how? Because some organizations of men have stood solid. They stood not because they knew the solutions to all these confusions, not even because they have the power to find solution. They stood firm and they held the light of civilization—until the furies passed, because they held to certain positive principles of life, of morals, of spiritual values.

In a time of confusion and crisis the action of a Republican convention 80 years ago saved this Nation for free men. And free men of two generations built it into unparalleled greatness.

Upon this party again rests the responsibility for the freedom and prosperity of men for the next two generations. The Republican Party again accepts that responsibility here and now.

Our party is not concerned here with petty or factional issues or minor criticisms.

This crisis in America is not to be obscured by any events abroad. We have witnessed a steady sapping of our system of liberty and the mismanagement of government for the last 7 years. During all this time we have had 10,000,000 chronically unemployed, 18,000,000 of our fellow Americans have been continuously on relief. Agriculture has been held afloat by Government subsidies. Unending deficits and huge increases in debt threaten the financial stability of the Government. Our industry and business are hesitant and are afraid. In this decade, we have actually decreased in national income and national wealth for the first time in 150 years. America has gone backward. The human consequence is that one-third of our people are frozen to poverty.

This condition is not an inheritance from the inevitable world depression which followed the last World War. It is the result of incompetence in Government. We were on the way to recovery in 1932. Every other democracy had recovered from that depression long before the outbreak of this war.

Now, economically weakened for the past 7 years, we are faced with mismanaged national defense.

And this new World War is no sudden blow. It comes from the destruction of systems of liberty in the Old World. Since the last World War over a billion human beings in Europe and Asia have been shaken by revolutions. The insidious poisons of men's minds from this caldron sweep over us.

And now with this war one liberty-loving country after another has been submerged. Our indignation, our sympathies, and our fears are desperately involved in their heroic struggles for freedom.

Whatever the outcome of this world cataclysm, whatever the solution of our domestic crisis, the pattern of this world will not again be the same. Dictatorships, totalitarian economics, and militarism will long continue over a large part of the earth. New economic and political forces will be loosened upon the world.

PART II. OUR TASKS

To be prepared, we must at once undertake seven stern tasks.

First. We must restore and revitalize liberty in America.

Second. We must restore and rebuild morals in government.

Third. We must restore decent life and living to one-third of our farmers and workers, who have been chronically submerged by the New Deal.

Fourth. We must restore competence to government.

Fifth. We must prepare this Nation to defend the Western Hemisphere.

Sixth. We must develop and maintain foreign policies that keep us out of these wars unless we are attacked. We should facilitate all nations fighting for their freedom in procuring materials and munitions, but subject to definite limitations which keep us out of war.

Seventh. We must recall our people from the flabbiness of the New Deal. We must reestablish stamina, character, and ideals. We must regenerate hope and confidence in America.

PART III. WEAKENING THE STRUCTURE OF LIBERTY

Let us first examine the weakening of the structure of liberty in the United States. That is but part of a far larger war in the world today than a war of tanks and airplanes. It is even more dangerous to America. This is a war of hostile ideas, philosophies, and systems of government. There are no neutrals in that war. That is where we have to fight.

We have to fight not only "fifth columns" and insidious poisons of men's minds, but we have to fight those failures of government which drive democracies upon the rocks.

The battle for liberty has been about lost in the Old World. But right ideas never die. Nevertheless, from this seething cauldron of revolutions and wars of ideas there are many lessons for us.

Let me recite a little history.

For more than a century and a half before the war of 1914 the whole continent of Europe up to the Russian border had been struggling upward toward liberty. These people in 20 races had attained a large degree of free government—free speech, free worship, orderly justice, and free enterprise. After that war, liberty and peace seemed assured to the world.

And then in less than 20 years hundreds of millions of these people surrendered freedom for bondage under totalitarian government. This abandonment of liberty has been the most gigantic revolution in history.

Two years ago I was the invited guest of some 12 European countries. That gave to me a unique opportunity to inquire into some things that might help the American people.

I wanted to know more of what ideas and pressures had plunged these nations into dictatorships.

There will flash into your minds that it was communism, fascism, or nazi-ism. That is not what I refer to. They were the effect. I was seeking the cause. Liberty had been weakened long before the dictators rose under those banners. There was a long poignant drama before the last act in this gigantic tragedy of civilization.

There were many disintegrating forces. But also in every single case before the rise of dictatorships there had been a period dominated by economic planners. Each of these nations had an era under starry-eyed men who believed that they could plan and force the economic life of the people. They believed that was the way to correct abuse or to meet emergencies in systems of free enterprise. They exalted the state as the solvent of all economic problems.

These men thought they were liberals. But they also thought they could have economic dictatorship by bureaucracy and at the same time preserve free speech, orderly justice, and free government. They can be called the totalitarian liberals. They were the spiritual fathers of the New Deal.

These men were not Communists or Fascists. But they mixed these ideas into free systems. It is true that Communists and Fascists were round about. They formed popular fronts and gave the applause.

These so-called liberals shifted the relation of government to free enterprise from that of umpire to controller. Directly or indirectly they politically controlled credit, prices, and production of industry, farmer, and labor. They devalued, pump-primed, and inflated. They controlled private business by government competition, by regulation and by taxes. They met every failure with demands for more and more power of control. And they employed that handmaiden of power, named "Gimme a Billion, Quick."

These leaders ignored the fact that the driving power of free economic life is the initiative and enterprise of men.

When it was too late they discovered that every time they stretched the arm of government into private enterprise, except to correct abuse, then, somehow, somewhere, men's minds and judgments became confused. At once men became hesitant and fearful. Initiative slackened, production in industry slowed down.

Then came chronic unemployment and frantic Government spending in effort to support the unemployed. Government debts mounted. And finally government credit was undermined. Out of the miseries of their people there grew pressure groups—business, labor, farmers—demanding relief or special privilege. Class hate poisoned cooperation.

Does this sound unfamiliar to you?

It was all these confusions which rang down the curtain upon liberty. Frustrated and despairing, these hundreds of millions of people voluntarily voted the powers of government to the man on horseback as the only way out. They did it in the hope of preserving themselves from want and poverty. They did it in hope of preserving their national independence.

And that blight of totalitarian liberalism even spread to Great Britain in 1929. But that liberty-loving people overthrew it in 1931. The British fully recovered prosperity in 1934. The blight swept over France in 1936 under Premier Blum, and the French attempted to escape collapse by voting his government out in 1938. But their morale and their productive life was so injured that they are paying in blood, in tears, and defeat.

Need I carry this analogy further?

This is a battle which Americans had better not lose.

Our totalitarian liberals

We have now had 7 years of experience with our own totalitarian liberals. Battling against all the natural forces of recovery they succeeded in stabilizing depression.

What is more, in forcing their economic measures upon us they have given even deeper wounds to liberty. Their headlines in history would be: Vast Powers to President, Vast Extension of Bureaucracy, Supreme Court Decides Against New Deal, Attack on Supreme Court, Court Loaded With Totalitarian Liberals, Congress Surrenders Power of Purse by Blank Checks to President, Will of Legislators Weakened by Patronage and Political Pie, Attacks on Business, Stirring Class Hate, Pressure Groups Stimulated, Men's Rights Disregarded by Boards and Investigations, Resentment at Free Opposition, Attempt To Discredit Free Press.

Certainly the New Deal has not been allergic to power. And now fed fat on power, they demand a third term for Mr. Roosevelt. That is not a mere violation of tradition. It is a violation of a fundamental restraint on power in this Republic.

But we Republicans would welcome Mr. Roosevelt as a candidate. For this battle must be fought out under the guns of debate. And that debate will be done best with the man who is responsible for it.

PART IV. RESTORATION OF AMERICAN LIVING

One of our Republican tasks is to restore security of living and hope to those 40,000,000 Americans—farmers and workers—who are today plunged into insecurity or destitution. Restoration of jobs to 10,000,000 unemployed is the first step to lift this mass of poverty. It is the first step to relief of farmers. It is the first step to balancing our Budget. It is the first step to preparedness.

Unemployment is not a chronic disease of a free system. It is a disease of governmental interference with that system. These jobs can be restored alone by the restoration of the vitality of free enterprise.

Let me say at once I am not interested in free enterprise because it is a property system. I am interested in it because intellectual and spiritual liberty can be sustained only by economic liberty. They are indissolubly bound in a common fate. I am interested in free enterprise because it is the one dynamic force by which we can restore productive jobs to our people.

It was dynamic individual enterprise which raised the country from insignificance to greatness. It was not government that put these prairies under the plow. It was not government that flung these railways across a continent. It was not government that built these great factories or cities. It was not government that brought forth these great inventions. It was not government that builded these millions of churches, or added this wealth of music, art, and literature.

Is this Nation to be a great national workshop or a vast eleemosynary institution? We cannot exist two-thirds workers and one-third dependents.

It is easy to prove that the people are fearful of the New Deal. The evidence of their fears and loss of confidence is when they postpone the building of homes. It shows when they fail to improve and construct factories to produce the new goods to which science and invention beckon our energies. Let me give you just one figure.

The New Deal points with pride to its housing schemes. In the 7 years before the New Deal, and with no subsidies a free America built 3,400,000 new family units of housing. A part of those years were depression years. During the whole New Deal with all its subsidies, America has built 1,700,000 new units. They no doubt have some more "on order."

There can be a free economy in America which releases the productive energies of men. Or there can be a dictated economy. These cannot be mixed. A free economy means sweat, turmoil, competition—hard at times if you choose. It means ever-new wrongs that must be righted, but it means also resistless growth and resistless progress.

The restoration of confidence does not require exploitation or monopoly. A free people can no more tolerate private economic power without checks and balances than we can tolerate political power without balances and checks. But in effecting great reforms there is a dividing line. Upon the right of this line is cure of abuse and solution of marginal problems. On the left of it is dictation and tyranny and discouragement of production. We must now reform the reforms.

A confident, alert, alive, and free people can quickly repair losses, repay debts, and bury mistakes.

In the meantime while we are getting our economic machine back to work we must care for those who suffer. It was a Republican administration in 1930 that first announced we cannot allow Americans to go hungry and cold from no fault of their own. We organized and prevented it. It was a Republican administration which first started relief for farmers.

But wholesale relief cannot go on forever. No government can carry this deficit indefinitely. We must restore these people to self-support before the money fails. These people want to work and to produce. The Nation needs their work. They want their self-respect restored through productive jobs.

That can come only through a change of administration.

PART V. MORALS IN GOVERNMENT

And that brings me to restoration of morals in government.

Does anyone in the United States doubt that the New Deal has built up the most gigantic political machine to control the vote ever known in this country?

What of the abundantly proved misuse of relief for politics?

What of this shady substitution of political patronage for the merit system?

What of this vicious building of city machines through handing them gigantic Federal funds to expend?

What of the use of taxpayers' money for partisan propaganda?

The whole business stank to an extent that the Jeffersonian Democrats joined with the Republicans in Congress in passing new laws trying to stop this political corruption.

The effect of the new law on the New Deal has probably been to increase the use of the telephone instead of the typewriter.

Today there are three or four hundred thousand New Deal political office-holders who are the officers over an army of 10,000,000 voters who receive Government benefits. A modern explanation of this New Deal method would be that elections have been taken into protective custody.

There is no time tonight to go into the whole field of intellectual and financial morals of the New Deal. They will be amplified in this campaign.

At the end of this debate we ought to have an election, not an auction.

Is all this liberalism? Liberals fought these things for centuries.

Does not the citizen lose faith in moral standards when he sees such Government dealings?

There can be no double standard of morals in a republic. For ideals must be served with clean hands.

PART VI. COMPETENCE IN GOVERNMENT

Let us for a moment explore the question of competence in government, as distinguished from philosophy and morals.

There can be monstrosities in broad policies of government beyond those that merely cost money. They can jeopardize the Republic. I may mention a few samples. You will have others.

Competent men

My first comment is that competence in government is not alone laws and policies. It is the capable administration of them. That means the quality and experience of the men and women doing the job. Many a good objective has gone wrong up that alley.

For 50 years the American people have fought to dig out the spoils system. Our people built a great dike of competence through nonpolitical selection by merit. At one time 80 percent of Federal servants were employed that way. Today one-half of its officials have never passed a merit examination. That is, however, a minor part of the subject. I cannot discuss its major aspects because I do not wish to deal in personalities.

Fiscal policies

My second example of the consequences of incompetence in government relates to continued deficits and mounting national debt in peacetime. It is a dull subject. And like any chronic disease we "sort of get used to it." Deficits, debts, inflations, and their spawn of managed currency have been the curse of the earth ever since the last war. They are inscribed on the tombstones of every fallen democracy.

We are still alive and therefore I make two mild suggestions. These deficits are partly the natural results of pressures that arise from stabilized depression.

Therefore I suggest that we release national energies that make productive jobs.

Thereby we would restore the national income from the present 70 billions to the 100 billions it ought to be today. Thereby the revenues of the Government would increase automatically. Thereby the billions of dollars for relief would decrease automatically.

These deficits are partly due to men who, no matter what they say, show no comprehension that the money which they spend comes from the sweat of people who toil and produce. Now, the ordinary peacetime expenses of the Government have increased from about 4,000,000,000 under Republicans to nine billions under the abundant life. My other suggestion is that somehow, somewhere, we might pare a little off the abundance without hurting anybody but officeholders. But these men cannot stop spending. It is in their blood. And it is part of the new economics.

Our national debt is now long past the danger sign and its speed is increasing. It already weakens our national defense.

Mr. Roosevelt gaily dismisses his fantastic national debt by the idea that Americans do not owe it, because we owe it to Americans. That idea is one source of the intellectual depression today.

You and your grocer are both Americans. You might ask your grocer if he would not concede the same idea. The fact is this debt represents the self denial of those who have toiled and saved. They have a large part of their savings in that debt. Their 125,000,000 insurance policies, and their 30 millions savings and bank accounts are in it. Our children will have to pay it. And they will pay it with toil and bitterness toward our generation. They will be working to pay for the follies of the New Deal instead of their own living.

And in another direction these deficits and debts are becoming the explosives which will destroy the whole of our social reforms. During these 8 years the New Deal has given hourly advertising to their advances in the social field. There have been advances. We sorely needed them. We always will need them. Republicans builded them over years. We have no quarrel with the principle of protection for labor, the farmers, the old, and the destitute. Our quarrel is with method and incompetence in administration. But the torpedo prepared for these services is that the Nation is not allowed to produce enough goods and wealth to foot the bill. They cannot be long paid by the magic of borrowed money. Unless the whole direction of this Government is changed these humanitarian measures will go into the New Deal embroidered wastebasket called bankruptcy.

Currency

My third sample of the higher incompetence is the purchase of three-quarters of the whole world's gold supply. We bought it by giving foreigners our commodities and our investments. We have buried nineteen billions mostly in a hole at Fort Knox.

The foreigners got our property at depression prices. We paid a high price for this metal.

You have often been reminded of the legend of King Midas. Today that legend bears more careful examination. Midas also had the starry-eyed notion that he could benefit the kingdom if he had the power to turn his commodities into gold. The gods gave him the power. And when he finished he had a great pile of gold but no commodities. Then he assembled another commission for advice. The God Bacchus advised him to jump in a certain river. The legend says he came out with donkey's ears.

Even Midas did not undertake to operate on silver. He left that to the New Deal.

Unless we quickly restore the vitality of this pile of dead gold, this Nation will face a loss of the whole nineteen billion of it. We should start by putting it in circulation at home. We should start putting it in circulation abroad by swapping it for useful metals which we do not ourselves produce. We would far better have many years' stock of manganese, nickel, tungsten, and tin than the so-called precious metals. These we may need for national defense.

Preparedness

There are other major incompetences in Government which I could well discuss. There are agriculture and relief. But tonight my last example is national defense, for this incompetence strikes at our national safety.

Mr. Roosevelt recently broadcast an alibi that preparedness had been neglected by Republican administrations.

In the 6 years of peaceful world outlook before the New Deal we had spent about six hundred and eighty million a year on our military services. As a matter of fact, Mr. Roosevelt considered we were spending too much on it. He supported the Democratic platform in 1932 which implied that—and other things. And in 1934 he drasticaly reduced our defense to five hundred and fifty million, lopping of twenty millions from the Air Corps alone. And that year he reduced the number of commissioned naval graduates by one-half.

The interlude in conduct would seem to weaken the alibi.

Nazi-ism in Germany and our New Deal both rose to power in 1933. During these dangerous years our Republicans in Congress supported repeated increases in defense appropriations until they reached $1,400,000,000 a year. In these 6 years the New Deal has spent 6.2 billions.

What have we got for that enormous sum?

After all that expenditure we are told we are wholly unprepared to defend ourselves.

Our military leaders say to the Congress we are not organized for modern war; we do not have more than 75,000 fully equipped men.

Despite the growing menace in the air, and the expenditure of $350,000,000 on the air force in the last 6 years, General Arnold says not half a dozen of our Army planes are modern.

If we spend another 6.2 billions and get no more actual defense than from the last 6.2 billions nobody will be afraid of us.

Yet the lives of our children, the fate of our Nation, the future of our civilization are at stake. We cannot risk failure. This is another battle which America better not lose. If we are to achieve preparedness we must have a change in our national administration.

PART VII. AND WHAT OF OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS

The first line of our national defense is clear, realistic, and sober foreign policies directed to secure respect, good will, and peace.

To realize that ideal, during the whole 12 years of Republican Administration after the last armistice we strove to keep the face of civilization turned toward good will and peace. Americans saved Europe and Russia from collapse in famine. Americans led the advance on methods of settlement of international controversy by peaceful means. We led the world to reduce naval arms and lifted billions from the backs of all who toil. We led in constructive proposals for land disarmament. We set a moral standard in the world by refusal to recognize the murderous regime in Russia. We refused to issue a Communist license to undermine our institutions. We had organized a world conference to stabilize currencies and by removing trade barriers to give the world a chance. That conference was scuttled by Mr. Roosevelt. That killed the last hope of world cooperation.

This war

The immense task now is to shape our foreign policies to protect us from the conflagration in Europe and Asia.

There is no such thing as our isolation from wars which envelop two-thirds of all the people in the world. The Monroe Doctrine alone is the negation of that. There is no such thing as economic isolation. Those shocks jam through the doors of our farmers and our workers every hour. There is no such thing as moral isolation. These violations of treaties and agreements raise dangers to the reign of law everywhere. There is no such thing as intellectual and spiritual isolation. Emotions come through the air in every telegraphed and printed word.

From all this there are shifting dangers in which the Nation should have common council that we may have national unity. In a few days this convention will have chosen our national leader. The President will be able to secure from him the views of our party upon those transcendent questions.

Conference and agreement are the roads to a solid front to the world.

Today a thousand tragedies to mankind crash one after another. One heroic people after another has been submerged. Czechoslovakia, Poland, Finland, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and now France, who cradled our liberties. But the spirits of great races do not die. They will rise again.

We resent these aggressions. The brutality of it arouses our indignation. Their sufferings cry out to the sympathy of every decent man and woman.

But here and now America must summon reason to control emotion. The greatest quality of men in danger, second only to courage, is cool, deliberate action. That is equally the necessity in a nation. And idealism as never before must keep its feet on the ground of realism.

The first policy of calm realism is not to exaggerate our immediate dangers. Every whale that spouts is not a submarine. The 3,000 miles of ocean is still a protection. The air forces, tanks, and armies of Europe are useless to attack us unless they establish bases in the Western Hemisphere. To do that they must first pass our Navy. It can stop anything in sight now. In any event, this ocean and our magnificent Navy give time for sober preparation. But we have no time to waste.

We must be armed so that no foreign nation will entertain the dangerous thought of starting over these 3,000 miles of ocean. We must be so prepared that we can rely solely upon our own right arm.

We need a Navy powerful as never before. Rather than a vast accumulation of arms, we must have an industry tuned up to make war machines faster and better than any nation on earth. We need a trained personnel of key men in reserve. We have the resources, the genius, the industry to make us impregnable.

But preparedness is not only making armies and navies. It must be supported by a sound national finance, national economy, and a restored productivity of our people.

And before we can have preparedness we must have competent organization in Washington.

New Deal politics will never "make tyranny tremble." I suppose we might frighten tyrants by appointing another board to advise the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense.

The third of realistic policies bears upon supplies of materials and munitions to those nations who are fighting for their freedom. My belief is that we should facilitate them in every way subject to two limitations: First, that it involves no action which takes us to war; and second, that as liberty lives by law we must act within the law.

PART VIII: PEACE OR WAR

Today many of our citizens consciously or unconsciously are considering peace or war with the totalitarian governments.

The most vital realism in all our relations with the world today requires that we keep out of these wars unless the Western Hemisphere is attacked.

It is a solemn determination. One price of war is the lives of our sons and the poverty of our grandchildren. But we are here also considering the fate of our Nation and the fate of liberty in the world.

It is nonsense that we cannot defend freedom here even if the Old World fails. Our ancestors, with sparse population and resources for the first 50 years of this Republic sustained liberty here when most of the world was ruled by despots. We can do it again if we have to.

And the spirits of American boys buried in Flanders 22 years ago rise before us today to warn us that we can make war but we cannot assure liberty in the Old World.

The hope of mankind and the hope of civilization is that democracy survive on this continent. Those who advocate war should never forget one thing. The first necessity of any great war is to set up dictatorship. France and England were compelled to do so. But with our already weakened structure of liberty and the fabulous national debt we shall have, and the mania for power of the New Deal, we would be generations in restoring free men in America. We should be sacrificing the last sanctuary of liberty in the world in the belief that we are defending liberty.

Those who feel we should intervene in this war should take note of other realistic reasons why we should keep out. If we join, we shall in our own unpreparedness require 2 or 3 years to make ourselves effective. That will be too late. In the meantime we should require the whole energies of American industry to arm ourselves. For us to declare war would do the Allies more harm than good.

The final realism is that if we are to keep cool and not stimulate war, there must be an end to provocative speech by our officials. Expressions of indignation or regret do not require insults. The first responsibility of the President of the United States is to abate war, not to stimulate it. It is not the province of the President of the United States to create hate. Irresponsible talk in explosive times may bring danger. And we need remember that the day will come when we might be of service to humanity in dealing with these same men for peace.

And there is an infinite service that America can bring to the world. After this struggle we shall see hate sitting at the peace table. We might with our moral force and council abate its dread consequences. I know the famine, disease, and suffering that is yet to come with this war. With our economic strength and our compassion we can save millions of lives, give aid to reconstruction. We might inspire tolerance and hope again to the world.

And after the war, what then?

After this war our foreign trade will meet an impoverished Europe, reduced in its standards of living, and above all armed with totalitarian-directed exports and imports. All that points in three directions. American workers and farmers will require more protection than ever from imports. We shall need mobilize counter action on exports. We shall need develop self-sufficiency in our own industrial production. Under these impacts the Hull treaties will go to the heaven of forgotten issues.

I have said whatever the outcome of this war, whatever the solution of our domestic crisis, the form of this world will not be the same. We must meet great change. And we will meet with moral and spiritual degeneration in the world.

In time these world storms will blow themselves out. Perhaps it will be a long time. But the spirit of Luther, Goethe, Schiller, Mazzini, and Garibaldi still live, and here upon our soil the temple of liberty must stand that men may be inspired to return to its worship.

PART IX: THE REGENERATION OF AMERICA

Finally, the greatest task of all deals with the intangibles of national life. It is to stiffen the stamina and the morals of our people. It is to unify their ideals and lift their spirits.

Truly we have been following the suicide road for liberty that led to disaster in Europe. But let me give you a word of encouragement. Those countries were economically lean from the last war. We still have economic fat on our national bones. Those countries were weaker in their fidelities to liberty. We are tougher in our fidelities.

Our ability to meet these storms and these changes will abide in the qualities of our people.

There is in every nation some quality distilled from its racial life. Those are the mores of the race. Ours is a belief in God—a belief in the dignity of the common man. Ours is a spirit of independence—a vigorous assertion of self-reliance, of devotion to duty. Ours is a high sense of cooperation in time of stress. We have always fought tyranny in any form. We have not in the past been deterred by difficulty or defeated by disaster. We have sought new frontiers—new obstacles to surmount. We have been resilient, courageous, fearless, and unconquerable. The New Deal has contributed to sap our stamina and make us soft.

In quest of security we have retreated from liberty. In quest of reform we have abandoned justice and stirred class hate. In quest of economic power they have impoverished the people. In quest of relief we have injured self-reliance. In quest of an easy way out we have lessened the vision of America.

The road of regeneration is burdensome and hard. It is straight and simple. It is a road paved with work and with sacrifice and consecration to the indefinable spirit that is America.

Centuries ago, alone under the stars, contrasting his own insignificance with the immensity of God's universe, there sprang to the lips of the psalmist the question "What is man, that Thou are mindful of him? And the son of man that Thou visitest him?"

Was man created a little lower than the angels, a being for whom the abundance of life consists of justice, liberty, and opportunity? Does he possess the right from the Creator to plan his own life, to dare his own adventure, to earn his own reward so long as he does no harm to his fellows? Or must he submerge his life, his liberties, and his independent personality in an omnipotent government?

But if man is an inviolable human soul, possessed of dignity, endowed with unalienable rights, America is right. And this is a war that Americans dare not lose.

Republicans, you go into battle for the greatest cause entrusted to the government of mankind.

With steadfastness to these ideals, you can put this house in order. You can defend this Nation. You can demonstrate that self-governing, free people can solve the problems imposed by the industrial revolution. You can restore employment and agriculture, and end their sufferings. You can wipe out coercion and corruption. You can make this a classless country devoted to equal opportunity for all. You can build up humane measures of security, of increasing standards of living for all of the people. You can remove their fears. You can inspire their devotion to American ideals. You can, and you will, hold alight to a confused world the lamp of liberty. Republicans, are you prepared to fight?

Will Reorganization Plan No. IV Create Two Soil Conservation Services?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

Wednesday, May 8, 1940

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, most of the debate, if not practically all of it, on Reorganization Plan No. IV has centered on the proposed transfer of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. That is a serious matter, attended by grave uncertainty. There is another part of the plan, however, which in its field may be quite as important. I refer to the part that will transfer the functions of the Soil Conservation Service on public lands from the Department of the Agriculture to the Department of the Interior.

This transfer, it seems to me, entirely overlooks the fact that in a given watershed you have both private- and public-owned lands. The problems of soil conservation do not stop on section lines.

In areas with which I am familiar, you have privately owned lands checkerboarded with public lands in the national forest, in a national monument, in a grazing area, in an Indian reservation. Is it sound to say that while a raindrop is rolling down a hillside the Department of Agriculture shall watch its course until it reaches a fence line, where it rolls on to public domain and a Department of Interior ranger takes over? That may sound facetious, but it is not so intended. It is intended merely to bring home the situation that will exist. Indeed, it will be worse than that, for at a half dozen places in its course, that raindrop may go from private to public land, from public land to private, and back again.

That will be the complicated, duplicated picture of soil conservation administered by two different departments in the lands of intermingled ownership.

PROBLEM CROSSES FENCE LINES

The soil-erosion problem in this country is national in scope. Worn-out farm lands, dust storms, mounting flood crests, the silting of streams and reservoirs, tax delinquency, increasing relief loads, and a host of attendant evils are rooted in a destructive type of land use which is equally prevalent on public as well as private lands. Moreover, the nature of the problem is such that a solution cannot be achieved on private lands independently of a solution on public lands, or vice versa.

Congress recognized this fact in passing legislation which authorized the creation of the Soil Conservation Service. It seems clear Congress intended a single agency to tackle the erosion problem and deal with it on a national scale without regard for regional interests, ownership prerogatives, or sectional spheres of influence. Following are excerpts from the Soil Conservation Act (Public, No. 46) of 1935, to support this belief:

That it is hereby recognized that the wastage of soil and moisture resources on farm, grazing, and forest lands of the Nation, resulting from soil erosion, is a menace to the national welfare, and that it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to provide permanently for the control and prevention of soil erosion and thereby to preserve natural resources, control floods, prevent impairment of reservoirs, and maintain the navigability of rivers and harbors, protect public health, public lands, and relieve unemployment, and the Secretary of Agriculture, from now on, shall coordinate and direct all activities with relation to soil erosion. * * *

SEC. 5. The Secretary of Agriculture shall establish an agency to be known as the Soil Conservation Service, to exercise the powers conferred on him by this act. * * *

HIT-AND-MISS TREATMENT FUTILE

Effective soil conservation requires the treatment of all lands in a given watershed or type of farming region in accordance with the inherent needs and adaptabilities of each tract of public land, as well as each field of each farm. Experience in dealing with millions of acres has shown conclusively that little value comes from any piecemeal, hit-and-miss program of land treatment. Soil-conserving practices must be applied to all lands in a natural area in such a way that the protection of uplands from erosion also safeguards the lowlands from floodwaters and excessive deposits of silt.

Congress recognized the essential soundness of this principle in passing the Soil Conservation Act of 1935. It has repeatedly recognized the principle in subsequent legislation. The Omnibus Flood Control Act of 1936, for example, specifically authorizes the Department of Agriculture to carry out watershed-land treatment concurrently with downstream flood control operations by the Corps of Army Engineers. At no time in the relatively brief history of the Soil Conservation Service has there been any departure from this policy of coordinated land defense.

Under the proposed reorganization plan, however, such a departure seems inevitable. In those areas containing considerable acreages of public land, the Soil Conservation Service will automatically be barred from carrying out a complete program.

Of course, it is possible that arrangements could be made with the Department of the Interior whereby the Service and Interior would carry out concurrent, interlocking operations. But without unified direction and a common understanding of basic objectives there would be little assurance that such a joint undertaking would succeed.

It might even be better for the Soil Conservation Service to withdraw completely from areas containing public land and turn the entire job of soil and water conservation, on public and private lands alike, over to the Department of the Interior—over to another Soil Conservation Service, or some such extra agency that would have to be set up if erosion is really going to be checked. While such a course would hardly be sound, in view of the decidedly agricultural interests involved, it might be the wiser under the circumstances. From the standpoint of cost alone, it would be difficult to justify the existence of two separate and distinct field organizations to deal with a single problem. Inevitable conflicts as to method and policy will further complicate and hamper any joint undertaking on a basis which fails to recognize unified direction.

Looking at the problem from the standpoint of cold logic, it seems both scientifically and administratively sound that a single agency, whether it be the Soil Conservation Service in the Department of Agriculture or some other agency set up in the Department of the Interior, should be in a position to plan and carry out a completely coordinated program in a given watershed if there is to be any real or lasting progress made in the field of soil conservation.

PUBLIC LANDS IN 11 STATES

Public lands under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior are largely confined to 11 Western States in an area bounded on the west by the Cascade and Sierra Nevada Ranges, and extending eastward to the eastern slopes of the Rocky Mountains. In this large area the land is used predominantly for grazing and irrigation agriculture. The economy of the region depends primarily upon maintenance of grazing resources and a reliable supply of water. Soil and water conservation in these western watersheds is vital to the welfare of a third of the continental area of the Nation. Land ownership in this vast region, however, does not conform to watershed or other natural boundaries but invariably involves intermingled private, State, county, and Federal interests.

This complex pattern of ownership creates serious problems. In a great many instances the owners of private lands in the West supplement their holdings by leasing public lands. Under such conditions it is doubly important that soil conservation have unified direction. Since the users of public lands share the responsibility for conservation, they rightfully feel there should be no distinction between public and private holdings. For one agency to prescribe conservation practices for public lands which differ from those prescribed by another agency for private lands would create chaotic conditions which in themselves would suffice to defeat conservation objectives.

The Soil Conservation Service has demonstrated a practical and effective method for dealing with problems brought on by complex ownership. Through agreements with Federal agencies which lease public lands to private owners, the Service deals directly with the operators who use the land. Soil- and water-conservation practices are put into use, as needed, without distinction between public and private lands. Soil conservation becomes something tangible and personal to those most directly concerned. Proper land use on all units, whether public or private, goes hand in hand with the necessary erosion control and moisture-conservation operations. The authority of each land-administering agency to manage its own lands and to supplement the efforts of the Soil Conservation Service by its own development and conservation measures is fully recognized. Positive action on the part of the Service includes research, surveys, planning, technical supervision, and actual work on many millions of acres.

In view of the demonstrated merit and success of this approach, there seems little need for a policy limiting the authority of one agency to work on public lands and another agency to work on private lands. Such a policy will endanger the entire conservation program in the West.

S. C. S. IS AN ACTION AGENCY

From the start, the Soil Conservation Service has been recognized as a so-called action agency. Without the enormous labor reserves of the C. C. C. and W. P. A., tractors, terracing equipment, and specialized field technicians to guide the application of conservation measures, it is highly improbable that there would be a network of great demonstration areas across the country today. If the Soil Conservation Service had been content to serve as a consultant to the American farmer, soil conservation would still be nothing more than a visionary idea tucked away in some remote corner of the Department of Agriculture. The Service must continue to act if the Nation is to consolidate and hold its soil-conservation gains.

In recent years the Service has begun to move into the broader field of cooperation with soil-conservation districts.

Soil conservation is more than an intangible idea that can be planted in the mind of a farmer and fertilized with how-to-do-it bulletins. It requires careful study and survey of slopes, soils, and rainfall; it frequently calls for more labor, equipment, and materials than the average farmer can provide; and, most important, it requires leadership to direct the use of all these conservation tools into a coordinated single farm plan that will work.

While farmers in districts naturally should provide more of these necessities than in the early days of demonstration, the Soil Conservation Service must be in a position to furnish those things which are beyond the immediate reach of soil-conservation districts—and to see to it that soil-conservation practices are actually put into use on the lands of those who are willing to do their part in the most important job this country ever faced.

SPECIAL PROBLEM IN SOIL-CONSERVATION DISTRICTS

If limited to private lands, how will the Soil Conservation Service cooperate with the hundreds of soil-conservation districts in the West, which include large and small acreages of public land?

The Service has encouraged the formation of such districts with promises of assistance within the limit of available resources. Many of these districts have already asked for and are receiving assistance. Others will undoubtedly ask for aid in the future.

Must the Soil Conservation Service tell these districts that it can provide assistance only for those lands not under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior? Must its work be carried right up to a public-land boundary line and dropped?

Or will a soil-conservation district with a considerable acreage of Interior land within its boundaries ask two agencies to help solve a single problem? If so, the Soil Conservation Service will probably be expected to provide funds and personnel for surveys, planning, and operations on some three-way cooperative basis.

There is still a third possibility for solving the problem of the unfortunate district with Interior lands inside its boundaries. Perhaps the "agency or agencies, as the Secretary of the Interior may designate" to carry out soil-conserving activities on Interior lands will assume full responsibility for cooperation with the district; furnish C. C. C. or W. P. A. labor, field technicians, equipment, and so forth. That would mean that another "soil-conservation service" has been established.

A WATERSHED IS A UNIT—SO S. C. S. SHOULD BE

This feature of Reorganization Plan No. IV, in my opinion, has not been properly considered. Instead of economy, this will increase expenditures. Instead of efficiency, it will create duplication of effort. Instead of simplifying governmental activities, it will make them more complex. The net result will be a reduction in the total good accomplished.

Patrick Henry in 1777, before the Virginia Assembly, said: "Since the achievement of our independence he is the greatest patriot who stops the most gullies."

Certainly the nation that loses its soil loses its life. It seems unfortunate that the framers of Reorganization Plan No. IV did not realize that gullies do not respect the lines that mark where private lands leave off and public lands begin, or where a watercourse moves from public lands to private and back again. In effective soil conservation, a watershed must be treated as a unit, and the Soil Conservation Service, in my estimation, should be continued as a unit, no matter what department houses it.

Present Members Should Be Kept in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENT

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

COUSHATTA, LA., June 26, 1940.

Hon. OVERTON BROOKS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BROOKS: It is my opinion that the present Members of the lower House as well as the Senate, regardless of party, should be sent back to Washington. We need experienced men and they should not be swapped in the middle of this ocean of hell.

Should the people of the country at large think as we do here in Red River Parish, it would not be necessary for our Representatives and Senators in Congress to make an active campaign. We believe it their patriotic duty to stick to their post at Washington.

Your ability and influence on the important Military Affairs Committee, alone, entitles you to be returned to the Nation's Capital without opposition.

With best wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

FRED WILSON.

Democratic National Convention

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address to the Democratic National Convention delivered by the President of the United States and broadcast from the White House on July 19, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Members of the convention, my friends, it is very late tonight, but I have felt that you would rather that I speak to you now than wait until tomorrow.

It is with a very full heart that I speak tonight. I must confess that I do so with mixed feelings—because I find myself, as almost everyone does sooner or later in his lifetime, in a conflict between deep personal desire for retirement on the one hand and that quiet, invisible thing called conscience on the other.

Because there are self-appointed commentators and interpreters who will seek to misinterpret or question motives, I speak in a somewhat personal vein; and I must trust to the good faith and common sense of the American people to accept my own good faith—and to do their own interpreting.

When, in 1936, I was chosen by the voters for a second time as President, it was my firm intention to turn over the responsibilities of government to other hands at the end of my term. That conviction remained with me. Eight years in the Presidency, following a period of bleak depression, and covering one world crisis after another, would normally entitle any man to the relaxation that comes from honorable retirement.

During the spring of 1939 world events made it clear to all but the blind or the partisan that a great war in Europe had become not merely a possibility but a probability, and that such a war would of necessity deeply affect the future of this Nation.

When the conflict first broke out last September it was still my intention to announce clearly and simply, at an early date, that under no conditions would I accept reelection. This fact was well known to my friends, and I think was understood by many citizens.

It soon became evident, however, that such a public statement on my part would be unwise from the point of view of sheer public duty. As President of the United States, it was my clear duty, with the aid of the Congress, to preserve our neutrality, to shape our program of defense to meet rapid changes, to keep our domestic affairs adjusted to shifting world conditions, and to sustain the policy of the good neighbor.

It was also my obvious duty to maintain to the utmost the influence of this mighty Nation in our effort to prevent the spread of war, and to sustain by all legal means those governments threatened by other governments which had rejected the principles of democracy.

Swiftly moving foreign events made necessary swift action at home and beyond the seas. Plans for national defense had to be expanded and adjusted to meet new forms of warfare. American citizens and their welfare had to be safeguarded in many foreign zones of danger. National unity in the United States became a crying essential in the face of the development of unbelievable types of espionage and international treachery.

Every day that passed called for the postponement of personal plans and partisan debate until the latest possible moment. The normal conditions under which I would have made public declaration of my personal desires were wholly gone.

And so, thinking solely of the national good and of the international scene, I came to the reluctant conclusion that such declaration should not be made before the national convention. It was accordingly made to you within an hour after the permanent organization of this convention.

Like any other man, I am complimented by the honor you have done me. But I know you will understand the spirit in which I say that no call of party alone would prevail upon me to accept reelection to the Presidency.

The real decision to be made in these circumstances is not the acceptance of a nomination, but rather an ultimate willingness to serve if chosen by the electorate of the United States. Many considerations enter into this decision.

During the past few months, with due congressional approval we, in the United States, have been taking steps to implement the total defense of America. I cannot forget that in carrying out this program I have drafted into the service of the Nation many men and women, taking them away from important private affairs, calling them suddenly from their homes and their businesses. I have asked them to leave their own work, and to contribute their skill and experience to the cause of their Nation.

I, as the head of their Government, have asked them to do this. Regardless of party, regardless of personal convenience, they came—they answered the call. Every single one of them, with one exception, has come to the Nation's Capital to serve the Nation.

These people, who have placed patriotism above all else, represent those who have made their way to what might be called the top of their professions or industries through their proven skill and experience.

But they alone could not be enough to meet the needs of the times.

Just as a system of national defense based on manpower alone, without the mechanized equipment of modern warfare, is totally insufficient for adequate national defense, so also planes and guns and tanks are wholly insufficient unless they are implemented by the power of men trained to use them.

Such manpower consists not only of pilots and gunners and infantry and those who operate tanks. For every individual in actual combat service, it is necessary for adequate defense that we have ready at hand at least four or five other trained individuals organized for noncombat services.

Because of the millions of citizens involved in the conduct of defense, most right-thinking persons are agreed that some form of selection by draft is as necessary and fair today as it was in 1917 and 1918.

Nearly every American is willing to do his share or her share to defend the United States. It is neither just nor efficient to permit that task to fall upon any one section or any one group. For every section and every group depend for their existence upon the survival of the Nation as a whole.

Lying awake, as I have, on many nights, I have asked myself whether I have the right, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, to call on men and women to serve their country or to train themselves to serve and, at the same time, decline to serve my country in my own personal capacity, if I am called upon to do so by the people of my country.

In times like these—in times of great tension, of great crisis—the compass of the world narrows to a single fact. The fact which dominates our world is the fact of armed aggression, the fact of successful armed aggression, aimed at the form of government, the kind of society that we in the United States have chosen and established for ourselves. It is a fact which no one longer doubts—which no one is longer able to ignore.

It is not an ordinary war. It is a revolution imposed by force of arms, which threatens all men everywhere. It is a revolution which proposes not to set men free but to reduce them to slavery—to reduce them to slavery in the interest of a dictatorship which has already shown the nature and the extent of the advantage which it hopes to obtain.

That is the fact which dominates our world and which dominates the lives of all of us, each and every one of us. In the face of the danger which confronts our time, no individual retains or can hope to retain, the right of personal choice which free men enjoy in times of peace. He has a first obligation to serve in the defense of our institutions of freedom—a first obligation to serve his country in whatever capacity his country finds him useful.

Like most men of my age, I had made plans for myself, plans for a private life of my own choice and for my own satisfaction, a life of that kind to begin in January 1941. These plans, like so many other plans, had been made in a world which now seems as distant as another planet. Today all private plans, all private lives have been in a sense repealed by an overriding public danger. In the face of that public danger all those who can be of service to the Republic have no choice but to offer themselves for service in those capacities for which they may be fitted.

These, my friends, are the reasons why I have had to admit to myself, and now to state to you, that my conscience will not let me turn my back upon a call to service.

The right to make that call rests with the people through the American method of a free election. Only the people themselves can draft a President. If such a draft should be made upon me, I say to you, in the utmost simplicity, I will, with God's help, continue to serve with the best of my ability and with the fullness of my strength.

To you, the delegates to this convention, I express my gratitude for the selection of Henry Wallace for the high office of Vice President of the United States. His first-hand knowledge of the problems of government in every sphere of life and in every single part of the Nation—and indeed of the whole world—qualifies him without reservation. His practical idealism will be of great service to me individually and to the Nation as a whole.

And to the Chairman of the National Committee, the Postmaster General of the United States—my old friend, Jim Farley—I send, as I have often before and will many times again, my most affectionate greetings. All of us are sure that he will continue to give all the leadership and support that he possibly can to the cause of American democracy.

In some respects, as I think my good wife suggested an hour or so ago—in some respects the next few months will be different, different from the usual national campaigns of recent years.

Most of you know how important it is that the President of the United States in these days remain close to the seat of Government. Since last summer I have been compelled to abandon proposed journeys to inspect many of our great national projects from the Alleghanies to the Pacific coast.

Events move so fast in other parts of the world that it has become my duty to remain either in the White House itself or at some nearby point where I can reach Washington and even Europe and Asia by direct telephone—where, if need be, I can be back at my desk in the space of a very few hours. And in addition, the splendid work of the new defense machinery will require me to spend vastly more time in conference with the responsible administrative heads under me. Finally, the added task which the present crisis has imposed also upon the Congress, compelling them to forego their usual adjournment, calls for constant cooperation between the executive and legislative branches, to the efficiency of which I am glad indeed now to pay tribute.

I do expect, of course, during the coming months to make my usual periodic reports to the country through the medium of press conferences and radio talks. I shall not have the time or the inclination to engage in purely political debate. But I shall never be loathe to call the attention of the Nation to deliberate or unwitting falsifications of fact, which are sometimes made by political candidates.

I have spoken to you in a very informal and personal way. The exigencies of the day require, however, that I also talk with you about things which transcend any personality and go very deeply to the roots of American civilization.

Our lives have been based on those fundamental freedoms and liberties which we Americans have cherished for a century and a half. The establishment of them and the preservation of them in each succeeding generation have been accomplished through the processes of free elective government—the Democratic-Republican form, based on the representative system and the coordination of the Executive, the Legislative, and the Judicial branches.

The task of safeguarding our institutions seems to me to be twofold. One must be accomplished, if it becomes necessary, by the armed defense forces of the Nation; the other, by the united effort of the men and women of the country, to make our Federal and State and local governments responsive to the growing requirements of modern democracy.

There have been occasions as we remember when reactions in the march of democracy have set in, and forward-looking progress has seemed to stop.

But such periods have been followed by liberal and progressive times which have enabled the Nation to catch up with new developments in fulfilling new human needs. Such a time has been the past seven years. Because we had seemed to lag in previous years, we have had to develop, speedily and efficiently, the answers to aspirations which had come from every State and every family in the land.

We have sometimes called it social legislation; we have sometimes called it legislation to end the abuses of the past; we have sometimes called it legislation for human security; we have sometimes called it legislation to better the condition of life of the many millions of our fellow citizens, who could not have the essentials of life or hope for an American standard of living.

Some of us have labeled it a wider and more equitable distribution of wealth in our land. It has included among its aims, to liberalize and broaden the control of vast industries—lodged today in the hands of a relatively small group of individuals of very great financial power.

But all of these definitions and labels are essentially the expression of one consistent thought. They represent a constantly growing sense of human decency, human decency throughout our nation.

This sense of human decency is happily confined to no group or class. You find it in the humblest home. You find it among those who toil and among the shopkeepers and the farmers of the Nation. You find it, to a growing degree, even among those who are listed in that top group which has so much control over the industrial and financial structure of the Nation. Therefore this urge of humanity can by no means be labeled a war of class against class. It is, rather, a war against poverty and suffering and ill health and insecurity—a war in which all classes are joining in the interest of a sound and enduring democracy.

I do not believe for a moment, and I know that you do not believe either that we have fully answered all of the needs of human security. But we have covered much of the road. I need not catalog the milestones of 7 years. For every individual and every family in the whole land knows that the average of their personal lives has been made safer and sounder and happier than it has ever been before. I do not think they want the gains in these directions to be repealed or even to be placed in the charge of those who would give them mere lip service with no heart service.

Yes; very much more remains to be done; and I think the voters want the task entrusted to those who believe that the words "human betterment" apply to poor and rich alike.

And I have a sneaking suspicion, too, that voters will smile at charges of inefficiency against a government which has boldly met the enormous problems of banking and finance and industry which the great efficient bankers and industrialists of the Republican Party left in such hopeless chaos in the famous year 1933.

But we all know that our progress at home and in the other American nations toward this realization of a better human decency—progress along free lines—is gravely endangered by what is happening on other continents. In Europe many nations, through dictatorships or invasions, have been compelled to abandon normal democratic processes. They have been compelled to adopt forms of government which some call new and efficient.

They are not new, my friends, they are only a relapse—a relapse into ancient history. The omnipotent rulers of the greater part of modern Europe have guaranteed efficiency, and work, and a type of security.

But the slaves who built the pyramids for the glory of the dictator Pharaohs of Egypt had that kind of security, that kind of efficiency, that kind of corporative state.

So did the inhabitants of that world which extended from Britain to Persia under the undisputed rule of the proconsuls sent out from Rome.

So did the henchmen, the tradesmen, the mercenaries, and the slaves of the feudal system which dominated Europe a thousand years ago.

So did the people of those nations of Europe who received their kings and their government at the whim of the conquering Napoleon.

Whatever its new trappings and new slogans, tyranny is the oldest and most discredited rule known to history. And whenever tyranny has replaced a more human form of government it has been due more to internal causes than external. Democracy can thrive only when it enlists the devotion of those whom Lincoln called the common people. Democracy can hold that devotion only when it adequately respects their dignity by so ordering society as to assure to the masses of men and women reasonable security and hope for themselves and for their children.

We in our democracy, and those who live in still unconquered democracies, will never willingly descend to any form of this so-called security of efficiency which calls for the abandonment of other securities more vital to the dignity of man. It is our credo—unshakable to the end—that we must live under the liberties that were first heralded by Magna Carta and placed into glorious operation through the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Bill of Rights.

The Government of the United States for the past 7 years has had the courage openly to oppose by every peaceful means the spread of the dictator form of government. If our Government should pass to other hands next January—untried hands, inexperienced hands—we can merely hope and pray that they will not substitute appeasement and compromise with those who seek to destroy all democracies everywhere, including here.

I would not undo, if I could, the efforts I made to prevent war from the moment it was threatened and to restrict the area of carnage, down to the last minute. I do not now soften the condemnation expressed by Secretary Hull and myself from time to time for the acts of aggression that have wiped out ancient liberty-loving, peace-pursuing countries which had scrupulously maintained neutrality. I do not recant the sentiments of sympathy with all free peoples resisting such aggression, or begrudge the material aid that we have given to them. I do not regret my consistent endeavor to awaken this country to the menace for us and for all we hold dear.

I have pursued these efforts in the face of appeaser fifth columnists who charged me with hysteria and warmongering. But I felt it my duty, my simple, plain, unescapable duty, to arouse my countrymen to the danger of the new forces let loose in the world.

So long as I am President, I will do all I can to insure that that foreign policy remain our foreign policy.

All that I have done to maintain the peace of this country and to prepare it morally, as well as physically, for whatever contingencies may be in store, I submit to the judgment of my countrymen.

We face one of the great choices of history.

It is not alone a choice of government by the people versus dictatorship.

It is not alone a choice of freedom versus slavery.

It is not alone a choice between moving forward or falling back.

It is all of these rolled into one.

It is the continuance of civilization as we know it versus the ultimate destruction of all that we have held dear—religion against godlessness; the ideal of justice against the practice of force, moral decency versus the firing squad; courage to speak out, and to act, versus the false lullaby of appeasement.

But it has been well said that a selfish and greedy people cannot be free.

The American people must decide whether these things are worth making sacrifices of money, of energy, and of self. They will not decide by listening to mere words or by reading mere pledges, interpretations and claims. They will decide on the record—the record as it has been made—the record of things as they are.

The American people will sustain the progress of a representative democracy, asking the divine blessing as they face the future with courage and with faith.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY, OF KENTUCKY

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address delivered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] as permanent chairman of the Democratic National Committee, at Chicago, Ill., on July 16, last.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of July 17, 1940]

STADIUM, CHICAGO, July 16.—The text of the address of Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY, of Kentucky, permanent chairman of the Democratic National Convention, was as follows:

"Fellow Democrats, to the national committee, which recommended, and to this convention, which has chosen me as permanent chairman, I express my profound appreciation.

"I shall endeavor to preside over your deliberations with promptness and fairness to the end that you may consummate your task in dignity and good order.

"We assemble here in circumstances so uncommon, in the midst of world disorders so unprecedented and surrounded by domestic obligations so compulsive as to charge us with the duty of preparing our Nation to meet consequences which will project themselves indefinitely into the unpredictable future.

"The Democratic Party has faced one crisis after another during its long and glorious history.

"It has been tested in the crucible of faith and achievement. It has never faltered in its devotion to the higher interests of the people of America. It will not falter now.

"MAKING OF A CLEAR RECORD

"But we do not come together in any vain glorious spirit prompted by the mere desire for a partisan or personal victory. Unless by our record in the past and our concept of duty for the future we are equipped for the tasks of statesmanship, we have no claim on the American people for further preferment.

"The record we have made is written in the history of the Republic. While we lay no claim to perfection and fulminate no pretensions that this record contains no errors, nevertheless we contemplate with pride the great tasks we have undertaken and accomplished in behalf of democracy and those who believe in it and strive to advance it.

"Let us be equally unequivocal in the program we shall here announce, so that the American people and the world will know what we think and what we propose to do.

"The chief, if not the only, reason for the existence of political parties is to afford a vehicle for the molding and expression of public opinion and for the fixation of responsibility in the conduct of the public business.

"There have been occasions when political organizations were afraid to speak plainly or intelligently on problems of transcendent importance to this Nation, when language was employed not to convey but to conceal thought; when each pronouncement made a frontal attack on all others, and the whole appeared to have been written in mud by the migratory feet of a weasel.

" 'COLORS' OF RIVAL PLATFORMS

"Such is the platform adopted by the Republican Party at Philadelphia 3 weeks ago. It is the perfect example of the uncertainties and ambiguities of men who do not know where they are going or what they will do when they arrive. The day on which it was written was described by Walter Lippman as 'black Tuesday in Philadelphia.'

"Having assembled this political ragout and found it without form and void, its fabricators concluded that what it lacked and needed was color. They wanted not only color but they wanted a variety of colors. But while they wanted color, they did not desire fast color.

"They desired a color whose changing shades and shadows would be determined by the degree of regulation which a fearless Government saw fit to impose upon a vast empire of power hitherto uncontrolled in its exercise of dominion over the social, industrial, and economic life of millions of Americans.

"They seemed unwilling or afraid to nominate any man who had been a Republican for more than 2 years. Hence, they chose a political chameleon.

"The Philadelphia convention constituted the second charge of the Light Brigade, in the heroic Battle of Kilowatt.

"DEALING WITH 'INHERITED CHAOS'

"It is not my province or my purpose on this occasion to attempt any detailed review of the history of the world or our own country during the past 8 years. Much of that history has been spread before our eyes with such kaleidoscopic rapidity as to render the succession of events a little vague to all but the meticulous historian.

"It is no exaggeration to assert that no similar period in our history has been so crowded with engrossing spectacularity or fraught with such consequences to our institutions or our methods of life.

"Our efforts here at home have not been inspired by the punitive desire to set group against group or to array section against section.

"We inherited chaos 8 years ago. We inherited fear, which was almost universal. We inherited lack of confidence, not only in private enterprise, but in our public institutions.

"The American people had been led to the brink of a precipice by the fallacies of a smug and blind regime, which found itself impotent to draw back or to avert the disaster which it had contrived.

"SPREAD OF 'DEVASTATION'

"This impotence had wrought its devastation not only in the field of business and industry but had set a blight on all financial activities.

"Banks and confidence in them collapsed. Wheels of industry were motionless. The market places for both money and commodities were bereft of constructive or profitable activities.

"Agriculture dropped and died from a dry rot inflicted by legislative and administrative incompetence, while the feet of 15,000,000 American laborers wandered in vagrant anxiety over the question of tomorrow's food and shelter.

"Homes and firesides, millions of them, which must be the sanctuary of the true spirit of America, were on the verge of permanent loss through the cry of the auctioneer.

"Abuses of the financial, economic, and social realms of our existence had grown so chronic that the Nation despaired of any constructive or effective remedy against them.

"The status quo became the law of our being, and the Government imitated that backward-flying bird which never knows where it is going but can only see where it has been.

"BLOCKING OF WORLD TRADE

"American commerce with the world, which in every great industrial nation has been and must be a substantial portion of the yardstick of its prosperity, had fled from the seas and the marts of trade.

"Encouraged by our own example of folly, insurmountable barriers had been erected by nation against nation through the effort of provincial minds to set metes and bounds to the genius and initiative of man.

"In our own hemisphere, peopled by the children of those who had fought for the creation of a new ideal of democratic thought and conduct, suspicion and fear, political and economic, retarded the efforts to consummate a solidarity essential to the preservation and protection of the common interests of all the Americas.

"The effort of the past 7 years on the part of our Government has been devoted to the task of remolding the faith of our people in their own brand of democracy under the leadership of one of the world's outstanding Democrats, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

"A CHALLENGE ON FREEDOMS

"We have heard much from complacent threats in recent years about free enterprise. The spokesmen of the Philadelphia assemblage invoked the spirits of the departed in behalf of free enterprise, and ex-President Hoover began his diatribe by proclaiming it the duty of his party to save America for free men.

"He, of all men, ought to cry for the return of freedom, because he and his regime fastened more shackles on the physical, economic, and spiritual aspirations of the American people than any other group who ever mismanaged the affairs of this Republic.

"What freedom is it that we have destroyed, and, by the same token, what freedom is it that the platform and nominees of the Philadelphia convention will restore?

"Is it the freedom to juggle and manipulate and determine the value of the securities of American corporations in which millions of our people have invested their savings?

"Do they propose to destroy the freedom we have guaranteed to labor in the United States to sit across a table from its employer on terms of equality and bargain collectively over wages, hours, and working conditions?

"Do they propose to restore the uncontrolled freedom of some employers to exploit employees by long hours and low wages?

"Do they propose to remove from agriculture the freedom to cooperate within itself and with the Government of the United States in securing a larger portion of the national income for the service they render to society?

"Do they propose to return the American farmer to the income of 1932 instead of twice that income which he has received under the New Deal?

"Mr. Hoover, who constitutes the remaining living symbol of Republican wisdom, in his speech at the convention, said the Republican Party was the first to bring relief to the American farmer. What he no doubt meant to say was that Republican leadership was the first to bring the need for relief to the American farmer.

"Will they restore the freedom of vast holding companies, drawing their substance from local utilities and their consumers to continue their depredations upon the public, to prevent which the Utility Holding Company Act was passed over the vehement protest of the present Republican candidate for President?

"In truth, the reason for the shifting of his political robes was the enactment of this legislation, plus the completion and development of a great natural resource in the Tennessee Valley, begun during the first World War in the administration of Woodrow Wilson.

"Will they destroy or undermine the laws we have enacted for the aged and unemployed?

"Will they restore the freedom as well as the compulsion of old age to descend to the grave in penury and want?

"Will they restore the freedom as well as the compulsion of unemployed men to walk the streets in search of work or take their places in bread lines where they stood in 1932?

"STRONGER SECURITY LAW URGED

"We have made but a beginning in this great field of social security. It is my opinion that we must strengthen and simplify the law not only to provide greater assistance but also to provide greater uniformity in the benefits accruing to those entitled to them under the social security law.

"There ought to be greater uniformity throughout the Nation in the provisions for old-age pensions; and I am convinced that this uniformity can be secured only when the Federal Government assumes greater responsibility for the administration of the benefits which the law accords.

"What is this freedom which we have driven out and which they will entice back to this land of the free?

"Do the Philadelphia guarantors of a return of freedom propose to abolish the Civilian Conservation Corps or the National Youth Administration which have prepared more than 3,000,000 young men and women for responsibilities in life and given them a new conception of the relationship between them and their Government?

"Mr. Hoover, in his Philadelphia exegesis, announced that the New Deal had stabilized unemployment. Having himself multiplied it beyond all previous calculations, even he ought to welcome some degree of stabilization.

"During this pretended eclipse of free enterprise in America the national income has increased from $38,000,000,000 to $71,000,000,000 per annum. The last Republican administration had reduced it from eighty billions to thirty-eight billions and had inaugurated that succession of annual deficits which they now proclaim as the peculiar patent of the Roosevelt administration.

"The fundamental difference between the two situations is that Roosevelt deficits have been reflected in vast improvements and additions to the values of property and life in every community in the United States, while there cannot be found in any part of the Nation any evidence of value or increased enjoyment of life that previous deficit spending had accomplished.

"In this same period during which they believe freedom has fled from our shores and the credit of the Government has been jeopardized the price of Government bonds on the markets of the Nation and the world rose from 80 cents on the dollar to nearly $1.20, notwithstanding a substantial decrease in the rate of interest which these obligations bear.

"During this same period the total indebtedness of the American people has decreased by more than $10,000,000,000, which does not indicate that they are headed toward predicted bankruptcy.

"IMPROVEMENTS HAVE COST MONEY

"These improvements, these aids to industry and to labor, and the general restoration of the morale of our people have cost money. We do not deny that. They have made it necessary for us to borrow money and levy taxes which under normal conditions would have been unnecessary and undesirable.

"But the American people are not and will not be frightened into panic when they realize that during the past 7 years, while the debt of the National Government has increased by $22,000,000,000, their total other public and private debts have decreased by more than $30,000,000,000, and that during this same 7-year period their aggregate income has increased four times as much as has the indebtedness of the Federal Government.

"All this has been done in order to restore the faith of the American people in their Government and to emphasize the fact that our Government is not an austere, unapproachable, inanimate thing off yonder in Washington, taking no account of or interest in the affairs of those who support it.

"All this has been done to demonstrate that the processes of democracy can be made to respond to the needs of men and women. It has been done in order to prove that under our Constitution and without changing or undermining our form of government it can be made an instrument of service under the stress of a great crisis.

"It cannot be denied that democracy was in sore need of this proof of its efficacy and its power.

"Never before in our history has democracy been under attack on a wider front than during the last decade.

"MARCH TOWARD FREEDOM

"For a century and more prior to the World War, the races of men were moving toward the goal of freedom and self-government.

Beginning with our own Revolution and a little later with the French Revolution, the theory of democratic institutions found acceptance in all parts of the world.

"During this century most of South America established its freedom from Spain and other foreign dominations under republican forms of government, patterned largely after our own. France drove the last Bonaparte from the throne and established the French Republic.

"China proclaimed a republic throughout her vast territory, and among the far-flung elements of the British Empire a commonwealth of nations emerged, in which the people strengthened their local institutions and extended their privileges of independent action.

"In the smaller nations of Europe, even those which clung to the traditions of monarchy, the people increased their power over and participation in their governments.

"In Russia the Czar and all that he represented were unhorsed in what was supposed to be a revolution for the people. In Germany the Kaiser abdicated and fled his country following the establishment of a republic.

"In England the House of Lords was shorn of some of its ancient prerogatives. In Italy the King became a puppet, and in South Africa the principles of self-government became an established fact following the Boer War.

"Everywhere it seemed that the doctrine, proclaimed by Thomas Jefferson that all governments derived their just powers from the consent of the governed, was on the march and would at length cover the earth like the waters cover the sea.

"PROCESS SENT INTO REVERSE

"But in the past decade or two this process seems to have gone in reverse. Whether as the result of some evil spirit loosed by the agonies of the World War, or in consequence of the impotence of existing regimes to understand or respond to the needs of the people, we need not here undertake to determine.

"But we do know that autocracy rears its ugly face in larger portions of the world today than at any time since the formation of the American Republic, and we do know that we are confronted with the alternative of defending and preserving our democratic institutions, as we have built them and enjoyed them, or seeing them confounded by the convergence of antagonistic ideologies in a world dedicated not to the proposition that all men are created equal but that all men are created to feed the maw of greedy, grasping totalitarian states.

"In the midst of these alternatives there is but one choice that the American people can make with honor to themselves and fidelity to traditions and principles for which the Nation was created and to which it is dedicated.

"That choice is to fight against those who would assault our territory, our independence, our ideals, or our vital interests, or anything which we are committed or pledged to defend and preserve, whether that assault is launched from a foreign source or is instigated by disloyal or subversive influence within our own borders.

"We are charged with the responsibility of determining for ourselves whether this democracy which we have instituted and developed is, first, worth preserving; and, second, whether we have the courage, the fortitude, and the intelligence to exert the effort and make the sacrifice essential to its preservation.

"We must determine whether the restoration of confidence in the American system for which we have labored the last 8 years, after all, was worth the effort, and whether we are ready to announce to all the world that not only the United States but the entire Western Hemisphere has been dedicated as a sanctuary for free men, and that any effort from any outside source to encroach upon it territorially, politically, or by any other form of insidious penetration will be met by the total impact of all our resources of men, money, and material, until the encroachment and those who undertake it shall have been broken and driven back.

"This does not mean that we desire war. It does not mean that we do not cherish peace and goodwill among all nations and all races. It does not mean that we propose to become involved in the military conflicts among foreign nations. It does not mean that we propose or intend to send the armed forces of this nation to the battlefields of Europe or Asia for the purpose of determining military superiority among the nations involved.

"But it does mean that we propose to see that at least one continent on this earth shall be kept free for the account of the individual and collective rights and privileges of free men.

"It means that we propose to hold fast to the doctrine that the State is created for the service of the people and not that the people are created for the exploitation of the State.

"For this task we must be prepared, morally, spiritually, physically, mechanically, economically.

"In the inept conglomeration, called the Republican platform, adopted at Philadelphia, we find the following brilliant piece of fiction:

"'The Republican Party stands for Americanism, preparedness, and peace. We accordingly fasten upon the New Deal full responsibility for our unpreparedness and for the consequent danger of involvement in war.'

"No responsible political party ever promulgated a more deceitful alibi in all the history of political parties in the United States.

"I do not relish the necessity to indulge in partisan dispute over the question of preparedness. It ought not to be a partisan question. But, in view of the fact that the Republican platform seeks to make it a partisan question, I am not afraid to discuss it on that basis.

"EFFECTS OF TREATIES ON DEFENSE

"Following the World War the nations sincerely sought peace and disarmament.

"The United States, in the early days of the Harding administration, called the Washington Disarmament Conference. This conference was hailed as a great step toward lifting the burden of armaments from the people of the nations involved. War vessels were sunk. Blueprints were torn to pieces; and ships under construction were ordered scrapped.

"But following this conference it turned out that under the administrations of Republican Presidents, our naval building program did not approximate the ratio allowed by the agreement entered into.

"Then came the so-called nine-power pact, entered into by nine nations during the control of our Government by the Republican Party under which the construction and maintenance of an adequate Army and Navy were still further retarded.

"Then came the so-called Briand-Kellogg Pact, by which nearly all of the nations of the world agreed to renounce war as an instrument of national policy. This hope for world peace was made the excuse for further reductions in appropriations and in construction for our national defense.

"I do not decry these efforts for world peace. The American people, in common with most of the peoples of the world, sincerely hoped and prayed that war would not again drench the earth in human blood.

"But it cannot be claimed by those who were then in power in this Nation that anything substantial was done to build up or even maintain the minimum requirements of our national-defense equipment.

"Instead of having only 75,000 we have 241,000 equipped soldiers in the United States Army, and the present Congress, on the recommendation and under the leadership of the President has authorized an increase to 375,000 men and will authorize further increases as fully and as rapidly as may be required.

"In view of the abortive effort of the Republican convention to fasten on the New Deal the responsibility for any lack of preparedness that may now exist and to elude any portion of that responsibility, let us make some comparisons.

"During the 7 years since 1933 our Government has expended $1,300,000,000 more on the Army than was expended during the previous 7 years.

"In these same 7 years the United States has expended $1,500,000,000 more on the Navy than was expended during the previous 7 years.

"These expenditures were recommended and appropriated under President Roosevelt and they were made necessary largely because Republican administrations had sorely neglected both arms of our national defense.

"During the last year of Woodrow Wilson's administration, when Franklin Roosevelt was Assistant Secretary of the Navy, appropriations for the Navy amounted to $960,000,000. In the first year of the Harding administration they were reduced to $485,000,000. During the 12 years of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover they continued to decline until the fiscal year of 1934 when they reached the insignificant sum of $266,000,000, which was the last naval appropriation enacted as Mr. Hoover was about to retire from office.

"During those 12 years not a single battleship was laid down for construction and only 20 other types of combatant vessels, such as cruisers, submarines, and gunboats, were constructed.

"During the past 4 years we have completed 115 combatant naval vessels. We have under construction now 138 additional vessels, consisting of 10 battleships, 5 aircraft carriers, 4 heavy cruisers, 17 light cruisers, 61 destroyers, and 41 submarines.

"In addition to these vessels now under construction we have provided for the construction of enough naval war craft to give us the largest navy in the world, sufficiently strong to protect our interests in both the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans against any aggressor from any source in any part of this world.

"What else does the record reveal?

"When the naval appropriations bill for the fiscal year 1939 was passed in the Senate a majority of Republican Senators, including the Republican candidate for Vice President, Senator McNARY, voted against it.

"When in the spring of 1939 there came before the Senate the bill increasing the number of Army airplanes from 5,500 to 6,000, a majority of Republican Senators, including their present candidate for Vice President, voted against it.

"When in the Senate the Naval appropriations bill for the fiscal year 1940 was adopted, nearly half the Republican Members voted against it.

"When, in May 1939, the Naval Appropriations Bill carrying a billion dollars for the Navy was before the House of Representatives, of the 58 votes cast against it 54 were Republicans.

"When the House of Representatives was considering the Army appropriations bill for 1940, 4 amendments were offered by Republicans to reduce the sums for signal service, ordnance, and airplanes. Of the 150 Members voting for these reductions 145 were Republicans.

"Only eight Republicans voted against the reductions. In the United States Senate one of the Republican candidates for President, Mr. TAFT, urged an amendment reducing appropriations for the Army and Navy by 25 percent; and, so far as I have been able to learn, the man who nosed him out for the Republican nomination,

Mr. Wendell L. Willkie, uttered no warning or advice to his newly made Republican brethren on the subject of national defense.

"He was probably too busy talking about balancing the Budget and trying to prevent the efforts of the Securities and Exchange Commission to unscramble his billion-dollar utility holding company omelet, and endeavoring to thwart the objectives of the great Tennessee Valley project which was begun 22 years ago as a part of our national-defense program.

"And as late as last Thursday in the House of Representatives, when, at the urgent request and recommendation of William R. Knudsen and Edward Stettinius, members of the Advisory Committee on National Defense, and also at the urgent solicitation of Mr. Dunn, a member of the engineering firm which Mr. Willkie consulted in his fight against the Tennessee Valley Authority, an effort was made to provide for the construction of an additional dam for the purpose of inaugurating the speedy manufacture of necessary aluminum for the construction of airplanes, the effort was blocked by Republican Members of the House of Representatives.

"PRESIDENT'S WORK FOR PEACE

"But what of our involvement in war?

"No man who ever occupied the Presidency of the United States ever strove more valiantly to avert the present war in Europe before its outbreak than did Mr. Roosevelt. No man ever condemned in more unmeasured terms the wicked determination to resort to the brutal force of arms in conquering peaceful and friendly nations, or in settling any legitimate controversies among the nations of Europe.

"No political party or administration in the history of this or any Nation ever made greater sacrifices to avoid involvement in war than have been made by the Democratic Party and its present administration.

"For more than a century we, as a Nation, have insisted on the freedom of the seas. We have insisted that our flag and every flag had the right to sail the seas in time of war, subject to certain rights of search and seizure. We have insisted on the right of Americans to trade and travel under an international law that had been recognized for centuries.

"It was our insistence on the observance of these rights that finally drew us into the World War in 1917.

"But in order to avoid the possibility or likelihood of our involvement in this war through incidents incapable of being foreseen, we have, in the neutrality law, recommended by the President and enacted by a Democratic Congress over the protest of the Republicans, prohibited American ships to sail in belligerent or dangerous waters or American citizens to travel there; and we have prohibited even the granting of credit to belligerent nations and required them to pay cash for what they buy and to transport it in their own or other foreign vessels.

"If the Republicans in Congress had been successful in defeating this legislation, we might already be involved in the war which they pretend so much to fear.

"In these days of peril and uncertainty, we invoke the spirit of a united America.

"We shall expect to make sacrifices. We shall expect to forego some luxuries and conveniences. Already the impact of world conditions has colored our thoughts and remolded some of our conceptions and methods of life.

"But it has not lessened our resolution. It has not made us afraid. It has not cowed the spirit which discovered, populated, developed, and civilized this America of ours. It has but served to strengthen our determination and fortify our resistance.

"In the midst of these threats we call on our people for unity. The relationship between a people and their government is not a one-way thoroughfare. The obligations are reciprocal. They call for that concert of soul and purpose which knows no distinction of race, origin, color, or religion.

"We know that Jew and gentile, Catholic and Protestant, white and colored, rich and poor, native born and foreign born will rise in all their might and holy zeal to guard these portals against the fate which has wrecked other peoples and other civilizations.

"To this high commitment we pledge ourselves and all that we shall here undertake.

"In its consummation we invoke the guidance of God, who, we believe, still sits upon His throne, still rules in earth and heaven, and still holds in the hollow of His hand the destiny of nations and of men."

The 1940 Platform of Democratic Party

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

PLATFORM ADOPTED AT THE CHICAGO CONVENTION

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the platform adopted by the Democratic Party at its national convention recently held in Chicago, Ill.

There being no objection, the platform was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PREAMBLE

The world is undergoing violent changes. Humanity, uneasy in this machine age, is demanding a sense of security and dignity based on human values. No democratic government, which fails to recognize this trend—and take appropriate action—can survive.

That is why the Government of this Nation has moved to keep ahead of this trend; has moved with speed inexplicable to those who do not see this trend.

Outside the Americas, established institutions are being overthrown and democratic philosophies are being repudiated by those whose creed recognizes no power higher than military force, no values other than a false efficiency.

What the founding fathers realized upon this continent was a daring dream that men could have not only physical security, not only efficiency, but something else in addition that men had never had before—the security of the heart that comes with freedom, the peace of mind that comes from a sense of justice.

To this generation of Americans it is given to defend this democratic faith as it is challenged by social maladjustment within and totalitarian greed without. The world revolution against which we prepare our defense is so threatening that not until it has burned itself out in the last corner of the earth will our democracy be able to relax its guard.

In this world crisis, the purpose of the Democratic Party is to defend against external attack and to justify by internal progress the system of government and way of life from which the Democratic Party takes its name.

Toward the modern fulfillment of the American ideal, the Democratic Party, during the last 7 years, has labored successfully—

1. To strengthen democracy by defensive preparedness against aggression, whether by open attack or secret infiltration;

2. To strengthen democracy by increasing our economic efficiency; and

3. To strengthen democracy by improving the welfare of the people.

These three objectives are one and inseparable. No nation can be strong by armaments alone. It must possess and use all the necessary resources for producing goods plentifully and distributing them effectively.

It must add to these factors of material strength the unconquerable spirit and energy of a contented people convinced that there are no boundaries to human progress and happiness in a land of liberty.

Our faith that these objectives can be attained is made unshakable by what has already been done by the present administration—in stopping the waste and exploitation of our national resources, in restoring to the average man and woman a stake in the preservation of our democracy, in enlarging our national armaments, and in achieving national unity.

We shall hold fast to these gains. We are proud of our record. Therefore the party in convention assembled endorses wholeheartedly the brilliant and courageous leadership of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his statesmanship and that of the Congress for the past 7 trying years. And to our President and great leader we send our cordial greetings.

The American people are determined that war, raging in Europe, Asia, and Africa, shall not come to America.

We will not participate in foreign wars, and we will not send our Army, naval, or air forces to fight in foreign lands outside of the Americas, except in case of attack. We favor and shall rigorously enforce and defend the Monroe Doctrine.

The direction and aim of our foreign policy has been, and will continue to be, the security and defense of our own land and the maintenance of its peace.

For years our President has warned the Nation that organized assaults against religion, democracy, and international good faith threatened our own peace and security.

Men blinded by partisanship brushed aside these warnings as war mongering and officious intermeddling. The fall of 12 nations was necessary to bring their belated approval of legislative and Executive action that the President had urged and undertaken with the full support of the people.

It is a tribute to the President's foresight and action that our defense forces are today at the peak of their peacetime effectiveness.

Weakness and unpreparedness invite aggression. We must be so strong that no possible combination of powers would dare to attack us. We propose to provide America with an invincible air force, a Navy strong enough to protect all our seacoasts and our national interests, and a fully equipped and mechanized Army.

We shall continue to coordinate these implements of defense with the necessary expansion of industrial capacity and with the training of appropriate personnel. Outstanding leaders of industry and labor have already been enlisted by the Government to harness our mighty economic forces for national defense.

Experience of other nations gives warning that total defense is necessary to repel attack and that partial defense is no defense.

We have seen the downfall of nations accomplished through international dissension provoked from without.

We denounce and will do all in our power to destroy the treasonable activities of disguised antidemocratic and un-American agencies which would sap our strength, paralyze our will to defend ourselves, and destroy our unity by inciting race against race, class against class, religion against religion, and the people against their free institutions.

To make America strong and to keep America free, every American must give of his talents and treasure in accordance with his ability and his country's needs. We must have democracy of sacrifice as well as democracy of opportunity.

To insure that our armaments shall be implements of peace rather than war, we shall continue our traditional policies of the good neighbor, observe and advocate international respect for the rights of others and for treaty obligations, cultivate foreign trade through desirable trade agreements, and foster economic collaboration with the republics of the Western Hemisphere.

In self-defense and in good conscience, the world's greatest democracy cannot afford heartlessly or in a spirit of appeasement to ignore the peace-loving and liberty-loving peoples wantonly attacked by ruthless aggressors.

We pledge to extend to these peoples all the material aid at our command, consistent with law and not inconsistent with the interests of our own national self-defense, all to the end that peace and international good faith may yet emerge triumphant.

We do not regard the need for preparedness a warrant for infringement upon our civil liberties, but, on the contrary, we shall continue to protect them, in the keen realization that the vivid contrast between the freedom we enjoy and the dark repression which prevails in the lands where liberty is dead affords warning and example to our people to confirm their faith in democracy.

We must strengthen democracy by increasing our economic efficiency.

THE LAND AND THE FARMER

The well-being of the land and those who work upon it is basic to the real defense and security of America.

The Republican Party gives its promises to the farmer and its allegiance to those who exploit him.

Since 1932 farm income has been doubled; 6,000,000 farmers, representing more than 80 percent of all farm families, have participated in an effective soil conservation program; the farm debt and the interest rate on farm debt have been reduced and farm foreclosures have been drastically curtailed; rural highways and farm-to-market roads have been vastly improved and extended; the surpluses on the farms have been used to feed the needy; low-cost electricity has been brought to 5,000,000 farm people as a result of the rural electrification program; thousands of impoverished farm families have been rehabilitated, and steps have been taken to stop the alarming growth of farm tenancy, to increase land ownership, and to mitigate the hardships of migratory farm labor.

We pledge ourselves:

To make parity as well as soil-conservation payments until such time as the goal of parity income for agriculture is realized.

To extend and enlarge the tenant-purchase program until every deserving tenant farmer has a real opportunity to have a farm of his own.

To refinance existing farm debts at lower interest rates and on longer and more flexible terms.

To continue to provide for adjustment of production through democratic processes to the extent that excess surpluses are capable of control.

To continue the program of rehabilitation of farmers who need and merit aid.

To preserve and strengthen the ever-normal granary on behalf of the national defense, the consumer at home and abroad, and the American farmer.

To continue to make commodity loans, to maintain the ever-normal granary, and to prevent destructively low prices.

To expand the domestic consumption of our surpluses by the food and cotton stamp plan, the free school lunch, low-cost milk, and other plans for bringing surplus farm commodities to needy consumers.

To continue our substantially increased appropriations for research and extension work through the land-grant colleges and for research laboratories established to develop new outlets for farm products.

To conserve the soil and water resources for the benefit of farmers and the Nation. In such conservation programs we shall, so far as practicable, bring about that development in forests and other permanent crops as will not unduly expand livestock and dairy products.

To safeguard the farmer's foreign markets and expand his domestic market for all domestic crops.

To enlarge the rural-electrification program.

To encourage farmer-owned and controlled cooperatives.

To continue the broad program launched by this administration for the coordinated development of our river basins through reclamation and irrigation, flood control, reforestation and soil conservation, stream purification, recreation, fish and game protection, low-cost power, and rural industry.

To encourage marketing agreements in aid of producers of dairy products, vegetables, fruits, and special types for the purpose of orderly marketing and the avoidance of unfair and wasteful practices.

To extend crop insurance from wheat to other crops as rapidly as experience justifies such extension.

To safeguard the family-sized farm in all our programs.

To finance these programs adequately in order that they may be effective.

In settling new lands reclaimed from the desert by projects like Grand Coulee, we shall give priority to homeless families who have lost their farms. As these new lands are brought into use, we shall continue by Federal purchase to retire from the plow submarginal lands, so that an increased percentage of our farmers may be able to live and work on good land.

These programs will continue to be in the hands of locally elected farmer committees to the largest extent possible. In this truly democratic way we will continue to bring economic security to the farmer and his family, while recognizing the dignity and freedom of American farm life.

INDUSTRY AND THE WORKER

Under Democratic auspices more has been done in the last 7 years to foster the essential freedom, dignity, and opportunity of the American worker than in any other administration in the Nation's history. In consequence, labor is today taking its rightful place as a partner of management in the common cause of higher earnings, industrial efficiency, national unity, and national defense.

A far-flung system of employment exchanges has brought together millions of idle workers and available jobs. The workers' right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing is being enforced. We have enlarged the Federal machinery for the mediation of labor disputes. We have enacted an effective wage and hour law. Child labor in factories has been outlawed. Prevailing wages to workers employed on Government contracts have been assured.

We pledge to continue to enforce fair labor standards; to maintain the principles of the National Labor Relations Act; to expand employment training and opportunity for our youth, older workers, and workers displaced by technological changes; to strengthen the orderly processes of collective bargaining and peaceful settlement of labor disputes; and to work always for a just distribution of our national income among those who labor.

We will continue our efforts to achieve equality of opportunity for men and women without impairing the social legislation which promotes true equality by safeguarding the health, safety, and economic welfare of women workers. The right to work for compensation in both public and private employment is an inalienable privilege of women as well as men, without distinction as to marital status.

The production of coal is one of our most important basic industries. Stability of production, employment, distribution, and price are indispensable to the public welfare.

We pledge continuation of the Federal Bituminous Coal Stabilization Act, and sympathetic consideration of the application of similar legislation to the anthracite-coal industry, in order to provide additional protection for the owners, miners, and consumers of hard coal.

We shall continue to emphasize the human element in industry and strive toward increasingly whole-hearted cooperation between labor and industrial management.

CAPITAL AND THE BUSINESSMAN

To make democracy strong, our system of business enterprise and individual initiative must be free to gear its tremendous productive capacity to serve the greatest good of the greatest number.

We have defended and will continue to defend all legitimate business.

We have attacked and will continue to attack unbridled concentration of economic power and the exploitation of the consumer and the investor.

We have attacked the kind of banking which treated America as a colonial empire to exploit; the kind of securities business which regarded the stock exchange as a private gambling club for wagering other people's money; the kind of public utility holding companies which used consumers' and investors' money to suborn a free press, bludgeon legislatures and political conventions and control elections against the interest of their customers and their surety holders.

We have attacked the kind of business which levied tribute on all the rest of American business by the extortionate methods of monopoly.

We did not stop with attack; we followed through the remedy. The American people found in themselves, through the democratic process, ability to meet the economic problems of average American business where concentrated power had failed.

We found a broken and prostrate banking and financial system. We restored it to health by strengthening banks, insurance companies, and other financial institutions. We have insured $62,000,000 bank accounts and protected millions of small investors in the security and commodity markets. We have thus revived confidence, safeguarded thrift and opened the road to all honorable business.

We have made credit at low interest rates available to small-business men, thus unfastening the oppressive yoke of a money monopoly and giving the ordinary citizen a chance to go into business and stay in business.

We recognize the importance of small-business concerns and new enterprises in our national economy, and favor the enactment of constructive legislation to safeguard the welfare of small business. Independent small-scale enterprise, no less than big business, should be adequately represented on appropriate governmental boards and commissions, and its interests should be examined and fostered by a continuous research program.

We have provided an important outlet for private capital by stimulating home building and low-rent housing projects. More new homes were built throughout the Nation last year than in any year since 1929.

We have fostered a well-balanced American merchant marine and the world's finest system of civil aeronautics to promote our commerce and our national defense.

We have steered a steady course between a bankruptcy-producing deflation and a thrift-destroying inflation, so that today the dollar is the most stable and sought after currency in the world—a factor of immeasurable benefit in our foreign and domestic commerce.

We shall continue to oppose barriers which impede trade among the several States. We pledge our best efforts in strengthening our home markets, and to this end we favor the adjustment of freight rates so that no section or State will have undue advantage over any other.

To encourage investment in productive enterprise, the tax-exempt privileges of future Federal, State, and local bonds should be removed.

We have enforced the antitrust laws more vigorously than at any time in our history, thus affording the maximum protection to the competitive system.

We favor strict supervision of all forms of the insurance business by the several States for the protection of policyholders and the public.

The full force of our policies, by raising the national income by $30,000,000,000 from the low of 1932, by encouraging vast reemployment, and by elevating the level of consumer demand, has quickened the flow of buying and selling through every artery of industry and trade.

With mass purchasing power restored and many abuses eliminated, American business stands at the threshold of a great new era richer in promise than any we have witnessed—an era of pioneering and progress beyond the present frontiers of economic activity—in transportation, in housing, in industrial expansion, and in the new utilization of the products of the farm and the factory.

We shall aid business in redeeming America's promise.

ELECTRIC POWER

During the past 7 years the Democratic Party has won the first major victories for the people of the Nation in their generation-old contest with the power monopoly.

These victories have resulted in the recognition of certain self-evident principles and the realization of vast benefits by the people. These principles, long opposed by the Republican Party, are:

That the power of falling water is a gift from God, and consequently belongs not to a privileged few, but to all the people, who are entitled to enjoy its benefits;

That the people have the right through their Government to develop their own power sites and bring low-cost electricity to their homes, farms, and factories;

That public-utility holding companies must not be permitted to serve as the means by which a few men can pyramid stocks upon stocks for the sole purpose of controlling vast power empires.

We condemn the Republican policies which permitted the victimizing of investors in the securities of private power corporations, and the exploitation of the people by unnecessarily high utility costs.

We condemn the opposition of utility power interests which delayed for years the development of national defense projects in the Tennessee Valley, and which obstructed river-basin improvements and other public projects bringing low-cost electric power to the people.

The successful power developments in the Tennessee and Columbia River Basins show the wisdom of the Democratic Party in establishing Government-owned and operated hydroelectric plants in the interests of power and light consumers.

Through these Democratic victories, whole regions have been revived and restored to prosperous habitation. Production costs have been reduced. Industries have been established which employ men and capital. Cheaper electricity has brought vast economic benefits to thousands of homes and communities.

These victories of the people must be safeguarded. They will be turned to defeat if the Republican Party should be returned to power. We pledge our party militantly to oppose every effort to encroach upon the inherent right of our people to be provided with this primary essential of life at the lowest possible cost.

The nomination of an utility executive by the Republican Party as its Presidential candidate raises squarely the issue, whether the Nation's water power shall be used for all the people or the selfish interests of a few. We accept that issue.

DEVELOPMENT OF WESTERN RESOURCES

We take satisfaction in pointing out the incomparable development of the public-land States under the wise and constructive legislation of this administration. Mining has been revived, agriculture fostered, reclamation extended, and natural resources developed as never before in a similar period.

We pledge the continuance of such policies, based primarily on the expansion of opportunity for the people, as will encourage the full development, free from financial exploitation, of the great resources—mineral, agricultural, livestock, fishing, and lumber—which the West affords.

RADIO

Radio has become an integral part of the democratically accepted doctrine of freedom of speech, press, assembly, and religion. We urge such legislative steps as may be required to afford the same protection from censorship that is now afforded the press under the Constitution of the United States.

We must strengthen democracy by improving the welfare of the people. We place human resources first among the assets of a democratic society.

UNEMPLOYMENT

The Democratic Party wages war on unemployment, one of the gravest problems of our times, inherited at its worst from the last Republican administration. Since we assumed office, 9,000,000 additional persons have gained regular employment in normal private enterprise. All our policies—financial, industrial, and agricultural—will continue to accelerate the rate of this progress.

By public action, where necessary to supplement private reemployment, we have rescued millions from idleness that breeds weakness and given them a real stake in their country's well-being. We shall continue to recognize the obligation of government to provide work for deserving workers who cannot be absorbed by private industry.

We are opposed to vesting in the States and local authorities the control of federally financed work relief. We belief that this Republican proposal is a thinly disguised plan to put the unemployed back on the dole.

We will continue energetically to direct our efforts toward the employment in private industry of all those willing to work, as well as the fullest employment of money and machines. This we pledge as our primary objective.

To further implement this objective, we favor calling, under the direction of the President, a national unemployment conference of leaders of government, industry, labor, and farm groups. There is work in our factories, mines, fields, forests, and river basins; on our coasts, highways, railroads, and inland waterways. There are houses to be built to shelter our people. Building a better America means work and a higher standard of living for every family and a richer and more secure heritage for every American.

SOCIAL SECURITY

The Democratic Party, which established social security for the Nation, is dedicated to its extension. We pledge to make the Social Security Act increasingly effective by covering millions of persons not now protected under its terms; by strengthening our unemployment-insurance system and establishing more adequate and uniform benefits, through the Federal equalization fund principle, by progressively extending and increasing the benefits of the old-age and survivors' insurance system, including protection of the permanently disabled, and by the early realization of a minimum pension for all who have reached the age of retirement and are not gainfully employed.

HEALTH

Good health for all the people is a prime requisite of national preparedness in its broadest sense. We have advanced public health, industrial hygiene, and maternal and child care. We are coordinating the health functions of the Federal Government. We pledge to expand these efforts and to provide more hospitals and health centers and better health protection wherever the need exists in rural and urban areas, all through the cooperative efforts of the Federal, State, and local governments, the medical, dental, nursing, and other scientific professions and the voluntary agencies.

YOUTH AND EDUCATION

Today, when the youth of other lands is being sacrificed in war, this Nation recognizes the full value of the sound youth program established by the administration. The National Youth Administration and Civilian Conservation Corps have enabled our youths to complete their education, have maintained their health, trained them for useful citizenship and aided them to secure employment.

Our public works have modernized and greatly expanded the Nation's schools. We have increased Federal aid for vocational education and rehabilitation and undertaken a comprehensive program of defense-industry training. We shall continue to bring to millions of children, youths, and adults the educational and economic opportunities otherwise beyond their reach.

SLUM CLEARANCE AND LOW-RENT HOUSING

We have launched a soundly conceived plan of loans and contributions to rid America of overcrowded slum dwellings that breed disease and crime, and to replace them by low-cost housing projects within the means of low-income families.

We will extend and accelerate this plan not only in the congested city districts, but also in the small towns and farm areas, and we will make a powerful arm of national defense by supplying housing for the families of enlisted personnel and for workers in areas where industry is expanding to meet defense needs.

CONSUMERS

We are taking effective steps to insure that, in this period of stress, the cost of living shall not be increased by speculation and unjustified price rises.

NEGROES

Our Negro citizens have participated actively in the economic and social advances launched by this Administration, including fair labor standards, social security benefits, health protection, work relief projects, decent housing, aid to education, and the rehabilitation of low-income farm families. We have aided more than half a million Negro youths in vocational training education and employment.

We shall continue to strive for complete legislative safeguards against discrimination in Government service and benefits, and in the national defense forces. We pledge to uphold due process and the equal protection of the laws for every citizen, regardless of race, creed, or color.

VETERANS

We pledge to continue our policy of fair treatment of America's war veterans and their dependents, in just tribute to their sacrifices and their devotion to the cause of liberty.

INDIANS

We favor and pledge the enactment of legislation creating an Indian Claims Commission for the special purpose of entertaining and investigating claims presented by Indian groups, bands, and tribes, in order that our Indian citizens may have their claims against the Government considered, adjusted, and finally settled at the earliest possible date.

CIVIL SERVICE

We pledge the immediate extension of a genuine system of merit to all positions in the executive branch of the Federal Government except actual bona fide policy-making positions. The competitive method of selecting employees shall be improved until experience and qualification shall be the sole test in determining fitness for employment in the Federal service. Promotion and tenure in Federal service shall likewise depend upon fitness, experience, and qualification. Arbitrary and unreasonable rules as to academic training shall be abolished, all to the end that a genuine system of efficiency and merit shall prevail throughout the entire Federal service.

TERRITORIES AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

We favor a larger measure of self-government leading to statehood for Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico. We favor the appointment of residents to office, and equal treatment of the citizens of each of these three Territories. We favor the prompt determination and payment of any just claims by Indian and Eskimo citizens of Alaska against the United States.

We also favor the extension of the right of suffrage to the people of the District of Columbia.

We pledge to continue to stand guard on our true first line of defense—the security and welfare of the men, women, and children of America.

OUR DEMOCRATIC FAITH

Democracy is more than a political system for the government of a people. It is the expression of a people's faith in themselves as human beings. If this faith is permitted to die, human progress will die with it.

We believe that a mechanized existence, lacking the spiritual quality of democracy, is intolerable to the free people of this country.

We therefore pledge ourselves to fight, as your fathers fought, for the right of every American to enjoy freedom of religion, speech, press, assembly, petition, and security in his home.

It is America's destiny, in these days of rampant despotism, to be the guardian of the world heritage of liberty and to hold aloft and aflame the torch of western civilization.

The Democratic Party rededicates itself to this faith in democracy, to the defense of the American system of government, the only system under which men are masters of their own souls, the only system under which the American people, composed of many races and creeds, can live and work, play and worship in peace, security, and freedom.

Firmly relying upon a continuation of the blessings of Divine Providence upon all our righteous endeavors to preserve forever the priceless heritage of American liberty and peace, we appeal to all the liberal-minded men and women of the Nation to approve this platform and to go forward with us by wholeheartedly supporting the candidates who subscribe to the principles which it proclaims.

Nominating Hon. Henry A. Wallace for the Vice Presidency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY FRANK O'CONNOR, OF IOWA

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the able and eloquent address delivered at the Democratic National Convention by Hon. Frank O'Connor, of Iowa, in which he nominated for the Vice Presidency Hon. Henry A. Wallace, of Iowa.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the convention, in my trial heat this afternoon my time was 5 minutes and 20 seconds, and I hope I may beat that tonight.

Last night this convention, responsive to the demands of the hour, named for the Presidential nomination America's great humanitarian, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt.

We come now to a duty of almost equal importance—the selection of a candidate for Vice President. So let us as loyal Americans, conscious of the grave responsibilities resting upon us in this eventful hour, invoke Divine guidance that we may give to the solemn task the best that is in our hearts and in our minds.

Iowa presents to you a man who possesses every quality and virtue essential in the high office of the Vice President and, by that same token, equipped for the office of President of these United States.

In addition to his natural and acquired qualifications, it would seem the hand of destiny has fashioned him for leadership in this tragic hour.

For 50 years prior to 1932 the Republican Party sat in conclave within its sanctified precincts, to which few were admitted, and wrote off as safely Republican the agricultural States of this Union, and rarely were they disappointed. For this unequaled contribution it paid no price except in words. Retribution, however, may not always be swift, but that it is sure is inevitable.

For many years the organized farmers of all parties sought congressional action under Republican control, only to be thwarted and scorned by contemptuous party leaders who declined to share the profits of labor and sacrifice with those who toil on the farms of America.

The forces in that crucial conflict came to desperate grips in the memorable campaign of 1928 when the brave and the weaklings were separated and counted. Leading the band of warriors who fought and bled for the cause of agriculture was the candidate whose name I shall presently submit.

Our candidate, the best mind, I think, in that great contest, marched behind the banner of Alfred E. Smith who with his party espoused the farmer's cause in this Republic. That banner trailed in defeat, but it was lifted again to victory under the leadership of President Roosevelt in 1932 and it still flutters triumphantly, an inspiration to the millions who live on the farms of America.

The President called to his Cabinet the outstanding exponent of agricultural rights in America as Secretary of Agriculture—our candidate and, I hope, your candidate.

For 8 years he sat beside the President and I know, as I think you do, he has been the trusted adviser of the President, not alone in matters of agriculture, but in the broader field of national and international action. Need I remind you that already the economic forces which are certain to follow this tragic war are to meet in conflict in the Western Hemisphere?

Our relations with the great republics of the south are of transcendent importance. Our foreign trade so vital to national welfare may be largely shifted to the Western Hemisphere.

Our candidate is as well if not better informed in this field than any other American statesman. He has worked in close association with that honored American statesman, the Honorable Cordell Hull, and I know he enjoys the confidence and friendship of the great Secretary of State.

May I in passing, delegates, remind you that our candiate, busy as you know he is, has mastered the Spanish language and has on different occasions over the radio spoken to our actual and potential customers in South America in their own tongue. Our candidate is not alone the symbol of agricultural aspirations. He is a scholar, a student of international affairs, a profound statesman of conviction and courage. He is in intimate touch not alone with agricultural leaders, but is, and for many years has been, in constant touch with those who guide the destinies of labor and industry. It is his mind to unify these groups in the interests of a greater and more secure United States—a task from which many others have shrunk, but not the resolute candidate for whom I speak.

The supreme modesty of our candidate is an index of his greatness. Underneath a quiet, simple demeanor, beats a heart aflame for every human right and a mind trained and hardened and equipped to meet any problem of government within or without the Presidency in the light of the best American traditions.

Does the Democratic Party need such a man in this epochal hour? Let me reply in a word.

The Republican Party after 8 years of meditation, lean and hungry and craving for a return of its glorious days of the past, took prayerful stock at Philadelphia and, facing with synthetic smiles the farmers of America, played their trump card to bring agricultural States back to their thin-clad fold. The ace is the leader, not of agriculture, but the Republican minority leader of the United States Senate.

This man in the years ago gave his name to a bill for agricultural relief, but the owners of his party repudiated it and crucified agriculture and this candidate complacently bowed his head in that tragic hour of crucifixion. Now the destroyers in their day of agriculture carefully lift the drooping head of the Republican Senate leader and across his noble brow they write in easily erasable chalk-white letters, "The Farmers' Friend."

Against this devious deceptive thrust let this convention give to the Nation, not simply a name, but a man who has given his heart to the cause of American agriculture and to social and economic justice; one who has been the field marshal for two decades of tens of millions of American citizens on the farms of our country.

A man of rare and unexcelled integrity of the very highest intelligence; a man who in his public and private life has never betrayed a friend or a principle; a man of ripe experience for these ominous times; one who holds the unquestioned respect of all groups within the party. A God-fearing, modest American of the highest character, worthy of and equipped superbly to meet the responsibilities of any public trust.

Iowa, the greatest agricultural State in the Union, gives to this convention and to the Democratic Party its illustrious, distinguished son, Henry Wallace, for the nomination of Vice President of the United States.

Nominating Hon. James A. Farley for President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. CARTER GLASS, OF VIRGINIA

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] at the recent Democratic National Convention in Chicago, Ill., placing in nomination for the Presidency Hon. James A. Farley, of New York.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the National Democratic Convention, there is no material consideration and few spiritual reasons that can draw me from a sick room halfway across the continent to speak a brief word to this national convention of the great Democratic Party. But among these spiritual considerations, first of all, is a desire to present to this convention the name of an incomparable Democrat who has conducted the affairs of the Democratic Party for 7 years in a way that no other man within my recollection of 40 years of public service has ever done.

Always eager to be an intense partisan, always eager to have his party win, nevertheless, he was a man of such a type of patriotism as always to put his country above party considerations, a genius in matters of a political nature, so thoroughly well versed in the sentiment and observance of the action of the people of the United States as to have twice predicted the success in this party so accurately as that he claimed but two States in the Union would go against his party.

He is not only a man of loyal attachment to the Democratic Party, but there is no manner of personal or political reward that would sufficiently secure him for the sacrifices he has made to his party. A man of character and intelligence, a man on whose word every human being can always rely, a man who never in all his lifetime ever violated a pledge once given, a man who believes in the unwritten law and the traditions of the Democratic Party as advocated ever since the day of Thomas Jefferson, who less than 3 years before his death appealed to the party which he established never to nominate a man for the third term for the Presidency; and Virginia, always mindful of the principles enunciated by Thomas Jefferson as immortal, stands today unmoved, from any source, from the principles advocated by the founder of the Democratic Party; and through consideration for the party itself, for its success and perpetuity, I have come from a sickbed to present to this convention the name of a great Democrat, James A. Farley, of New York. If nominated by this convention there will not be a shadow of doubt as to his election next November.

Let me say this word in conclusion, since I have been sitting on this platform I have had two anonymous communications objecting to Jim Farley because he is a Catholic. When I reflect that one of the three achievements of Thomas Jefferson which he most valued was the Virginia statute in favor of religious freedom, it made me more determined to present his name than I otherwise would be.

SECONDING SPEECH OF HON. PAT DOYLE, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. Chairman, delegates to the national convention, ladies and gentlemen, I promise that I shall be very brief. [Applause and cheers.] As a member of the Massachusetts delegation, the only delegation in this Nation pledged to James A. Farley, I am proud to have been chosen to second his nomination. [Applause and cheers.]

There is no need for me to stand upon this platform and to extol the virtues, the loyalty, and the tremendously effective work that has been done by Jim Farley for the Democratic Party. [Applause and cheers.] All those things are known to everyone in this assemblage, to every Democrat in this Nation, to every American whether he be a Republican or a Democrat. [Applause.]

The Massachusetts delegation pledged itself to Jim Farley because it had an abounding faith in his ability, his integrity, his unselfish devotion to the splendid cause of our great democracy. [Applause.] No other State in this great Nation has any more admiration, respect, or understanding of the great achievements of our great national leader, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, than have the members of the Massachusetts delegation. We know that his administration will go down in American history as among the greatest and most beneficial ever enjoyed by our people. None can challenge our deep sentiment of appreciation for the magnificent work which President Roosevelt has accomplished. [Applause.]

But we of Massachusetts have pledged our word to Farley. [Applause.] The name of Farley in this country is synonymous with straight shooting. [Applause.] We who have given our word, we who have been elected by the Democrats of Massachusetts to come to the Democratic Convention to vote for Jim Farley, want to show him, our true friend and outstanding leader, that we in the old Bay State know what it means to make a pledge and keep it [applause] even in the face of a difficult situation.

Therefore, in the name of those men and women who went to the polls and instructed us to cast our vote for Jim Farley, and in the name of those delegates from Massachusetts who are with Farley, I stand here tonight honored and privileged to second the nomination for President of the United States of a great and true Democrat, beloved by everyone, the Honorable James A. Farley, of New York. [Applause.]

SECONDING SPEECH OF HON. RAYMOND M. FISHER, OF NEW YORK

Senator BARKLEY, fellow delegates, and your guests, it is a distinct privilege to second the nomination of my friend and yours. For upward of a quarter of a century I have been associated with him in public life. He and I are neighbors. We are Rockland County home-town boys. I have watched his advancement step by step from town clerk of the town of Stony Point to the office of the Postmaster General of the United States in the Cabinet of our President [applause], from a district committeeman in his district at Grassy Point to the chairmanship of this great national organization. Back home he has long since been known for an unflinching loyalty, a thorough application to duty, and a genial personality.

You, too, over the years, have grown to love him for these splendid attributes of character. To say more to any group of Democrats assembled at any place at any time is, in my opinion, unnecessary. It is therefore my honor to second the nomination for the Presidency of the United States of the Honorable James A. Farley, of New York. [Applause.]

SECONDING SPEECH OF PANAMA CANAL ZONE

Mr. Chairman, the delegation representing the district of the Canal Zone, down low in the roll call, but high up in the admiration of the unsurpassed administration of our beloved President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, in obedience to our unit rule, directs me to inform this convention and the outstanding organizer who has marshalled perhaps the friendliest, the most loyal, and the strongest political family in the history of our great party, that they affectionately put their arms around him in the old way, the American way, the only way, by seconding the nomination for President of the United States that upstanding American statesman, the distinguished Postmaster General, James A. Farley. [Applause.]

Second Session Democratic National Convention

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES A. FARLEY

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley at the second session of the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, Ill., on July 15, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As I stand here facing the representatives of democracy, I am overwhelmed by a flood of recollections. It was here 8 years ago we met in the midst of a great emergency with a mission to save America. I need not detail to you, my friends and colleagues, how grave were the conditions of our country. We reached here through a lane of idle factories; farm products were rotting on the farms and in the market places; the great banks of this city were struggling to head off the menace of financial panic, as were the banks in every other city, town, and hamlet of the country. The riot of unbridled speculation had brought its day of reckoning. Nobody knew what tomorrow would bring forth. We did our job then and

I am sure we will do it today, fearlessly, patriotically, and with the single purpose of continuing the onward march of progress which was started in this hall 8 years ago.

We meet again in the face of another vast emergency. It is a different crisis that confronts us now, and one perhaps as grave or even graver than the other. The next administration must continue the wise policy undertaken by the government now in power at Washington—the policy of keeping this Nation at peace in a warmad world while building up a national defense so stout, so strong that no combination of foreign foes will dare to attack us. I am sure that this convention will realize its responsibilities. I am sure of this because I see hundreds of familitr faces, the faces of men and women who have been tried and who have shown themselves worthy of the high trust imposed on them by their party. Nor is there any doubt about the new people who are serving as delegates to this convention. Every one of you whose history I know has labored shoulder to shoulder with the party veterans. You are all loyal soldiers gathered here to defend a worthy cause.

A short time ago an effort was made to pin the odious label of "war party" on the Democratic Party. Like all misguided political actions, the effort fell of its own weight. The people of America still possess their critical faculties; they know the difference between leaders who face realities with courage and frankness and leaders who are so blinded by partisanship that they mistake one of the great tragedies of history for a phony war.

This administration has given its solemn pledge that no American boy will be sent to die on the battlefields of Europe, and this compact will be kept. There may be differences of opinion among Democrats on other issues, but on this determination there is absolute unity.

I esteem it an honor and a high privilege to open this convention and to present to you your temporary organization. That is one of the functions of the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, the proudest post I ever held. I have been given credit for many elements in Democratic success during the past 8 years. Let me tell you now that our success was not due to me but to the loyal work of the national committee members, the State organizations, the county organizations, and the workers under them.

We won a glorious victory in 1932. That victory was due to the splendid efforts mainly of men and women without title, without official place, and with no incentive beyond their faith in our nominees and in the principles of the party.

We won another great national victory in 1936, and again let me bestow the credit for the achievement on the precinct and district captains and the people who, under their leadership, labored day and night to spread the doctrine of democracy and to see to it that the people who shared their views came to the polls and voted their convictions. It was possible that we might have won without such strenuous work, but that proud record of carrying 46 of the 48 States could never have been attained except for the unstinted service of those whose sole reward was the glow of victory and the feeling that they had done their part in continuing the progress of the country.

I shall never cease to be grateful to these faithful folks.

When the history of this troubled period is written the two administrations in which we have been privileged to play a part will be given their rightful place among the bright pages of national achievement. Posterity will understand and appreciate the record of these administrations. It is a story of high purpose and worthy action, untarnished by breach of trust or sordid scandals. A program of liberal policies has been written into law dedicated to the well-being of all the people, which had its roots in the everlasting principles of just government laid down by Jefferson and by Jackson. You will hear these accomplishments discussed in detail by the able speakers who follow me on this platform. These achievements constitute the record on which we propose to wage the coming campaign. The choice lies between a party still unable to cope with the conditions and problems of the twentieth century and a party which has made this Nation the last stronghold of genuine democracy in a world of violence and ruthless force. That is the issue, and the whole issue.

In this tribute to the administration that saved the country from complete collapse and started it anew on the road to prosperity, we must not forget the Democratic Congresses which have done their part. True, there have been some issues on which the Members of the national legislative bodies have divided. That is democracy. If there was not this liberty of opinion and the freedom to exercise individual judgment, then indeed we would have a dictatorship. But so long as all of us have the privilege of saying what we think and the right to maintain and work for the enactment of our own ideas and ideals, there can be no threat to our representative form of government.

Our Congresses during the past 8 years have worked sincerely for the betterment of the country, and the results stand as a monument to the sincere patriotism of those who make our laws, representing the combined wisdom of the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

We have heard sharp debates when differences of opinion have arisen. We have heard charges of dictatorship, but actually the total that has gone on the statute books has been the will of the country expressed through the representatives elected by the people to express that will. These differences have no more significance than the ripples on the sea or even the storm waves that rise and pass, leaving the ocean still a great international highway.

For a measure of the service done by the Democratic administration we have only to compare our domestic situation today with what it was when we put a great President in office to repair the damages inflicted by inept and incompetent Republican administrations and elected with him a Democratic Congress that did not falter at the magnitude of the task with which it was entrusted. That task is by no means completed, and when we consider the additional burden imposed by the course of the war overseas, we must realize to the full the responsibilities of this convention. We cannot, of course, ignore what is happening on the other continents. It is going to take the best there is in statesmanship to preserve our liberties. We have not wished for the conditions that have forced us to fashion the greatest navy in the world or to recruit an army of wartime strength.

We have committed ourselves, not only to protect our own continental territory and its outlying possessions, but circumstances have compelled us to pledge a defense of the Monroe Doctrine, which forbids foreign aggression to our sister nations on the American continent. A hundred years ago, when we were still small and weak in comparison with the great military nations, we adopted a doctrine as part of our own defensive system and policy to keep all America American. This course we deemed necessary for our own well-being, and for a century we have kept this hemisphere safe from colonization or conquest by any predatory power. Whether we like it or not, we must continue that policy.

Under these circumstances, is there a man on this floor, or a real American within the sound of my voice, who should be willing to take the Government out of the hands of the party that has kept the faith and place it in the inexperienced hands of those who aspire to regain control of the Government?

We cannot afford to assume that the efforts of the minority party can be ignored or dismissed as futile. It may well be that we may look forward to a victory in November as great as that we won 4 years ago, but we cannot take anything for granted. The opposition is not only hungry for power, but it has enormous resources and will fight desperately and with every political weapon to win. We know, of course, that we have a vast majority of the country with us, but unless we give the country a ticket and a platform that will satisfy the majority, we have no certainty of victory. Moreover, though the Nation's sentiment may be on our side, that sentiment will not be expressed unless we get our people, and all our people, to the polls. More than one election has been lost because of overconfidence. That over-confidence causes lack of organization, and impels people to think of their private grudges rather than of their public duty. A united Democracy with such a record as we have made in the past 8 years can only be defeated by itself. I mean by that that a lukewarm campaign, a belief on the part of one citizen that his vote isn't needed because the other voters will take care of the situation, constitutes our only danger. So I want to urge here on the delegates who will name the standard-bearers of the party, and adopt the party platform, that their duties as citizens will not end with this convention.

They have been given great responsibility as the peoples' representatives to choose the government under which we shall live for the next 4 years. They are men of standing in their communities and of influence in their States. I ask every one of them when they leave this hall, when their work here is done, to take up with enthusiasm and devotion the job that they as leading Democrats must do. They have been honored by their party. They can only repay this favor by devoting themselves to the completion of the task of which the convention's program is only the first step. It devolves on them to be the leaders of democracy in this campaign.

And now, men and women of the Democratic National Convention, it becomes my duty to relinquish the gavel and present to you the temporary officers who will guide your proceedings until you have expressed your views as to the permanent organization. Mine has been a happy service. I have had the hearty support and cooperation of the national committee, which now goes out of existence, and I want to thank the members from the bottom of my heart, on my own behalf and on behalf of the Democratic Party whose interests they have so sincerely guarded. Let me thank also the delegates to this convention who have done everything possible to expedite and make easier the business of this meeting. I know that your new organization will not let the Democratic Party down, and I firmly believe that every member of this great gathering will give our successors and the new national party organization the same support that was accorded to the national committees in 1932 and 1936; and, if that is so, let me promise you now another triumph next November.

PRECONVENTION RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES A. FARLEY

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a preconvention radio address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, on the evening of July 14, 1940, from Chicago, Ill.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A national convention is one of the great political institutions of America. This is especially true of the Democratic Convention which opens here tomorrow.

The Democratic Party is the oldest continuing political body in the United States. More than a century ago it was founded by Thomas Jefferson, who saw the need of welding the mass of citizens into a compact organization for the expression of their views on public questions. In Jefferson's day, the task of choosing Presidential and Vice-Presidential nominees was delegated to a caucus of party members in the House of Representatives. The method was changed some years later under the leadership of Andrew Jackson and his supporters, who wished to give the people a more direct voice in the selection of candidates. The convention system was adopted as the best method for accomplishing this purpose and from that time onward, almost without exception, it has been practiced by all parties in selecting their nominees.

The people of this country look forward to these conventions with eager anticipation, first, because of their interest in the selection of the party standard bearers, and second, because by the new methods of communication, they are able to get such an intimate and complete picture of the workings of an important phase of democratic government. The average citizen may now sit comfortably in the family living room and listen to the deliberations as they take place in the convention hall.

The convention system, of course, is not perfect. But it has become a permanent fixture of popular government, and I honestly think that any attempt to substitute another method of selecting Presidential nominees would be a mistake.

The interest in the convention now assembling here is perhaps greater than usual because of the third-term question. I regret that it is impossible for me, for obvious reasons, to comment on what may or may not take place. I can only counsel patience even though we Americans are seldom patient when events of great magnitude are about to take place. In any event, I can assure you that the proceedings of the convention will be well worth hearing.

Although the formal opening of the convention takes place at noon tomorrow, actually the work of preparation has been going on for months. A group of committee employees has been out here since April studying the facilities of Chicago Stadium and drawing plans to make use of every available inch of space. This past week, however, the preliminary work really began in earnest. The platform committee started its deliberations under the direction of Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, of New York, and the other preconvention details were disposed of by the national committee at a meeting on Friday. Everything is in readiness for the fall of the gavel tomorrow.

I have been active in party affairs for many years now, and for one who has an interest in politics there is no thrill like that afforded by a national convention. For the brief period of a few days, the convention city becomes the crossroads of America. The delegates come from huge cities, from towns, and villages, and from rural areas. They know what the people of America are thinking about, and they are able to give a cross section of opinion better than any other group that could be brought together. I try to visit with as many delegates as possible in order to learn their views and to find what the people of America really want.

This year the interest in foreign affairs is greater than ever because of the tragic events which are taking place across the ocean in Europe. There is some minor difference of opinion as to the stand which the party should take in relation to the party declaration on foreign policy, but there is no division on the vital question of building up the defenses of the United States. I think that, without exception, the people are behind the efforts of the administration to provide a defense force which will be adequate to meet the challenge of any possible combination of foreign powers.

In advance of the party platform and the choice of nominees it would be an act of presumption on my part to predict the course of the coming campaign. However, there is no question that the Democratic Party will make its bid on the record of the Roosevelt administration during the past 8 years in office. There is a crisis at hand today which calls for the highest order of statesmanship to bring this country safely through. There was a crisis of a different character in 1932 and the Democratic Party was given the task of finding a way out. There would be no purpose in my telling you that everything which has been done since then by the Roosevelt administration is perfect. But I think every fair-minded person should be ready to agree that many excellent things have been accomplished and that the Democratic Party did the job better than it could have been done by any other party. The basic reforms written into law at Washington for the benefit of all the people will not be undone in our lifetime.

The next 4 years will be crucial for the welfare of the United States. The peaceful world of a few years ago has disappeared and a long time may elapse before normal trade relations between nations are resumed. The man elected by the people to guide the destinies of the Nation will find himself facing problems of tremendous importance. He will be required to move with caution, prudence, and wise understanding to safeguard the interests of the country in the atmosphere of hatred and suspicion which will come after this war as it has after every war in the past.

Under these circumstances partisan considerations will carry less weight with the voters than they have in the past. The one problem for all of us, as loyal Americans, is to find the man best equipped to conduct the affairs of the Nation in such a time.

The first question for the voters to decide is whether the men charged with the conduct of foreign affairs for the past few years have lived up to their responsibilities in adequate fashion. It is my opinion that they have. The administration foresaw the coming of the European war and did everything possible to cushion the national economy against the expected shock. Without becoming involved in any way, the administration spokesmen from first to last raised a mighty voice for peace in an effort to prevent the dreadful carnage which has since taken place. The spokesmen for the opposition party were less farseeing in their attitude. They refused to believe that war was coming, and when it did break out they failed to understand the frightful course which it was about to take. They called it a phony war and made the fatal blunder of assuming that it would be fought to a stalemate on the battlefields of Europe with no possible danger to this country.

The speed with which the new defense program was gotten under way was due in large measure to the fact that the administration had been laying a solid groundwork for such expansion throughout the past 7 years. President Roosevelt has always had a deep and sympathetic interest in the Navy. When he took over in March 1933 the Nation's first line of defense was far weaker than it should have been in ships and men. The construction of battleships had stopped completely and many of the vessels of the line were becoming obsolete. The personnel had been cut so drastically that ships were laid up in drydock because there were too few men to operate them. All this was done in the name of economy.

The task of rebuilding was begun at once. This is a slow process, because naval vessels cannot be constructed in a hurry. The work was carried out so well, however, that when the present emergency occurred this spring more than 130 new ships were either completed or well on their way. As a result of this wise program, undertaken in time, the United States Navy is now generally looked upon as the equal of any in the world, and in many respects the best of all.

It should be borne in mind that we want armaments primarily for defense and that the Navy is still our first line of protection against an invading foe. A hostile force, coming across the Atlantic, and attempting to land here, would find the rebuilt Navy standing squarely across its path. The air forces of the Army and Navy have also been expanded, giving us a double line of protection.

The Democratic Party will wage this campaign on its record in foreign and domestic affairs. The problems of the past 7½ years have been numerous and difficult. It has been a time of chacs and upheaval all over the world. The administration does not claim to have achieved perfection. Yet it has brought this Nation safely through in better shape than any other country in the world. The cause of democracy and popular government has been served because the average citizen appreciates that the administration has tried to safeguard his economic and social needs.

A solemn duty rests upon the Democratic convention which opens tomorrow. I think the last few years have shown that the party leadership is capable of living up to that duty.

CONVENTION RESOLUTION THANKING CHAIRMAN FARLEY FOR HIS SERVICES

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the following matters relative to Hon. James A. Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee:

A resolution adopted by the Democratic National Convention on July 16, thanking Mr. Farley for his services.

A motion made by Mr. Farley on July 17 to make unanimous the nomination of President Roosevelt.

A statement issued by Mr. Farley on July 19.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved, That this convention take this occasion to testify our sense of obligation to the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, whose service to his party and to his country is unparalleled in the history of political organizations.

James A. Farley has for 8 years given himself unreservedly to the interests of good government. He told us yesterday that the credit belonged not to him for our unfailing successes during his regime but to the workers of the party. We wish to go on record that without derogation of the value of the loyal support that has been accorded him by the rank and file of our organization—from the high officers to the unnamed workers in the field—that it was the leadership of our organization chief that made their efforts effective, and that therefore we feel that the credit he disclaims still belongs to him.

For his patience, his urbanity, his willingness to listen and to heed the counsel and advice of every member of the party, high and low, he has endeared himself to the whole personnel of the Democratic Party, and as a tribute to the affection and regard for James A. Farley as a friend, as a leader, and as a magnificent administrator of a great and difficult office, we hereby move that the delegates of this convention stand and put this resolution into the annals of our history.

MOTION OF HON. JAMES A. FARLEY TO MAKE NOMINATION OF PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT UNANIMOUS

Senator BARKLEY and fellow Democrats, you have given me on two occasions the highest honor within your gift, chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee. I ask you now for a further courtesy. I ask your indulgence so that I may deliver without interruption a brief message to this great convention.

I have pursued a course here that has been dictated by the deepest convictions, and when a man fails to follow his sincere convictions, no matter how unpleasant the consequences, he is false to himself, false to his party, and false to his country.

I wanted this convention to proceed as Democrats should proceed, to nominate its standard bearers in keeping with the high traditions of our party. That is the only Democratic method and that has been observed.

My name was placed in nomination for the Presidency of the United States by a great and noble American. As long as I live I shall be grateful to Senator CARTER GLASS of Virginia. I am grateful to those delegates to this great convention who voted for me and for those delegates who would have voted for me if they had not been otherwise pledged.

Down through the years I have always given my best efforts to advance the cause of democracy, and I want this great convention of Democrats to know that I will give that same support to the nominees of this convention.

It is therefore a great pleasure for me, Senator BARKLEY, to move to suspend the rules and declare President Franklin D. Roosevelt nominated for President of the United States by acclamation.

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES A. FARLEY

Eight years ago in this city I was elected chairman of the Democratic National Committee. In the intervening years I have had the happiest associations with Democrats all over the country, and my debt to the party can never be repaid.

I have remained in public life at great financial sacrifice, because I love politics. I have an opportunity now to accept an attractive offer in business and in justice to my family, because of my financial situation, I am going to accept.

Before leaving, I shall cooperate to the fullest extent with my successor as national chairman in setting up the machinery for the coming campaign. I have said repeatedly that the American people want the Democratic Party to remain in power. My opinion has not changed, and again I pledge my full support to the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket.

LETTER FROM GOVERNOR PAYNE RATNER OF KANSAS TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND LETTER FROM HON. ARTHUR CAPPER OF KANSAS TO WILLIAM S. KNUDSEN

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from the Honorable Payne Ratner, Governor of Kansas, to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, relative to the location of national-defense industries.

Governor Ratner, very properly, takes the position that the national interest will be best served if a fair proportion of these industries be allocated to the interior of the United States. Governor Ratner also points out that cheap fuel, high-type labor, and adequate transportation facilities are available in Kansas and the Midwest.

Governor Ratner further points to the dangers of a national defense policy which would tend to accentuate still further the present lack of economic balance between agriculture and industry.

In this connection, Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed, immediately following Governor Ratner's letter, a letter from myself to Mr. William S. Knudsen, of the Advisory Commission to the Council of National Defense, on the same subject. I send both letters to the desk to be printed in the Appendix.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., July 8, 1940.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Through representatives of the Kansas Industrial Development Commission now in Washington, I learn that the National Defense Commission will soon make decisions as to the geographical allocation of new and expanding defense industries. These decisions will have a profound effect not only upon the military security of this country but upon the economic future of the United States for years to come, particularly in Midwestern States such as Kansas.

You have expressed the importance of locating industrial defense plants in the interior for military reasons. However, there appears to be a tendency, in the haste for defense armament, to concentrate defense industries in those seaboard regions already highly industrialized. I know your administrative staff and Defense Commission have given expert consideration to the location of defense industries for the military reasons which you have pointed out. As Governor of one State in the great Midwestern area, I wish to urge that you also give additional serious thought to the economic questions involved in the location of these industries.

We in the Midwest, as all other patriotic Americans, are deeply concerned that our national-defense program goes forward with the greatest possible speed. That is paramount, of course, to our national security. But we are also concerned that the preparation of our defense and the expansion and construction of new industries involved do not permanently damage our national economy.

I represent one of many States whose chief industry is agriculture. We produce a great abundance of raw materials, chiefly agricultural, but in addition our production includes great mineral and other natural resources valuable for defense. Cheap fuel, high-type labor, and adequate transportation facilities are all available in Kansas and the Midwest. We hope that our resources in this great Midwest area can be utilized for the greatest possible national good during this critical period.

We stand at the crossroads of the Nation's economic and industrial future. One road—marked by the proper distribution of industrial-defense expansion—leads to speedy and efficient national defense, with proper protection of our national economic structure. The other road—along which proper thought is not given to the location of defense industries—may lead to an equally speedy defense program, but it also leads to grave military and economic perils. Overcentralization of defense industries will increase vulnerability to concentrated attack and endanger the economic and social structures of the Middle West area should it not share in the expansion.

Of highest importance is the problem of getting the national-defense program under way as speedily as possible. We must use all available plants capable of producing defense needs to their fullest capacity. They should be expanded where such expansion can be made swiftly. But this is a long-range program, too great for present industries alone. New plants must be built and new locations selected. For both military and economic reasons, I urge that this expansion include the Midwest.

Weeks ago I requested representatives of the Kansas Industrial Development Commission to go to Washington to offer the resources of Kansas to the Nation in the preparedness program then getting under way. Since then, the commission representatives have been contacting officials in Washington, making known the resources which are available in Kansas, and pointing out the advantages of locating defense industries in the Midwest.

If the expansion of defense industries is confined to the east and west coasts, the Midwest will be drained of its young men who will seek jobs in established industrial centers. Thousands will join a great migration from central United States to the coasts, leaving Midwest States without the manpower required for agricultural and industrial work. Here in Kansas and the Midwest we rely on agriculture as our basic industry and we hope that it will always remain so but we do need a sufficient industrial economy to make a proper balance so this region can be reasonably prosperous.

Those sections of the country where industry and agriculture have been in proper balance have always made economic progress. Here in the great agricultural producing area of the United States there is now an opportunity to establish an industrial future which should greatly relieve the serious farm problem and its attendant economic ills. This can be done in harmony with proper military defense plans which constitute our immediate need.

Extension of defense industries into the Midwest area would afford the opportunity for decentralizing defense production into sufficiently widespread units to assure maximum safety against attack. The cities and towns of the Midwest are so close to the sources of supplies and natural resources that efficiency in production would be maintained.

I realize that detailed and specific information as to the material and natural advantages of this area is of vital importance. Kansas is ready to supply pertinent information pertaining to our own State. I am sure that other Midwestern States are prepared to do the same. Representatives of Kansas who are now in Washington have much such information with them, and agencies such as the Kansas Industrial Development Commission and the Kansas Planning Board are now securing other data which will be presented. This information can be checked against the data available as a result of previous studies made by the National Resources Planning Board and other Federal agencies.

I urge that the National Defense Commission give every possible consideration to the vital relationship existing between the Midwest and the Nation as a whole in determining the military and economic policies of our national defense.

Sincerely,

PAYNE RATNER,
Governor of Kansas.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., July 5, 1940.

Mr. WILLIAM S. KNUDSEN,
Advisory Commission to the Council of National Defense,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KNUDSEN: I realize how busy you are these days, and will make this letter as brief as I can. I do feel that the interests of the Middle West, and of the Nation as a whole, require that I lay before you some things which I believe ought to be seriously considered by yourself and others who are working on the national-defense program authorized by Congress and the President.

The paramount interest is to develop an impregnable national defense. I realize that. I realize also that the time may be short, and that certain considerations which otherwise might be given more weight will have to be slighted in the interest of speed and immediate efficiency.

However, it also seems to me that a national-defense program which tends to destroy still further the balance between agriculture and industry, and between the interior of the Nation and the coastal regions, will in the long run defeat its purpose by seriously weakening the national economic structure, the foundation on which an adequate and impregnable national defense must rest in the end.

I believe you will agree with me that too heavy a concentration of industry in the already congested centers of the Atlantic coast is not a healthy thing for the Nation as a whole. Similarly if the concentration is carried too far on the Pacific coast.

As I understand it, President Roosevelt himself realizes this, and has publicly advocated several times that to as great an extent as feasible under emergency conditions, national-defense industries be built up also in the interior—beyond and between the mountains.

It would be a serious disservice to the future of the Nation, as well as of the Middle West, as I see it, to allow the national-defense program to set back or hamper a healthy industrial expansion in the Middle West. The point that concentration of all national-defense industries too close to the seacoast, in view of the rapid and promised more rapid increase in the range of bombing planes, also should be considered.

But, very frankly, what I am immediately concerned about is the threatened loss of economic balance between different sections of the country through undue concentration of industrial plants along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

In setting up this great national-defense program, on which billions of the public funds will be spent, you are initiating and directing what may turn out to be the greatest industrial expansion program the country ever has known. I am writing to urge you to continue your efforts to keep this industrial expansion as much in balance as possible. And it seems to me that means a well-planned and well-carried-out program of locating new industrial plants as much as possible in the Middle West.

If you do not, the Middle West not only is going to be impoverished but also you are going to drain us of our young manpower as well as of our purchasing power. In the past few weeks, I am informed, more than 1,000 young men who have been trained as mechanics have been shipped from Kansas City territory to the Pacific coast. This is very disturbing to me as a middle westerner. It also is disturbing to me as, what I trust I am, a middle westerner who tries to have a national viewpoint.

Unless the Middle West is developed to some considerable extent industrially, unless some considerable portion of our most enterprising and vigorous young men and women are encouraged to remain in the Middle West, the Nation faces the danger of having a vast interior of backward peoples, so to speak, and probably also of impoverished peoples.

That will be a most unhealthy national situation when the time comes, as it will, to switch back part of our hugely expanded industrial plant from a war to a peace basis. That is going to be a shock to our entire economic system. It will be more of a shock if there is too much concentration of population in certain areas.

It does seem to me that, as much as possible, the national-defense program should attempt to diffuse rather than to concentrate still further the industrial development of the United States.

What the future of our relationship to the South American republics may be I cannot attempt to say at this time. But it seems fairly plain that these nations are going to be more agricultural than industrial for several generations to come, at least. Also that the United States already is in an industrial stage of development.

What arrangements we may be compelled to make for trade with the South American nations cannot be exactly foreseen, but these arrangements may include the importation into the United States of more of their agricultural products. If our Middle West is forced to retain an agricultural status, instead of being developed along industrial lines with the rest of the Nation, such a change in trade relationships with South America might fall with crushing force on the Middle West.

An impoverished Middle West would have very disastrous results on the entire Nation, as I see it. I believe this point I have just mentioned is one of several that should be seriously considered by the National Defense Commission.

I suppose I could write a lot more along these same lines, but I have taken up too much of your time already. But I think the problem is a most serious one, and I also feel that I would be remiss in my public duty if I had not called to your attention the way not only myself, but many others who have been giving the matter serious attention, feel about it.

I would be much interested in your views on this subject; also would be much pleased if there is anything I can do to be of assistance to you at any time.

Very respectfully.

Democratic National Convention

OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY MRS. ROOSEVELT

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt to the Democratic National Convention at Chicago on July 18, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, delegates to the convention, visitors, friends, it is a great pleasure for me to be here and to have an opportunity to say a word to you.

First of all, I think I want to say a word to our National Chairman, James A. Farley. For many years I have worked under Jim Farley and with Jim Farley, and I think nobody could appreciate more what he has done for the party, what he has given in work and loyalty, and I want to give him here my thanks and devotion.

I think that I should say to you that I am conscious that I cannot possibly bring you a message from the President because he will give you his own message, but as I am here, I want you to know that no one could not be conscious of the confidence which you have expressed in him.

I know and you know that any man who is in an office of great responsibility today faces a heavier responsibility perhaps than any man has ever faced before in this country. Therefore, to be a candidate of either great political party is a very serious and a very solemn thing.

You cannot treat it as you would treat an ordinary nomination in an ordinary time.

We people in the United States have got to realize today that we face now a grave and serious situation. Therefore, this year the candidate who is the President of the United States cannot make a campaign in the usual sense of the word. He must be on his job. So each and every one of you who give him this responsibility, in giving it to him assume for yourselves a very grave responsibility because you will make the campaign. You will have to rise above considerations which are narrow and partisan. You must know that this is the time when all good men and women give every bit of service and strength to their country that they have to give. This is a time when it is the United States that we fight for, the domestic policies that we have established as a party, that we must believe in, that we must carry forward, and in the world we have a position of great responsibility. We cannot tell from day to day what may come. This is no ordinary time, no time for thinking about anything except what we can best do for the country as a whole, and that responsibility is on each and every one of us as individuals. No man who is a candidate, or who is President, can carry this situation alone. This is only carried by a united people who love their country and who will live for it to the fullest of their ability with the highest ideals, with a determination that their party shall be absolutely devoted to the good of the Nation as a whole, and to doing what this country can to bring the world to a safer and happier condition.

Proposed Peace Plank

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON, OF COLORADO

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me at Chicago, Ill., on July 14, 1940, entitled "A Plea for a Peace Plank."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PLEA FOR A PEACE PLANK

Every day during the past 6 weeks I have received hundreds of telegrams and letters from persons living in every State in the Union, asking what they might do to help keep the United States out of the European war. This afternoon I am going to make a concrete suggestion to those interested in accomplishing such a worthy objective. If they will devote a few pennies and a few minutes to the good cause of peace, they can play an important part in shaping the history of mankind in this uncertain crisis.

Recent polls have indicated that 86 percent of the American people are against entering the European war, while only 14 percent are in favor of so desperate an adventure. With such an overwhelming majority opposed, it does not seem reasonable that the platform makers of either of the great political parties would waste 5 minutes debating a peace plank. Yet, at Philadelphia the master minds of the Republican Party worked frantically, day and night, for 6 days, before that monstrosity known as their foreign-policy plank finally was agreed upon. Four times they are said to have written into that plank a provision that no American blood should be spilled in Europe and four times that provision was stricken from their platform. No one can read the war plank finally adopted by them and know what the war policy of the Republican Party really is. In it they solemnly declare for a defense of the essential outposts of the United States from foreign attack. But where are these essential outposts? Some contend that they are on the Rhine. Others that they abide with the British Navy. Apparently this ensnaring declaration satisfied the well-paid voice of the interventionist, William Allen White, who gave this ambiguous platform his unqualified approval and blessing.

William Allen White and his crowd of international meddlers never permitted the Republican platform committee to get out of their sight in Philadelphia. They were on the job night and day while the platform was being written, while the people who place America first were conspicuous by their absence and their silence. It is really not surprising that the people lost the battle nor that the interventionists won it.

Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, of New York, is chairman of the platform committee of the Democratic Convention. In a few hours his committee will report to the convention the platform of this historic party. What will it say on the question of national defense? What will it say as to our foreign policy? And what will it say about the greatest issue of all current issues—the issue of intervention? This is where my listeners who desire to help can play an important part. If you would have in the Democratic platform a peace plank in which there are no reservations, no quibbling, no evasion, wire Senator WAGNER right now what you have in your mind. Let your voice be heard where it should be heard.

The Democratic Party, the common people's party for 150 years, must not permit its leaders to make it the war party in the year 1940. The two purposes are diametrically opposed. The Democratic Party must be one or the other. It must be the people's party or the war party. It is my fervent wish that we have two peace parties in the United States in this crisis. Certainly we have no need for even one war party. As a nation we lost the first battle when the Republican platform was adopted, and if we lose this fight for a vigorous peace plank all will be lost.

There is no issue before the American people so important as peace. All other questions, however serious, are relegated far to the rear by this one overshadowing issue. The farm problem, unemployment, old-age security, social justice, free enterprise, public debts, civil rights, and all great human problems which are demanding solution must be considered in the light of whether or not we are going to war. No businessman knows how to plan his future, no citizen his life, until all doubt concerning this one issue of war or peace has been completely and absolutely removed from the scene of action.

That is why the Democratic Convention in Chicago takes on so much importance today. What is done here will determine whether or not the destiny of America is to be involved in Europe's quarrel. If 100,000 citizens who realize the importance of this vital matter will urge Senator WAGNER to adopt a strong peace plank, the first step toward stability will be taken.

During the last year we have been stepping closer and closer to the European war. Halt this dangerous march! About face! Turn in the other direction, and take America down the "road to peace" instead of down the "road to war." Naturally, we understand that the victory will not be entirely won by the adoption of a strongly worded peace plank, but that, at least, will be one very definite step toward peace—one that cannot be taken too quickly nor too firmly if this Nation is not to be pulled into the whirlpool of the European war. Such a plank will change the whole complexion of the forthcoming political campaign.

I hope that every mother who hears my voice will not let the hour pass without dispatching an urgent telegram to Senator WAGNER and his committee to write a positive plank against entering the European war. I hope the patriots who won the last war on Europe's battlefield, only to lose the victory at the conference table, will not hesitate to wire Senator WAGNER and his committee and forcefully outline the veterans' position on further European bloodletting. The Democratic Party must not write a straddling, pussyfooting, all-things-to-all-men peace platform. No mincing of words. Come right out and say that "no American lives will be sacrificed in the European war and that no American blood will be spilled over there."

Our Democratic leaders assure us we are not going to get into war. Why not say so in language that cannot be misunderstood? It would be an American tragedy if William Allen White and the interventionist crowd of international bankers should place the stamp of approval on the Democratic platform as they approved the Republican platform. I want a peace plank written into the Democratic platform which will shock William Allen White and all of his big-moneyed backers. If you feel as I do about this, make your wishes known to Senator WAGNER. Now. Within the hour. Tomorrow may be too late.

As America builds her national defenses on the scale upon which she has embarked, no vulture from other continents will cast his greedy eyes upon any portion of the Western Hemisphere. The Democratic Party has a splendid record in this matter of national defense. America possesses the strongest navy in the world. When the authorized additions to our Navy are completed we will have fleets equal to the combined ocean power of all of our potential enemies. We can defend ourselves against the whole world when our fighting-plane strength has been brought to that same high standard.

And when our antiaircraft guns, tanks, submarines, modern artillery—when these now on order are in production, then our country will be safe from attack and invasion. These defenses must be speeded up and completed. The Democratic administration has done a fine job of providing for national defense. While America is in no shape at the present time to engage in a modern war against a well-equipped foe on another continent, yet in a few short years we will be able to repel any attack on our soil from any quarter from any combination of powers. However, if we are building these gigantic machines to engage in foreign wars, the future of civilization is dark indeed. We must take steps to see that this vast military power of the United States shall never be used to wage war other than for defense of the liberties we hold dear. The burden is squarely upon the shoulders of our political leaders. Our Military Establishment will shortly be ready to do its part. What of our statesmen?

When the Democratic Party met in Philadelphia in 1936, just 4 years ago, it was generally believed a war in Europe was inevitable. No one knew exactly where it would strike, nor did they predict its extent or the nations likely to become involved. But everyone sensed that another European war was on the horizon.

That year the Democratic Party adopted a strong peace plank. Its candidates took the platform to the country and were elected to office on their word that the United States would not be involved in the approaching European catastrophe.

All during this campaign of 4 years ago, I made many speeches every day, and reiterated over and over my solemn pledge to vote and work diligently against war. Almost every candidate on the Democratic ticket made the same pledge. Did we mean it, or were we merely trying to fool the voters? The anticipated war has already been raging for almost a year and the Democratic administration has played perilously close to the precipice of that war. Too many of them have conveniently forgotten the Democratic peace plank of 1936. Now, we are met to write another platform.

It is my fervent hope that the Democratic Party will not only write a strong peace platform, but that it will nominate for President a man who is known as a noninterventionist. Platforms are important, but it is far more important that the right person be selected to see that the platform is carried out. Within the memory of all of us we have seen platforms set aside after the votes have been counted. If you believe, as I believe, that Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, the great liberal leader from Montana, is the man to lead our Nation to peace, wire the delegates from your State to keep this great statesman in mind for President.

I can say to you, with complete confidence, if Senator WHEELER is elected President, you can be sure the United States will not be drawn into any European or Asiatic war, nor will our Nation engage in any war, except to protect our rights and policies in the Western Hemisphere. The worry about fighting in Europe or Asia will be over, and he will turn his vigorous mind and matchless talents of constructive leadership to our domestic problems, which, God knows, need his attention.

And now, a last word about your part in this important enterprise. Please do not overlook wiring Senator WAGNER and wiring the Resolution Committee to adopt a straight-from-the-shoulder pledge that the United States will not enter the European conflict. Wire Senator WAGNER, care of the Democratic convention in Chicago. Wire right now and urge your friends to do the same before they repeat their prayers tonight. God will bless your efforts.

Is There a Spy Menace?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ARTICLE BY J. EDGAR HOOVER

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by the pen of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, entitled "Is There a Spy Menace?" Mr. Hoover says "Yes." This is a brief article. I happened to observe it recently in the magazine section of the New York Herald Tribune, entitled "This Week." I thought the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would find interest in the article, because we hear so much about the "fifth column" and alien enemies and spies and saboteurs, and so forth.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS THERE A SPY MENACE?

"Yes"; says the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, "and here is what every American should know about it." Mr. Hoover, leader in the Nation's drive against spies and saboteurs, here reveals for the first time since the world crisis what America is doing and can do to protect itself against the "fifth column."

(By J. Edgar Hoover)

Not a day has gone by during the past several months that I have not been asked, "Is there a spy menace in America?"

The answer is emphatically "Yes!" It is a menace in every sense of the word, and it will be my endeavor in this series of articles to acquaint the law-abiding, patriotic citizens of our Nation with the details of this menace and how best to check it.

If there were only one foreign spy operating in our midst, it would still be a menace. If he should secure even one official secret and place it in the wrong hands at the wrong time, irreparable damage could be done, menacing the safety of thousands of our citizens. As a matter of fact, Napoleon Bonaparte's espionage service consisted of one man. Naturally, his contacts were far reaching. But that is true of all spies. It has been the case since the dawn of time—it is the case in this modern era.

Yet it appears to be the fashion in some oversophisticated circles to deprecate all talk of a spy menace. In these same circles un-American activities are often scoffed at. But if there were not a spy menace, would secret airplane plans be stolen? Would a renegade naval officer find a sale for naval secrets? Would a glamorous adventuress establish a salon in Washington to maneuver official secrets away from persons holding positions of public trust?

I could go on without end, for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, since September 1939, has received many complaints of alleged acts of espionage and sabotage every day. Some of these complaints, it is true, have been found to be without foundation. Some are fantastic, and many are the figments of imagination; but others have revealed facts that are indeed stranger than fiction.

For 5 years prior to 1938, the Federal Bureau of Investigation handled each year an average of 35 espionage, sabotage, and national-defense complaints. In 1938 there were 250, and in 1939 that figure jumped to 1,651. Now, complaints are flowing into the F. B. I.'s 50 field divisions. This is not a comforting fact.

THE REAL TEST

The success of this type of investigation cannot possibly be gaged by prosecutions. An ill-timed arrest invariably will do more harm than good. The real test of successful counterespionage, and that is our task, is locating the spy, ascertaining his contacts and methods of communication—and then closing off his sources of information.

Espionage and sabotage go hand in hand. Invariably, where you find one, you will find the other. Both employ subversion in some form. Espionage goes much further than merely dealing with military secrets. The successful espionage agent reaches out into every phase of a nation's industrial, commercial, and social life. So it is with sabotage. The destruction of 500,000 shoestrings could be as important to a foreign adversary as the destruction of a gun works. Shoestrings are as necessary as shoes in outfitting an army.

Our greatest dangers arise from within. Any army, regardless of its size, becomes vulnerable once it is disorganized and not properly supported by the people it protects. An internal upheaval in time of war could be as disastrous as a forced retreat from the front.

Our military and naval forces must be supported to the utmost. Unity of civilian forces is as important as unified armed forces.

Everyone knows the story of the Dutch boy who held off the wrath of the Zuider Zee by plugging a leak in the dikes with his hand. Today, we must plug the leaks against the growing threat of a "fifth column" in America. A "fifth column" with its destructive principles and objectives is capable of more damage to our national defense than a huge invading force. In fact, a foreign invasion would be practically impossible without the aid of an internal upheaval incited by outside forces.

The files of the F. B. I. attest to the fact that we have treacherous guests in our midst who have returned hospitality with hostility. It is against these forces that we must arm ourselves. There is only one possible explanation for the recent unauthorized consignment of several hundred feet of film to a foreign country: A visitor had arranged, in some manner, to have the tactical maneuvers of our flying fortresses photographed. In detail, scene after scene appeared on the film, showing the accuracy with which bombs were dropped from aloft on a designated target. These pictures, which I am glad to say were recovered, speak louder than words of the dangers with which we are confronted. And this is only one warning example. There are others that I cannot discuss, for obvious reasons.

EVERY SECRET VITAL

Espionage agents and their co-conspirators untiringly seek details regarding developments in our plans for national defense. One successful attempt might enable a potential enemy to counter with devices that would render our best efforts ineffective. In modern warfare, advance information can turn an expected victory into defeat.

Now is the time for us to protect America. Now is the time for us to build our national defense and to insure our internal security. Defending America demands that it be made invulnerable. With this single thought in mind, the intelligence branches of the War and Navy Departments and representatives of the F. B. I. have been working hand in hand for years.

President Roosevelt on September 6, 1939, in declaring the Nation to be in a state of limited emergency, called upon America's law-enforcement officers and agencies to cooperate with the F. B. I. by referring to it any information which they might obtain "relating to espionage, counterespionage, sabotage, and subversive activities, and violations of the neutrality laws."

BIG INCREASE OF AGENTS

At that time he ordered the F. B. I. "to take charge of investigative work" in these matters. He authorized an increase of 150 special agents in the F. B. I. to handle this added responsibility and recommended increased appropriations so that additional field offices might be established to assist in the work. Since then the President has requested appropriations for several hundred more special agents. This new task of the F. B. I. will be successful only to the extent of the cooperation received from peace-loving Americans in every field of activity.

We of the F. B. I. have been criticized for some of our more recent activities. Were that criticism not forthcoming, the Nation could well be alarmed, knowing full well that we were not doing our duty.

When the first World War broke, the American intelligence services were woefully unprepared. The F. B. I. was in its embryonic stage. Today that has changed. Both military and naval intelligence are well organized and efficiently operated. The F. B. I. has developed into a far-flung force known for its versatility. Working hand in hand, the combined forces of these three agencies are competent to meet emergencies as they arise. Almost daily there are meetings of officials of these three agencies, furthering the splendid spirit of cooperation.

At no time has there been more effective coordination than we find today. The resources of each of these agencies are pooled in the interests of a common cause. This coordination exists not only between the headquarters staffs of the intelligence agencies, but extends into the field as well. There is a free exchange of information between officers of military intelligence, naval intelligence, and special agents of the F. B. I. No day or night passes but that these men are tirelessly working shoulder to shoulder on mutual problems.

To meet effectively the situations which have arisen in the present emergency, investigators have been assigned to Alaska, Puerto Rico, and Hawaii. These outposts of national defense have been particularly active. There, as within our continental confines, every effort is being made by members of military intelligence, naval intelligence, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation to preserve our internal security.

Offices have been opened by the F. B. I. in six new cities, so that strategic points may have the aid of additional special agents, who will be closer to the scenes of possible activity.

SAFEGUARDING INDUSTRIES

As early as last summer a special, intensive course of instruction in espionage and sabotage investigation was inaugurated for our investigative staff. Beyond that we were called upon by the War and Navy Departments to survey the protective facilities of hundreds of industrial establishments which had contracts to supply the materials for building the national defense. A course of instruction which had previously been prepared for just such an emergency was given to additional specially qualified special agents.

The lessons of the first World War are too fresh in our minds for us again to be unprepared. During that period several thousand enemy aliens were taken into custody in the United States. But many foreign foes were not even known, with the result that almost every day there were reports of internal disasters—of fires of mysterious origin, explosions, and other acts of violence designed to cripple our mobilization plans. Since then several million persons have immigrated to America. Most of these have lived up to the expectations we held for them. There are others, however, who are seeking to undermine our democracy.

These facts point to the need for unity in bulwarking our national defense against insidious forces that are alien to everything that is American. Vigilance and action of the proper type are essential if the overt acts of our national foes are to be met and countered.

I know how that citizen on the west coast must have felt when his brother attempted to sell to a foreign power confidential plans for the construction of airplanes. He never wavered, however, when the interests of his country were at issue. As a result of his aid the brother was indicted, tried, and convicted for violation of the espionage statutes. But, more important, the apprehension of this traitor helped prevent additional confidential secrets from being bartered over the counter of spydom.

The maintenance of a high morale on the part of our citizens is an essential phase of national defense. In maintaining this we are defending the essential spirit of Americanism against inimical agents; we are making our main line of defense impregnable.

National Defense

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ARTICLE BY FREDERIC WILLIAM WILE

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, during the past month I have received a number of letters asking me to explain in detail just what is being done about our national defense. I have waited until I could get evidence which seemed to me to be impartial.

On Wednesday, July 17, the Washington Evening Star printed an article on that subject by a distinguished writer, Frederic William Wile. Certainly it must be admitted that neither the newspaper nor the writer of the article is prejudiced in favor of the administration. I ask consent that the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article insofar as it relates to the subject of defense was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON OBSERVATIONS—PROGRAM FOR MATERIAL PREPAREDNESS PROGRESSES AT UNPARALLELED RATE

(By Frederic William Wile)

National defense is not a partisan proposition. It may not be a proper subject for glorification in a political party's national convention. But if the uninspiring Democratic jamboree at Chicago could be acquainted with the brass tacks of what is happening at Washington these days to arm the United States on land, at sea, and in the air for the emergencies of an unpredictable future, Mayor Kelly's stadium would ring with wilder enthusiasm than so far has been provoked by any of the stereotyped political claptrap which has shivered its rafters.

A DEFINITE OBJECTIVE

Authentic information just made available to this observer indicates the program for matériel preparedness has been developed at a rate believed to be without parallel in any country's history. It has been put in motion on the theory that before success in any endeavor can be effected there must be a clearly defined objective. The National Defense Advisory Commission, acting in closest liaison and harmony with the War and Navy Departments, is proceeding on what it believes to be both a sound and sufficient program. It is geared not only for speeding execution but for flexibility. What is adequate defense today may be inadequate tomorrow. "Blitzkrieg" has taught us that. It was on this basis that the present unprecedented Army and Navy appropriations were granted, providing approximately (apart from naval construction) for $1,200,000,000 for munitions preparedness. That is a gigantic sum for our peacetime Army, but relatively small for a fighting army.

CHANGING CONDITIONS

Lightning changes in world conditions have made it apparent that we need not only a two-ocean Navy, but vastly augmented provisions for an Army that may one day be called upon to cooperate in hemisphere defense. Designed to meet altered conditions the supplementary munitions program of June 30 was submitted to Congress, specifying the numbers of airplanes, guns, tanks, ammunition, etc., that must be produced. If approved, it will provide approximately $3,800,000,000 more for military preparedness. Thus, a grand total of about $5,000,000,000 would be provided with which to put industry to work in a big way to produce the machine power necessary to the defense of America.

WHAT THE PLAN IS

This program was not formulated at random. It is based upon plans under consideration by the Army for years. It was outlined by the President in his July 10 message to Congress. It provides (1) for the total equipment of a land force of approximately 1,200,000 men; (2) for procurement of reserve stocks of tanks, guns, artillery, ammunition, etc., for another 800,000 men, or a total of 2,000,000, if mobilization of such a war-time force should become necessary; (3) for provision of manufacturing facilities, public and private, necessary to produce critical items of equipment required for 2,000,000 men, and for production of the ordnance items needed for the Army aircraft program—guns, bombs, armor, bomb sights, and ammunition; and (4) for procurement of 15,000 additional Army planes, complete with necessary spare engines, armament, and the most modern equipment.

QUARTER OF PROGRAM IN WORKS

Although funds have been available only since June 26—exactly 3 weeks—contract awards have already been made to the extent of roundly $300,000,000, or about one-fourth of the program. Another $100,000,000 is represented by a contract for 1,900 planes, which will be signed presently. This record has been accomplished in spite of inevitable difficulties attendant upon an expanding personnel, crowded offices, changed laws, and the necessity of modifying procedure in countless directions. It is the sleepless effort of all concerned to expedite awards for the remainder of appropriated funds, not only to get industry to work as rapidly as possible, but also to clear the decks for the larger program. While the latter cannot be executed until approved by Congress, arrangements are already in the making to place the business with industry and to eliminate the bottlenecks which are sure to develop in the execution of contracts.

ROME NOT BUILT IN DAY

Anxious as the country is for visible preparedness results, and urgent as these are, it has to be remembered that Rome was not built in a day. By the acid tests of both the objective and the start made toward its execution, there is ample evidence that the program of supply preparedness is proceeding satisfactorily, even if not at the dizzy pace which the uninformed may have expected. We are facing a long battle. On the average, quantity production of difficult munitions, even in high-speeded America, cannot be obtained in less than a year.

The creation of stocks will require several months more. But it is highly gratifying to be assured, on authority, that even these long-time factors are less than half those required by Great Britain, France, and Germany.

WE ARE ON THE WAY

Messrs. Stettinius, Knudsen and their associates, seasoned men of industrial affairs, feel that the Nation has every right to be reassured by what has so far been accomplished. Their confidence on this score should convince the country that everything that can conceivably be done to pave the way to strengthened national defense efficiently and promptly is being tackled with a minimum of wasted time and effort. There is healthy respect beyond our shores for America's mighty industrial potentialities. These are now being harnessed on a truly prodigious scale. Their purpose is to make the United States invincible against external attack. That is the alpha and omega of the national-defense program, and it is on the way.

The Political Situation and World Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR CAPPER OF KANSAS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix to the RECORD a radio address delivered by me on July 19, 1940, over WIBW at Topeka, Kans., on the political situation and world problems.

There being no objection the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends in the radio audience, it is my sincere hope and prayer that war never comes to America. We have lived in peace with all the world, and must not become involved in any war. Only in the event we are attacked should we fight to preserve our democratic way of living.

We can all be gratified that the Democratic convention in Chicago adopted a strong antiwar plank in the party's platform. It is not so strong a stand as the Republicans took at Philadelphia. But Senator WHEELER, for whom I have the greatest respect, fought valiantly to force an anti-interventionist plank into the platform.

Senator WHEELER deserves the compliments of all people who oppose sending our American boys to fight in foreign wars. I have always opposed any measures that would lead the United States into Europe's war, and will never vote for any measure designed to send our young men to fight on foreign soil.

I believe the people of the United States are overwhelmingly opposed to intervention in any wars abroad.

Current war scares have uncovered the sort of situation we didn't know existed. We have bumped into a very real problem of protecting our country and we find ourselves unprepared, to say the least. God grant that all of this insane killing soon will cease. But regardless of when or how it ends, we in the United States must see that we are not caught napping again.

Congress must stay in session to enact a defense tax bill. We must pour out billions of dollars for national defense. As American citizens, we must demand that this money be spent for defense measures and equipment in a businesslike manner.

We are all going to be called upon to sacrifice, and sacrifice beyond anything we have dreamed of in the past, to attain the goal of national security.

So I want Congress to put through with the least possible delay an excess-profits tax provision that will guarantee against the creation of another batch of war millionaires in this country.

I am utterly opposed to any program that will give huge war profits to greedy people who would grow rich out of the miseries of their fellow men.

We have no time, nor can we afford, to play politics at such a serious time when the welfare of our country is endangered.

I am backing defense measures to the limit. But I am going to demand a strict accounting for every dollar spent.

And you Kansas folks should demand a strict accounting for the money that is being spent. Part of it is going to be your money.

This problem of unpreparedness, important as it is just now, isn't the only one we need to watch. While war has overshadowed everything else, we still have our domestic problems of fair prices for agriculture, jobs for those willing to work, and countless other problems.

This war has brought us face to face with the unpleasant fact that we have been pretty slipshod in many things. But if it teaches us to demand efficient, businesslike Government we will have made a definite gain.

If we are to be adequately prepared, we must encourage our farmers to produce an abundance of food. The pending famine in Europe should be a lesson to us. Food supplies in time of emergency are as important as planes, battleships, and antiaircraft guns.

We don't want another plow-up campaign such as we had during the World War. And this is not necessary. We now have enough acres under cultivation to supply our own needs, and still have plenty for export in the world market.

To accomplish this requires long-time planning. It does not call for curtailment of production, under guise of keeping down surpluses. Unless we build up food supplies for 1 or 2 years' needs, we might, in time of crisis, find ourselves traveling on empty stomachs.

I don't believe food preparedness means skimping our supplies down to a point where they could be exhausted in 6 months, not when we already have hungry people in this land of so-called food surpluses, not when a great emergency army might demand enormous quantities of foods.

If we are smart in our food preparedness, our men, if they are called to active war service, will have plenty to eat. And, just as important, they will not have to worry about their loved ones at home going hungry. We must not be found, at some crucial period, frantically urging our farmers to produce a miracle of food supplies for emergency needs.

Now, I want to talk briefly about the Democratic Convention. Both of the major parties have nominated their tickets and adopted their platforms. It is now up to the voters to make their choice.

They can either accept the New Deal ideas, which in 7 years have not solved our domestic problems, or they can vote for Wendell Willkie and Senator MCNARY, both of whom are serious, efficient businessmen.

This is going to be a most interesting campaign. The nomination of President Roosevelt for a third term was no surprise. He has been planning it that way for more than a year. No other Democrat had a chance to break through the barriers set up by the bureaucratic bosses.

The contrast between the Democratic and Republican Conventions is worth noting. At Philadelphia, the bosses or would-be bosses, had nothing to do with the nomination of Wendell Willkie for President. At Chicago the big machine politicians and the Democratic bosses, headed by Kelly and Hague, did not allow the rank-and-file delegates to have anything to say about who would be nominated.

It is my opinion that a majority of voters will express their opposition to a third term when they go to the polls next November. Things have not come to a pass in the United States where one man, and one man only, is capable of directing the Government.

The President's message to Senator BARKLEY, releasing all the delegates pledged to him, was a dramatic play intended for public consumption, and to give the convention proceedings a "draft Roosevelt" flavor. The lack of enthusiasm among the delegates had alarmed the bosses in charge of the convention. It took a lot of maneuvering, and no little organization on the floor, to stage the noisy demonstration Tuesday night.

At Philadelphia, the demonstrations for Willkie were unorganized and uncontrolled. They were the spontaneous outbursts of enthusiasm for a man who had sold himself and his theories to the whole country.

Acceptance of the third-term nomination by the President violates traditions held sacred by the American people for more than 100 years. His argument that he doesn't want to quit and turn his work over to inexperienced hands scarcely holds up. There are many men in both major parties capable of continuing the defense program. In fact, the alarming state of unpreparedness in which we now find this country indicates that a change in management is essential to national safety.

It is doubly important that Congress remain in session during the present emergency; we can do much to prevent the waste and maladministration of defense funds by vigorous protests, if not by official action.

The nomination by the Democrats of Henry A. Wallace for Vice President was somewhat of a surprise. Henry is admittedly a friend of the farmer. He has tried for 7 years to do something for agriculture. His administration of the A. A. A. program has helped many farmers.

But I am going to support Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY for Vice President, along with Wendell L. Willkie for President. For 22 years I have served with Senator MCNARY on the Senate Committee on Agriculture. He is a farmer at heart and in practice. He lives on one of the best farms in Oregon.

I believe the farmers have a better chance of getting their problems solved the MCNARY way than they do under the Wallace program.

The McNary-Haugen bill would have come nearer solving the problems of agriculture than the present A. A. A. law. I supported the McNary-Haugen bill and voted to pass it over the veto of a Republican President—Coolidge. It should have become a law. I am very sorry that President Coolidge refused to sign it, and that we couldn't pass it over his veto.

However, the farmers need have no fear—whether MCNARY or Wallace becomes Vice President. Both of the Vice Presidential candidates are friendly to agriculture, and as presiding officer of the Senate, either will continue to work for the farmers.

However, a vote for Wallace also is a vote for a third term for President Roosevelt. As I said before, we cannot afford to break the sacred traditions of our Government.

The two major parties have put up their best men for the highest offices in the land. It is up to the voters to decide whether they want Roosevelt for a third term, or change to an administration that is not controlled by a lot of New Deal bosses. Wendell Willkie is not under obligation to any boss, or set of bosses. He is a capable businessman, who has liberal leanings and has caught the imagination of the people.

I have always opposed the third-term idea. I voted for the La Follette resolution against a third term for President Coolidge, who was one of my close friends. Though he was a Republican, I did not believe he should run for a third term. It is not the American way, but is too much like the practices of the European dictators, who deprive their people of liberty and freedom of speech under one pretext or another—and often without any pretext at all.

The motive which impelled President Roosevelt to seek—he says he merely accepted after being drafted—reelection are mysterious. It is my belief that having centralized more power in the Federal Government than any President ever had, he is reluctant to give up that power. Certainly his persuasive appeal in his acceptance speech does not satisfactorily explain his reasons.

I am of the opinion that the fiction of a "draft" movement will not be accepted by the people, if they realize the serious implications involved.

It always is pleasant to get home and to live among my own people. Kansas is the best State in the Union—it is the best place on earth. We folks out here in the Middle West sometimes do not realize all our blessings.

We have no fear of death-dealing bombs falling on our homes or in our streets. We have everything that makes life worth living, and get along together more amicably than those living anywhere else.

But we cannot forget, nor ignore, the emergency which today confronts the whole Nation, indeed, the whole of the Western Hemisphere. It is our duty to help prepare to ward off aggressors. The present state of the world brings serious problems right to our own doorsteps. In common with all Americans, we must make sacrifices, work for unity of purpose, if we are to continue the enjoyment of our liberties and our American way of life.

We can only do our part by being ready at all times to share whatever sacrifices are necessary. I have faith in the American people as a whole—but my faith in my Kansas neighbors is unbounded.

As I leave for Washington to resume my duties in the United States Senate, I ask your prayers and your continued cooperation. I would love to stay here, but duty calls. Congress must not adjourn so long as this present emergency exists. To do so would, in my opinion, be one of the worst things that could happen to this country—short of actual invasion by an enemy. Good-bye, and good luck.

Is There Tragedy in Investment?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I quote from the speech by the able gentleman from California, Mr. VOORHIS, which was printed in the Appendix to the RECORD for May 8. The gentleman is citing the words of Mrs. Joan Robinson, an English economist:

> The tragedy of investment is that it can never remain at a constant level. If the rate of investment one year is the same as the last, then, generally speaking, the level of employment and income and therefore the level of the demand for goods will be the same in the second year as in the first. But all the time capital is accumulating and in the second year there is a larger amount of equipment available to meet the same demand for commodities. The rate of profit consequently falls off, future prospects are dimmed by the decline in present receipts and in the third year new investment appears less attractive to entrepreneurs than in the second.
> New investment—

Says the gentleman in comment—

> implies that somehow the community has made a corresponding sacrifice of current consumption.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the backbone of a speech of much earnestness, sincerity, and candor. But in this quotation and comment, exemplifying the British-born concept of savings and investment that has sprung chiefly from the work of J. Maynard Keynes, there is also introduced, it seems to me, much confusion of thought. In this connection Mr. Keynes himself, in a recent comment on a report of a committee of the League of Nations dealing with Statistics Relating to Capital Formation, said:

> We have been, all of us, brought up, like the members of this committee, in deep confusion of mind between the demand and supply of savings, and until we rid ourselves of it, we cannot think correctly.

So while Mr. Keynes waxes rueful over savings, we find Mrs. Robinson reflecting upon the tragedy of investment. What, then, is the deep confusion between the two that is creating an intellectual blind spot even for trained minds? What is their true interrelationship?

I offer here, Mr. Speaker, an attempt to answer these questions that is based on long personal experience in professional and business accounting coupled with some careful consideration of current economic and monetary theory. I hope it may serve in some measure to reduce the confusion.

Money may be saved or hoarded, of course; but only, I think, for spending or lending to spend. That is, money is never itself invested; for a productive investment consists, not of money, but of what money buys.

It is, indeed, well recognized that money develops velocity and is being continuously respent on investments of all kinds; for of course money is only a medium of exchange and is no more tied up when used to make an investment than it is consumed when spent for food. The purchase of productive or capital goods that are not consumed but may be resold, does not immobilize any money; nor is money, once spent or lent, thereafter in itself serving the investor or lender in any way whatsoever. In the proper course it is, as a circulating medium, always being respent or reinvested by others.

It is to be said, then, that since there is nothing about the use of money for making investments that can be connected by any necessity with the amount of money available as purchasing power, there is necessitated the assumption that generally speaking means, to Mrs. Robinson, that on the one hand the velocity and quantity of money does not change, and that, on the other hand, there is no change in either the amount of speculative trading and/or the levels of pricing in an intricately interdependent and kaleidoscopic pricing process, or in the number of sales involved in both speculation and in processing raw materials.

This theory of investment assumes also that investment refers only to such additions to capital as are not new in type and efficiency and so self-generating; for new technical efficiencies are able to expand production and real income, not by sacrificing current consumption, but by lowering the cost of their products. Moreover, as they serve to curtail the number of steps in processing, they curtail also the need for money—including, of course, bank credit—to conduct industry.

In fine, we find ourselves speaking so generally with Mrs. Robinson and the gentleman from California as to make logical inferences almost impossible. Hadn't we better reexamine the assumptions upon which we have been basing our ideas of capitalism in industry?

THE FORMATION OF NEW INVESTMENTS.

Whence cometh new investment, Mr. Speaker? Is it really possible so to diagram the processes of capitalism on the one hand, and of trading with money on the other, as to make it certain that tragedy lurks in new investment unless a correspondingly expanding money supply is forthcoming? At a time when financial stability is of critical importance, a seriously inflationary policy may lurk in this assumption if it be based on a fallacy, that is, if it is not true that new investment implies the necessity for new money or expansion of purchasing power in its sum total.

Let us start the criticism of Mrs. Robinson's flare for the Marxian belief in the self-strangulating propensity of the processes of capitalistic investment in mechanized industry, by pointing out that if a constant level of new investment is suicidal, the same must be true of all new investment. Under this theory of automatic industrial frustration, discontinuity in the formation of capital could delay but not obviate the arrival of the tragedy of investment which the able gentleman is asking us to accept as a logical premise in our thinking. Unless assumptions are changed, the arrival of tragedy would merely be delayed by discontinuity in new investment. But is such a tragic impasse inherent in new investment? I think not.

For our analysis of this assumption let us turn to the able gentleman's assertion that sacrifice of current consumption is implied in new investment, and ask: If capital can continuously contribute a stream of net, consumption income, by what logic is it held that it cannot continuously do some of the consuming itself, in its own growth, so that no prior relation of capital-creating income to consumption—which must therefore be discontinued or sacrificed—need exist? Must we assume that all factors of production are fully employed in producing for consumption, so that they neither have been nor can be producing for the formation of capital? Is it true that expanded production by capital can occur only by added capital expenditure out of net income, that is, by sacrifice of current consumption?

It is, of course, not to be denied that saving—diversion of expenditure from other ends—may be used to develop capital. But this by no means implies that the formation of productive capital must ensue upon saving and investment of either real or money savings, nor yet that productive investment can only arise from saving or sacrifice. If new investment can, in fact, be developed from maintenance or depreciation reserve funds, then assuredly no sacrifice of current consumption is implied.

Is it, then, quite contrary to the principles of sound investment that new capital income should arise by drawing on depreciation reserve funds? If a type of mechanism becomes obsolete, is it good business to use the depreciation fund to maintain it? If not, then if a new technical efficiency results from expenditure of this fund on improved equipment, will not the net income produced exceed that which such a fund had been properly calculated to maintain? And can depreciation allowances so invested be called savings out of current consumption?

Is not new efficiency, indeed, more than likely to shorten the chain of processes and disemploy old types of both machinery and skill, thus calling for less, rather than more, money in the operation of the processes of mechanized production?

The difficulty, then, in such technological unemployment, is not a matter solely of monetary quantity, important though that be. It seems rather to arise in faulty distribution of ownership—and so of capital income—than in any inequity of distribution of income to labor as such.

Certainly, America has a tradition of opportunity in free enterprise which, until recently, we have striven to maintain. But have our institutions actually afforded full equality of opportunity, through savings, to share in industrial ownership? I think not. Despite the formal separation of banking from investment by the Banking Acts of 1933 and 1935, honest savings appear still to be short-circuited by the participation of commercial banking institutions in investment. Most dangerous, indeed, is the fact that we depend almost entirely on this very displacement of earned savings by bank credit, for that expansion of money supply necessary to prevent monetary stringency.

MARXIAN CONFUSION OVER SAVINGS AND INVESTMENT

I fear there are still some of the cobwebs of Marxian fallacy lurking in this confusion over saving and investment. Because of a failure clearly to see just how income and value develop from investment, there is a strong tendency among many of our so-called liberals, to impute all income to labor. Ignoring the productivity of capital goods, it is too often alleged that technology merely increases the productivity of labor. But, as Thomas Edison observed, the ultimate aim of mechanized production is complete freedom from any production by labor, and hence no employment or payment of wages by owners.

In approaching such a theoretical ideal, purchasing power must be increasingly generated, not by labor, but by investment, and be paid, not as wages, but to owners as interest or as dividends at the interest ratio on invested value. Except as a matter of bad financing, therefore, there can be no impasse generated by surplus value or profit. Indeed, consumption through mass purchasing power must develop, not through the largesse, willing or coerced, of concentrated ownership toward wage earners, but through the dispersion of ownership as a source of income.

It should be clear, then, that there is no necessary relation between the rate of investment and the level of employment and incomes—no determinate multiplier, to put it in the Keynesian vernacular. Ideally, as in Edison's concept, there simply is no employment income, no wage fund, Mr. Speaker; no payroll. Far from being a tragedy, investment, if it were operating under an intelligent system of finance, could and would, as it largely does, automatically generate precisely the purchasing power requisite to continuous operation of industry, irrespective of whether the recipients of income chose to devote it to consumption or to new investment. Why, indeed, must we suppose that a rationally organized society would ever invest for an unneeded consumption? Can there be any logic in the notion that society cannot keep its investments automatically in balance with consumption needs, quite as any sane individual would do in creating his own equipment on a frontier? Why should the moneyed age of steel be less rational than the moneyless age of stone? Is there, indeed, no rational basis for the system of capitalistic free enterprise we have practiced?

That employment has no definite relation to these problems may be seen also in the fact that, as in the ideally and fully unemployed, capitalized, industrial society, the primitive situation was also one involving no employment for paid wages even though all income was a return for labor and no one was unemployed in the sense of having no productive work to do. Though unemployed, men were always occupied as long as natural resources in hunting and fishing were available.

Between these two extremes of total unemployment, then, there stands, obviously, the existing situation which is a period of transition in which the evolution of human society is now at the point where the more capable element does and should, in the interest of all, obtain much of their purchasing power, not by labor, but by thrift and intelligent investment while employing labor—often their own labor. Hence, by the logic of reductio ad absurdum, we must look elsewhere than to an inherent tragedy of investment for the explanation, and so the means of prevention, of that lack of purchasing power from which arises poverty-ridden unemployment for employable labor. Prevention of the paradox of underconsumption must take the form of preparation for the time when the industrial payroll has been reduced, technologically, almost to the vanishing point.

The problems of modern industry do not, therefore, in the final analysis, involve any arbitrary determination of wages and hours or any other labor relations, by coercion of employers and abrogation of free enterprise. They involve rather the issue of maldistribution of ownership by financial methods which, as a whole, are decidedly questionable and are, in effect, a system of forced and unrewarded saving and wage slavery.

Here, then, we have the true picture of industrial evolution; two totally unemployed extremes which belong to the past and to the future, and the actually existing transition period of social and industrial evolution in which owners of capital equipment employ not only each other but also the decreasing proportion of the people who have no property of productive value other than their own brain and brawn. In this transition it is clear that there must be an increasing trend toward dependence upon income from dividends, that is, from ownership, to keep capital income absorbed in consumption.

The primary problem, therefore, is not one of any fixed or necessary relation between a rate of saving and a rate of investment, nor indeed of the existence of any new investment at all, for in truth, capital can come into existence without ever being actually constructed by human effort. It appears to me that this is universally the case with the development of that costless income from land tenure which is called rent. Let us briefly analyze this approach to a very old dispute as to the nature of land values and rent.

LAND RENT

It seems clearly evident that as better land requires less investment, i. e., less cost in both capital and labor, it offers the owners of such resources a cost-free income which is capitalized, at the reciprocal of the interest ratio, to determine land value. It is therefore only as interest on such land value as does not have to be maintained by expenditure, for example on fertilizer, that land rent is paid. (Let me say, urban land rentals are largely not land rent, but are simply the net return, or interest, on capital investment in streets and other public improvements which have been paid for by the holders of title to land, by taxation.)

With land, then, new capital value arises cost-free as fast as population increase forces the obsolescence, through science and invention, of old machines and methods. For though new efficiencies are the very essence of economic progress, their total benefits are not, except under patent laws, returned to the technological improvements which originate them usually out of depreciation reserves. Technological benefits do become, in large measure, cost-free income to owners of the source of raw materials. Chiefly that source is simply, and literally, a place in the sun; for life arises, as everyone knows, from the plant's photosynthesis of food supplies without which animal life could not exist. As capital equipment increases, and with it population, submarginal lands are brought into production and better land develops added rental value as a gift from nature.

Again let us ask, then, what becomes of the idea that new investment implies that somehow the community has made a corresponding sacrifice of current consumption? If land rent develops cost-free and arises from the cutting of costs by technological improvements which actually cost less per unit of net income than had previously been the case in maintaining investment against expected depreciation, then sacrifice must consist, where growth and progress are involved, in enjoying an actual and direct gain in available income for consumption purposes!

INTEREST AND BANK CREDIT IN INVESTMENT

We see, then, that in a proper distribution of income it is not technically true, as alleged by the able gentleman from California, that value invested necessarily comprises any diversion of current income in a sacrificial sense. Balance between investment costs and net income is continuously, in a proper financial set-up, maintained at a natural ratio between the two streams—cost and income—which is determined by conditions, inherent in the human economy, that are related to the normal rate of interest. Thus ratio may not be disturbed by law if investment and trade are to function rationally.

That it has been disturbed by the pump-priming fiscal policies of this Administration has given rise to the opinion, recently advanced by the Advisory Council of the Federal Reserve System, that an easy money policy will have disastrous results if persisted in. With too low interest rates cash balances are sure to develop into liquidity preferences—to use the Keynesian language again—and be hoarded so as to raise a threat of sudden liquidation or spending speculatively if a stimulus to spending, real or imaginary, develops. This is the state of affairs for which the Reserve Board has itself stated that control is wholly lacking. In this respect we are quite unprepared to handle emergency financing, as of a war budget, without a serious inflationary trend.

The fault lies primarily in the existing system of banking with partial reserves so that real savings are short-circuited and sabotaged by bank credit which becomes, though a debt with interest charges attached, our circulating medium of exchange. I could hardly put this more strongly than it has been stated by Dr. Slichter of the Harvard School of Business Administration in his book, Toward Stability, page 22:

> Credit greatly accentuates the fluctuations in business which are produced by other causes and, in addition, it is itself an independent cause of maladjustment. * * * Indeed, if we were living in a cash economy and desired for some strange reason to make an economy highly susceptible to violent fluctuations, we could scarcely do better than to invent the present credit system.
> Under a credit system such as ours * * *, by going into debt at the banks we expand the currency and by paying bank loans we contract it. This is a result of the fact that bank loans are made, not by transferring money from one person to another, but by creating credit dollars.

It is, then, most urgently necessary that American thought should reject without reserve the Robinson notion, implied by the Keynesian school of thought, that there is an inherent tragedy in investment. In a neutral money system, which allows a natural interest ratio to develop, the division of the stream of gross capital income is automatically controlled so as to be continuously allocated, on the one hand and chiefly, to investment costs of depreciation, and on the other hand to the smaller stream of net income to owners—including lenders.—No impasse can possibly develop. The difficulties which are attributed, by the specious analyses of socialistic liberals, to the profit system and capitalism, are due wholly to faulty finance.

This division of the gross income stream has been noted by the distinguished student, Alfred Marshall, in the following words—Principles of Economics, 1925 edition, page 592:

> The flow of investment of resources from their common source in production consists of two streams. The smaller consists of new additions to the accumulated stock. The larger merely replaces that which is destroyed; whether by immediate consumption, as in the case of food, fuel, etc.; by wear and tear, as in that of railway irons; by the lapse of time, as in that of a thatched roof * * *; or by all of these combined. * * * It is therefore not unreasonable to assume * * * that the owners of capital in general have been able in the main to adapt its form to the normal conditions of the time, so as to derive as good a net income from their investments in one way as another.

The Robinson theory that all the time capital is accumulating for an impasse, is no possible part of investment as thus pictured by Marshall. The rate of profit—net income, or interest—cannot decline and destroy employment of capital and labor, for it is automatically adjusted as a continuous process of apportionment. I should say, rather, that it would be so adjusted if we would stop our formation of capital by forced savings through the use of bank credit to purchase bond issues and extend credit, often and most freely to business so big that its collateral is nothing but a note. Indeed, in Mrs. Robinson's homeland the 60 families afford themselves overdraft facilities with no formalities at all.

There can be no economic stability where the rate of interest is thus undermined by what amounts to counterfeiting of savings. Under a system of chartering banks to extend credit, interest, no matter how low the rate as set by so-called supervision, will at times be excessive simply because it must be indefinitely compounded by reinvestment of what are nothing but bank debts, if those debts are to continue in circulation as the medium of exchange. When those investments become frozen and reinvestment is impossible, then, indeed, is there tragedy in investment. Then, indeed, not even our money supply can remain at a constant level either in quantity or velocity, and collapse is inevitable.

> Until very recently it has been generally assumed that, in our modern economic system, there was practically no assignable limit to the capacity of new capital invested in productive plant, to fructify; that is, to yield a return out of which interest could be properly paid. * * * The world assumed that nature could be made to yield compound interest at a reasonably generous rate, and therefore, it could safely go into debt in continually increasing amounts. I suggest that one of the great lessons of this depression is that this assumption is not true, and that one of the principal causes of the depression—perhaps the dominant cause—is the weight of sterile debt accumulated during the Great War and afterwards. It seems to me that nature—by which I mean the general order of things—is more severe upon usury than was the Church. The Church merely condemned the interest * * * but nature condemns as well such use of the principle. * * * Recurring panics and depressions represent periodical audits, when we stop to take account of our position. One notable feature of all such audits is the wiping out of a mass of debt. This we call liquidation. Never in the history of the modern world has there been outstanding so enormous a volume of debt and probably never has so large a portion of that debt been in fact barren (because it represents no fructifying capacity) as is the case today.

Free enterprise and liberty may not long endure when government either charters banks to lend unsaved funds or performs that function through agencies otherwise chartered or set up in bureaucracy. If monetary stability and social justice are to be served, I submit there must be no material distortion of the universal human process of capitalization of real income at the natural interest ratio in the development of economic value or investment. In a sound monetary system every cent of money loaned should first have been privately earned and saved, and then be loaned privately and free from constraint as to interest rates. No bank of issue should be free from the discipline of interest charges; nor should any recipients of loaned funds be so freed to any degree whatever—except only the Government itself. Here the expenditure of debt-free funds may be equitably arranged in the interest of society as a whole by a representative assembly.

In the words of Dr. Lauchlin Currie, the Supply and Control of Money in the United States, chapter XV:

The merit of this proposal—

That money shall be created exclusively for the public budget—

lies in the fact that it divorces the supply of money from the loaning of money.

This is a situation, a financial procedure, to which we can go forward, but not back to any previously perfected system. Such procedure leaves the interest rate free from any governmental interference and sets up the heretofore unrealized but truly free enterprise system without which democracy cannot function—except as it may have a landed frontier taken from others in the struggle of the fit to survive.

It should be obvious now that there could be no more disastrous proposal for reform than that which contemplates public debt, as is proposed in H. R. 4931, sponsored by the gentleman from California. A public debt inevitably develops arbitrary political influences in the money market, quite as it is doing right now. Similarly, the entrance of the Government into the lending or investing of money in competitive enterprise, such as is contemplated in the Jones-Wheeler bill for agriculture, or, indeed, as is now being done by a multiplicity of Government agencies, can only be described as a destruction of the very basis of free enterprise through sabotaging the normal return on investments.

There can be nothing new under the sun, Mr. Speaker, except straight thinking free from prejudice masqueraded as human sympathy. Straight thinking tells us that voluntary insurance against mishaps and even old age has its proper place; but pensions are a matter not of obtaining a payment of earned income but of charity only. There can be no proper social obligation to provide for private misfortune or old age. If public charity be undertaken, it cannot be presented as anything but an unfortunate expedient in redistributing by taxation what has been needlessly maldistributed. More accurately, it should be described as a makeshift in distributing what is being produced as against what should be produced in a proper set-up and properly distributed in the first place. At best, it is the pound of cure administered in place of the ounce of prevention. Even though paid justifiably, as to war veterans, a public pension system cannot represent actually earned income belonging to pensioners by any actual production through either labor or investment. It cannot fail, therefore, to become a political pork barrel and a constant threat to liberal, democratic institutions.

PRIDE GOETH BEFORE A FALL

Many of the most active and sincere advocates of intellectual freedom—

Says Public Policy Pamphlet No. 29 of the University of Chicago, entitled "Freedom and the Economic System"— are, in effect, its worst enemies, much more dangerous than its avowed opponents, because they bring to the collectivist movement * * * the support of those who would recoil in horror if they understood these consequences.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the situation, created by public subsidies and the pump-priming social measures, which we are today boastfully told is a new deal in Americanism and democracy. But pride, Mr. Speaker, goeth before a fall. No more arrantly fatuous nonsense was ever spewed by the denizens of Rome in the days of her decline than that which bespeaks the alleged efficiency of the American way of exploiting our frontier. Never in history has a more wasteful exploitation of human and natural resources been so effectively implemented as in this Nation, here and now. It is in no spirit of sentimentalism over poverty and unemployment, nor even of loyalty to democratic ideals, that I raise a feeble voice in protest. Rather is it in realization that a race which lacks the intelligence to erect a financial system commensurate with the ideals of liberty cannot hope to maintain, much less defend, the institutions of democracy. The attempt can only spell ultimate doom for the race and surrender of the new frontiers to those who will be no less ruthless with modern inefficiency than were we when, at the inception of the industrial revolution, we colonized America over the bitter opposition of the original Americans who sought to defend their land and their liberty.

What they lacked, among other things, we also lack—a workable and sound money system operating outside the control of political administrations.

Isaiah Speaks to America

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

SERMON BY CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, PREACHED IN ROCKEFELLER MEMORIAL CHAPEL, UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO, JUNE 2, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address by Charles Clayton Morrison, editor, entitled "Isaiah Speaks to America," as follows:

O Assyria, rod of my anger, and staff of my fury! * * * O people of mine, be not afraid of Assyria * * * for in a very little while my fury shall cease and my anger shall come to an end. (Isaiah 10:5; 24, 25. Smith-Goodspeed translation.)

We have all come to this place of prayer with solemn and disquieted hearts. You expect me to speak on the tragedy that is called Europe, and on America's relation to it. For this hour we have laid aside our newspapers and tuned out the chatter of reporters and commentators, hoping to find some light and cheer in the message of religion. All of us long for a word from a prophet of God. I propose that we listen to the prophet Isaiah. He stood in a situation strikingly like that in which we stand. And he spoke to it. If we hear again this prophet's word, it may help us to orient our hearts in the scene in which we find ourselves.

Extreme peril threatened the little kingdom of Judah. The Assyrian king, Sargon, with his army on its way to Egypt, had invaded and crushed Syria and Samaria and was within 2 days' march of the borders of Judah. For years, Isaiah had been preaching to his countrymen that Assyria would one day come down upon them like a wolf on the fold, and that there could be no protection for Judah if Judah did not mend its way, reform its injustices, purify the state, and especially rid Zion of its idolatry, which was an offense to Jehovah. The politicans and priests gave no heed to his prophesyings, save to leer at them from couches of drunkenness and wantonness, the while they kept on oppressing the people with injustice and robbery. But now the Assyrian king was marching across Syria and Palestine. The little countries to the north had fallen before the conqueror, and the people of Judah, whose turn was next, were in a panic of hysteria.

Isaiah saw in this historical scene the hand of God. Judah is to suffer—there could be no doubt of that. Now that the invasion is imminent, what has Isaiah to say? He speaks both a stern word of judgment and a comforting word of hope. God, he says, is using Assyria as the rod of his wrath against Judah. You would not listen to God's prophet, he tells his countrymen. You would not reform your wanton ways. You would not give up your power to oppress. You would not rectify the internal injustices of the nation. Therefore God is about to use Sargon as the only instrument of reform which you will heed. Your land shall be laid waste, your wealth confiscated, your children and women led captive.

Let us read this ancient prophecy with some literary and historical imagination. It is not necessary for us to accept Isaiah's oversimplification of events. A literalistic mind can raise many questions and thereby miss the great truth. Make allowances for the period in which Isaiah lived. Allow also for what may seem like a naive and narrow perspective determined by Isaiah's total preoccupation with the interests of the tiny kingdom of Judah. But when you have made all such allowances, two majestic truths stand out. One of these is the truth that the process of history contains a punitive principle, that men and nations are punished for their sins by the unescapable operation of the forces which are immanent in history itself. These punitive forces which attack human sin may themselves be even more evil than the men and nations whose sin they punish. Evil attacks evil. It was no part of Sargon's intention to punish Judah because of any evils that were there. Certainly he was no reformer, nor was the Assyrian army a better government association. Sargon curled his lip at Judah's God. A ruthless aggressor, he was out for power, for exploitation, for aggrandizement. He had even made a treaty of alliance with Judah, but his word could not be trusted. He was a notorious breaker of treaties, a veritable Adolf Hitler. Yet Isaiah said he would serve God's purpose. He would be the unwitting rod of God's judgment against Judah because of Judah's disobedience. That was the first truth which Isaiah sought to impress upon his people.

But Isaiah did not stop at prophesying disaster. He went on to speak a word of hope. There is a limit, he declared, beyond which the conqueror will not be allowed to go. Mount Zion, the hill of the Lord's house, is inviolable. God will protect and preserve it. Assyria is only God's instrument. Sargon is not omnipotent. God still reigns. He has not abdicated. If the Assyrian is a rod in the hand of Jehovah, used by him for the punishment of Judah, he will also be restrained by that same divine hand from destroying the Holy City. This man who boasts that he will overrun the whole world, and harrow Judah as one might harry a bird's nest, who believes in nothing but his own might, who says, "By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my shrewdness, for I am a great military genius, and none can stand before me"—this man is only the rod in God's hand. His boasting is as if the ax boasted over the man that hews with it, and as if the saw boasted against him that plies it.

Suppose, now, that Isaiah stood in this pulpit this morning. What would he say to us, to America, to the stricken and devastated Low Countries of Europe, to Great Britain and France, the remnant of whose maimed and tattered armies has just made a precarious and tragic retreat from the awful holocaust of Flanders? I think Isaiah would say precisely what he said to Judah. The circumstances under which he spoke to Judah were strikingly like the pattern of events spread out before us in this morning's newspaper. He would first say a harsh thing: "Hitler is the rod of God's wrath to punish you for your sin." And then he would say a reassuring thing: "The power of the invader is limited; God still reigns. Hitler is the rod of His anger, but he is only a rod—a rod held fast in God's hand. He can go so far, but no farther. There is a fortress, a holy hill, which he cannot take."

There is a holy hill in every land—in Holland, in Belgium, in Britain, in France, in America—which is forever inviolable, which can be destroyed only if we destroy it ourselves or abandon it. It is the citadel, the holy hill, where a nation's righteous cause, its spiritual treasures, its essential freedom, its democracy—in a word, its civilization—are enshrined. Against this holy city of civilization Sargon has no power, Hitler has no power; it is safe if we treasure it, because its security is backed by the power of God. This, I think, is what Isaiah would say to us if he were here.

Some of you, listening to Isaiah, may complain that you cannot follow his argument. You are not accustomed to see the hand of God in history. You have had all that nonsense blown out of you by your liberal education. For myself, I must say that I stand with Isaiah and Judaism, with Jesus and Christianity, in seeing history as the field of God's action. But I do not wish you to stumble over words. The truth which Isaiah speaks to us is too important to be missed merely because one has trouble with Isaiah's vocabulary or his ideology. What he says can be said without the use of a single theological word. Perhaps your mind will meet his if I put his message in other terms. Let me try to do so.

In the process of history, Isaiah would say, evil strikes against evil to destroy it; but the destroying evil, in its turn, strikes at last against the power which holds the structure of history together, and is itself destroyed. Isaiah calls this power God, and I call it God. But let us not bother about words. By whatever name you call this power, it is moral power, because by definition moral power is that which holds history together. I ask you, therefore, to bring a large and open mind to Isaiah and try to understand his meaning, even if you have difficulty with his vocabulary.

In the situation in which Isaiah stood we have a small-scale picture of the scene in which we of America stand today. The parallelism is little short of astonishing. As the nation of Judah confronted the audacious and arrogant and ruthless Sargon, so today America confronts another Sargon in the person of Adolf Hitler. Like Judah, we have not yet been invaded, but we do not know the ultimate intention of the conqueror, and our minds are inflamed with the possibility that our country may stand in the pathway of his purpose. So long as the countries of Syria and Samaria were secure, Judah felt secure. But when they were crushed Judah's sense of security vanished. So long as Holland and Belgium were secure, America felt secure. But with the crushing of Holland and Belgium and the confounding of France and Britain, America finds herself looking out upon a future the possibility of which she has never envisaged before.

Almost overnight the mood of the country has been transformed. Security has given place to a sense of insecurity. Confidence in a calculable future has given place to wild and fantastic imaginings as to what may be in store for us. Complacency has vanished. Our isolation is gone. True, the oceans are still there—the geography is still the same. But our isolation was never a bare fact of geography. In the modern world America has derived confidence and freedom not only from the fact that the oceans were there but that Great Britain was there. Her Empire stood between us and whatever menace to our national life might arise in other parts of the world. It was no benevolent intention on Britain's part to shield us; I am not attributing motives; I am only stating a fact. The British Empire was a fact and its existence as a fact contributed to America's isolation. Britain, together with France, formed a great buffer between us and all the totalitarian states, so formidable that it was impossible to see ourselves as responsibly involved while these strong powers remained strong.

We of the United States formed the habit of taking the British Empire for granted. Its steel ribs determined the world order in which we moved. The world was organized on the basis of a Pax Britannica. Without examining the character of this world order, it did at least afford a dependable basis for calculating our future. All our policies presupposed its existence and a high degree of unlikelihood that its interests would conflict seriously with our national interests. The power of that empire is now in the balance. Its alliance with France may any day be shattered. We face the possibility that its mighty Navy, its Gibraltar, its Suez, its Singapore, may soon pass into the control of Germany, which is in the control of a messianic dictator bent upon gaining for Germany the place long held by Great Britain in world dominion.

Today America looks at Europe no longer through the protecting screen of British might. For the first time in its history our country is conscious of the stark necessity of independently orienting itself, politically and psychologically, to a world order bristling with incalculable possibilities, between which and our national destiny there may be no such mighty buffer as the British Empire has always been. That is what I mean when I say our isolation is gone. America now looks out upon a world which offers her neither assured enemies nor calculable allies. Our feeling of freedom has suddenly congealed. The veil of our security has been lifted, and America now sees Hitler as Judah saw Sargon. Where shall we find our cue for action ?

Two alternative courses lie open to us. In the first place, we may find our cue for action in our traditional relationship with Great Britain. If Britain goes down, we can move up to and occupy the position which Britain has been compelled to abdicate. We can become another Great Britain, and take upon ourselves the colossal task of policing the world as the British Empire has policed it for generations. This does not mean our adoption of Britain's imperial possessions, or the taking over of the apparatus of imperialism. But it does mean the thrusting of the United States into the world system of power politics, where we shall measure our strength against the strength of other powers, seeking alliances with certain powers against other powers, in the hope of guaranteeing peace by an equilibrium of military force. From all this America has been shielded in the past by the simple fact that Britain, compelled by the exigencies of her imperial position, has assumed this role.

It is this conception of America's role which animates the hectic and hysterical preparedness policy now gripping our Government and our people. True, this policy is proclaimed in the name of national defense, the defense of democracy, and the preservation of civilization, but it implies a role for the United States analogous to that which Great Britain has taken in the past. I am bound to say that the adoption of such a course would be based upon a tragic incomprehension of the crisis to which both America and the world have come.

Unquestionably, America must accept henceforth a responsibility to world civilization in a degree which our most passionate idealism has never yet envisaged. But that this responsibility is to be discharged within the system of power politics, and by war or the threat of war, seems to me, in the hideous light of a Europe bombing itself to destruction, to be a policy not of reason but of suicide. A reasonable armament of the United States is no doubt inevitable, and I am not concerned to offer any criticism of it as an interim measure while the world is aflame and the future is incalculable. But an America armed to the teeth, an America with her industrial economy transformed into an armament economy, with her youth educated in the atmosphere of war psychology and trained in the technique of war as a permanent vocation of patriotism; an America with her whole political and cultural life oriented toward war—such an America presents a tragically insane figure as a defender of civilization.

How much longer must the hell of fire burn in Europe before we learn that all our talk of defending civilization by war is irrational? How could civilization be more utterly destroyed than by modern war? To prepare America for a gratuitous entrance into this scene because, forsooth, Great Britain may be about to fall, is to act like a silly moth drawn into the flame or like dumb sheep following other sheep to the slaughter.

For America to conceive her role in civilization as that of an inheritor of Great Britain's role in the power politics of empire capitalism is only to court the same fate which we now fear is about to overtake Great Britain. America's entrance into the world scene, panoplied with armament, and with no other spirit or policy than that of war and alliances for war in the framework of the old order, will only prolong the death agony of an order that is already doomed.

Yet America must act. Where shall America find a cue for her action? From the order that is dying in Europe, or from the new order that is struggling to be born? Before we act, let us take counsel of Britain and France as they now face the possibility of ruin. Suppose they stood today where we stand—their armies undefeated; no war yet declared; the channels of negotiation still open; Hitler demanding the Sudetenland, the corridor, and Danzig, but Czechoslovakia and Poland still intact. What would Britain and France do? Obviously they would not do again what they did at Munich. Obviously they could not imagine that a policy of piecemeal appeasement would satisfy the German dictator. Obviously they would seek some more comprehensive and cooperative way of meeting the situation than to risk the treasures of civilization on the irrational gamble of war.

Even today, before it is yet determined that Britain and France will lose the war, Mr. Chamberlain must wish to God that he could go back and do it all over again. Would he not like to go back to Munich and do it all over again—and differently? Instead of offering Hitler a sop to keep the peace of Europe—that is, instead of taking his cue for action from an imperial order which he hoped to perpetuate but which he now sees could not be perpetuated—would he not like to say to Hitler and the German people something like this: "We of Great Britain are ready to unroll the whole map of Europe and to explore the possibility of a total new order of economic and political life for all our peoples, including Germany; if you will join us and our neighbors in such an undertaking, I promise you that Great Britain will participate in such a total reconstruction at whatever sacrifice of national and imperial privilege its accomplishment will call upon us to make." Would not Mr. Chamberlain like to be in a position today to say just that to the German people? Would Hitler have arisen to such an offer? I believe the German people would have demanded that he accept it.

But suppose I am wrong in this confident faith. Suppose Munich was too late to make such an offer. Suppose Hitler would have taken it as an evidence of military weakness and pressed his claim for power still more relentlessly. Then go back further. Go back to the moment when the Weimar Republic was tottering. Or go back to the date when the Dawes plan of reparations was adopted. Or go all the way back to Versailles. Go back as far as may be necessary to find the German people in a mood to respond to a sincere offer of justice. Would not Great Britain and France like to go back there and do it all over again? Mr. Lloyd George sees it clearly. He declared in the House of Commons that Hitler and the Nazi regime are the product of British and French policy, and that the war was brought on in its less immediate but more controlling causes by conditions which Allied blindness and narrow national and imperial self-interest created.

There is not a French or British statesman who would not go back and do it all over again—and, oh, how differently! But they cannot go back. The processes of history are irreversible. The dead lie strewn upon the Flanders battlefield. Holland is out, Belgium is out. The demonic robots of Hitler's mechanized army crash their way toward Paris and the Channel ports.

No; they cannot go back. But we of America are already back! We stand where Britain and France once stood—at the beginning of a sequence of national decisions whose end proved, in their case, to be war and devastation and destruction of everything precious in civilization. We are where Mr. Chamberlain and M. Daladier would like to be, that is, at the point where they or their predecessors could do it all over again and do it differently. To take our cue from the old order in which they acted, to rush to its support with our flesh and blood and our resources of military might, would at best only prolong its death agony, and at worst carry us down with it.

It is in America's power to find a better way. We can choose either to contribute to the prolongation of the old order that carries within itself the inevitability of war, or to the constructive liberation of the new order which is struggling to be born. If Isaiah were here he would hold that choice sternly before America's eyes. War, he would say, is the fruit of sin, and if you cherish your sin and will not repent of it and remove it from your midst, devastation will come upon you, as it has upon Europe. Hitler, like Sargon, is the rod of God's wrath. But because Hitler is himself evil, do not become so obsessed with his evil that you cannot see the evil in your own nations! Judah's house must be cleansed of the evils against which God's wrath hurls the ruthless Assyrian. Western civilization, which quakes under the conqueror's foot, must cleanse its own house of the evils which have produced Hitler.

We know what these evils are in Western civilization. There is nothing obscure or merely theological about them. They are the punitive measures imposed on defeated peoples in previous wars, and the economic injustice in the distribution of the world's goods. The evils that cause war are not ideological. Nor are they inherent in human nature as such. Nor yet is modern war due to original sin, as some of our theologians are insisting.

Mankind does not want war. The German people in their normal state hate war as you and I hate it. For 20 years the nations have been trying to get rid of war by making promises to one another not to engage in it—nonaggression pacts, the League of Nations covenant, the Kellogg Pact. Solemn promises, all! Why were they not kept? Did the governments act in bad faith? Were the statesmen hypocrites? Did they sign with their fingers crossed? No. They devoutly desired peace. But the governments of the nations are not the real governors of the nations. The governments are themselves governed. Their peace plans were a house of cards superimposed upon an economic system that governs the governments and that holds war as Vesuvius holds molten lava.

The housekeeping of mankind is organized as a system of both domestic and imperial greed. This greed is an expression of both human need and human sin. The perennial tragedy to which it leads inheres in the fact that this need and this sin are forced to live together in an economic system which falsifies human dignity by tying up the satisfaction of elemental human needs with the necessity of injuring or oppressing or even killing others. This is why the nations fight. We cannot hope for peace while the nations cherish the unjust privileges upon which their economic life is based.

This, then, I think, would be Isaiah's first message to America: Take the lead in removing the evils which breed war, the evils which you share with all other nations, and which cause the rod of God's wrath to fall smitingly upon them and threateningly upon you. And his second message would likewise be the same as his message to Judah: "Trust God, for God will not let his holy hill be destroyed."

When Isaiah says "trust God," he does not have in mind a supernatural deity who from outside of history will in his own good time intervene in history to change things and save man. When Isaiah says "trust God," he has history itself in mind. For Isaiah's God was no deus ex machina, but the God of the concrete historical process. In this process of history, let me repeat, evil attacks evil to destroy it; but the destroying evil, in its turn, strikes at last against the power which holds history together, and is itself destroyed. There are three words—time, history, and God—which all point to the same reality. Time, history, God—there is healing in them, there is reconstruction in them, there is justice and peace in them—if only man would cooperate with them instead of trying to force them to serve his selfish and sin-cherishing privileges.

Do not fear the Assyrian, said Isaiah to Judah. Sargon's power is limited. Do not fear Hitler, he would say to us, even if he conquers Europe. His power is limited. It is limited by the normal processes of history. It is America's supreme duty now to adopt a course which will keep these processes open and active. We must not let them be choked by the insane violence of further war. War is the arrogant human attempt to take the control of history out of the Hand that rules history. It is man's supremely insolent defiance of God by attempting to force God's hand. Only in the open processes of history can civilization emerge, and in them only can it be preserved. Thus would Isaiah speak to America.

The world has long waited for a nation to arise which will act upon Isaiah's counsel—a nation willing to trust the pacific processes of history and to pay the price of peace by surrendering its own unfair privileges and taking potluck with the rest of mankind. No other nation is now in sight which can do so much to open the way for a new order for humanity as can our own. Our detached position between two great oceans is not merely a piece of geographical good luck. It is a gift of divine Providence. It lays upon us a unique responsibility for a service to mankind whose depth and reach our leaders have not yet taken to heart. But we cannot render this service or preserve our own treasures of civilization by taking over the military apparatus and the political entanglements of nations which are so caught in the coils of the old order that they can see no way out but the way of violence.

Peace is America's task, not war. Civilization is America's responsibility, not the destruction of civilization. The world we have known is passing away. Our nationalistic civilization, undergirded by empire capitalism, is on the way to the limbo where slavery and feudalism have long since gone. We have come to a vast crisis in world history. Perhaps our kind of civilization had to be destroyed by cataclysm and tragedy before the evils so deeply entrenched in it could be seen for what they are and before a new order could emerge. The rod of God's anger is clearing old things away. Let us believe that the wand of His creative mercy is making all things new.

Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never failing skill,
He treasures up His vast designs,
And works His sovereign will.

A Prophet in His Own Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

Friday, May 3, 1940

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, recent world events have caused much confusion in our foreign trade and commercial relations. Much of our foreign commerce has already been interrupted. A number of countries with which we had negotiated trade agreements have been swallowed up by more powerful nations. Those European nations not swallowed up have had to invoke wartime trade controls similar to those practiced by totalitarian states. During the continuance of the present war this confusion is apt to increase. It is extremely difficult to calculate the trade and commercial conditions which will prevail when the struggle on the other side has subsided. We do know that it is time for us to analyze our own position if we are to retain a place as a great producer and seller of products.

Arrangements are already being made throughout the world which severely interfere with foreign trade as it has been carried on in the United States. Individual businessmen are being replaced with Government bureaus and agencies. We realize that the reciprocal trade agreements program has been temporarily shattered. If the worst comes to the worst, its operation may have to be modified. This does not mean, however, that the principles of the program are not sound nor that the world will not eventually go back to trading on those fundamental principles.

Whatever nations are victors in the conflict, efforts will be made such as were displayed after the last war to establish nationalistic advantages in certain trading areas or spheres of influence. There will again be strong nationalistic feelings. Tariffs and all sorts of self-sufficiency movements will envelop the world. Thus the economic stage is apt to be set for another trade war which will inevitably lead to physical combat such as is now occurring. There should remain somewhere a framework of principles to which the world may turn in the future. Someone should sound a warning against the repetition of the sort of peace which was made in 1918.

It was the 1918 type of peace that Secretary Hull inveighed against more than 20 years ago and developed his philosophy of the proper commercial relations for the United States. His program represented a middle course between excessive nationalism and internationalism. If the war has demonstrated anything it has shown Secretary Hull to be a real prophet. He recognized before the last peace was made that political amity among nations frequently rests upon trade amity. He has preached that philosophy in and out of season for nfbre than 20 years. His trade program has been based on the fundamental principle that friendly and fair trade practices at home or abroad make for good neighbors. His trade philosophy is well epitomized in the following homely illustration given by Secretary Hull himself—The Country Home magazine, July 1939:

When I was a boy growing up on a Tennessee farm, we had two neighbors—Jenkins and Jones, I will call them—who were enemies of each other. For many years there had been bad feeling between them—I don't know why—and when they met on the road or in town or at church, they stared at each other coldly and didn't speak.

Then, one spring, one of Jenkins' mules went lame just when he needed the animal most for plowing, and Jones ran short of corn for his hogs. Now, it so happened that Jones was through with his own plowing and had a mule to spare, and Jenkins had a bin filled with corn. A friendly third party brought the two men together, and Jones let Jenkins use a mule in exchange for corn for the hogs. As a result of this transaction, it wasn't long before the two ancient enemies were the best of friends. A common-sense trade and ordinary neighborliness had made them aware of the need of each other and brought them peace.

We will do well to consider the whole picture of our foreign relations, both political and economic, in the light of past experience. Just at this time some irresponsible individuals are circulating propaganda about the imports of a relatively few thousand pounds or bushels of farm products coming from Latin American countries. This administration has taken vital steps in an attempt to create an American solidarity in this hemisphere. Such inciting of ill will makes it difficult to arrive at any "hemispheric amity" which is needed at this juncture of world events.

I want to review a few statements and their underlying philosophy which Secretary Hull made years ago, and indicate their application to present-day situations. Although some of these statements were made more than two decades ago, they are as true today as they were then. These statements now may be a warning for the future. They stand out today as the words of a prophet.

Mr. Hull, as a Member of the House of Representatives on February 21, 1919, spoke on Removal of Economic Barriers in International Finance and Commerce. In that address he quoted point 3 of President Wilson's famous 14 points, calling for the removal of economic barriers and for establishing equality of trade conditions. Historically this statement is a basis of Secretary Hull's trade-agreements program. Mr. Hull then said of point 3:

* * * Upon the solution of the extremely vital problems it presents measurably depends the permanent peace and friendship of nations. Instead of vainly striving to prevent wars after the causes have once arisen, this proposal has for its purpose the prevention of many causes of war.

If a real economic peace can now be effected, it must afford the greatest possible assurance of permanent world peace. The accomplishment of this is most desirable and would in nowise conflict with any suitable plan for a league of nations that may be devised, but, on the contrary, would supplement, strengthen, and make easier its operations, in that there would be far fewer commercial and trade controversies for settlement.

This has been the theme song of Secretary Hull since that time. He has frequently reiterated this philosophy from time to time in his public utterances both in the House of Representatives and the Senate, and elsewhere. In that particular speech he pointed out that the United States had become a greater creditor nation. He realized that a creditor nation, with large surpluses available for export, should not follow the same trade-restrictive policy as a debtor nation which had to sell to pay interest and other charges abroad. He realized that the situation called for a moderation in tariffs. He realized how inconsistent it was for a great creditor nation, on the one hand needing to sell its surplus products abroad, and on the other hand raising tariff walls which throttle exports as well as imports.

Secretary Hull referred to the treaties and agreements which would be broken during the conflict. He then said :

* * * There will naturally be a readjustment of tariffs everywhere, in the light of after-war conditions. This general rearrangement of tariffs will offer a strong incentive to the renewal of tariff wars. Every nation will be disposed to adopt all the accustomed devices and methods calculated to give each some commercial advantage through preference or other means not justifiable except upon the theory that other countries are doing likewise. * * *

Secretary Hull ended that speech by significantly stating:

* * * In any event the world cannot hope to embark upon an era of permanent peace unless it first makes up its mind thus to secure the abandonment of some of the principal underlying causes of most wars in the past.

This speech was not an isolated case where Secretary Hull just happened to hit upon this subject. It was fundamental in his philosophy of government. I find similar statements in his speech in the House of Representatives May 13, 1929, about 10 years later. He was then speaking on the tariff revision, warning of the consequences of the then tariff bill which ended with the disastrous Hawley-Smoot Act. He said:

Instead of a new policy of moderate tariffs with fair and liberal commercial or trade policy based on the favored-nation doctrine in its unconditional form, it is now proposed further to build all our economic policies around the doctrine of extreme nationalism or isolation, with discrimination or retaliation as our chief commercial policy, ignoring the patent fact that the future progress and prosperity of this country requires expanding production and expansion of foreign markets. * * * For each country thus to surround itself with insurmountable trade barriers and pursue the philosophy that it must consume only home-made products, but at the same time sell its surplus to its neighbors and expect to do so indefinitely, is to live in a fool's paradise.

Later on in the Senate and after the Tariff Act of 1930 had been in effect about 2 years, we find the following statement in a speech of Mr. Hull:

Tragic to relate, our national leadership proceeded to perpetrate a colossal and epochal mistake of judgment by complacently pursuing the former course of aloofness with the result that they have not enunciated a single new economic truth since 1920 nor achieved a single major accomplishment; and it is not unfair to charge that their wild and mad pursuit of economic isolation, which contemplates that every nation shall become more and more a hermit nation, constituted the greatest single underlying cause of the awful panic which burst upon our country in 1929.

I denounce this narrow and selfish spirit of economic nationalism as the greatest danger to world peace today. Furthermore, it more seriously threatens the world bankruptcy than war itself. When each country uses every means to block each other's exports, peoples can neither sell nor buy each other's surpluses, so that both trade and purchasing power is dried up. But the theory is that we are to get rich by fencing ourselves off from the world and proceeding industriously to collecting off of each other subsidies, bounties, taxes, rebates, bonuses, profits, and every other sort of gain out of which one person can fleece another.

In this speech Secretary Hull recommended tariff revision authorizing the President to negotiate trade agreements based upon mutual tariff concessions and the unconditional most-favored-nation doctrine.

As Secretary Hull warned in 1919, we realize that after the peace of Versailles the movement for economic nationalism struck Germany, Italy, and southeastern European states. These countries were limited in natural resources contained within their own boundaries. These countries were impeded, in purchasing the things that they needed to purchase, by artificial restrictions and barriers. The very thing which Secretary Hull warned against took place, and, as he pointed out, our own increase of tariffs played an important part in the events which led to the present struggle in Europe.

So much for this purely historical angle of Secretary Hull's program. He continued to argue along the same lines in and out of season, when it was unpopular to do so. Finally, in 1933, he became Secretary of State. In 1934, under his influence, Congress passed the Trade Agreements Act, which has been twice extended for 3-year periods. So the United States belatedly started to lead the way in liberalizing trade to world recovery. Agreements were negotiated with 21 countries. Sad to say, we were at least a decade too late to save the situation. The program was not completed and had too short a time to operate before chaos broke upon the world. While there were many tangible results of increased trade, the important tangible factor, aid in the prevention of war, was ineffective. The program had too short a time to undo the harm which had already been done, the harm which Secretary Hull warned against. For one thing, England held off too long for it was not until late in 1938 that she finally joined with the United States in a trade-liberalizing program.

Secretary Hull, with very strong backing of the administration, has made special efforts to reach a better understanding with the 21 Latin American countries. The good-neighbor policy is closely tied up with Secretary Hull's foreign policy and deserves special attention.

It is generally recognized that the Montevideo Conference of 1933 was a turning point in the history of pan-Americanism. The real good-neighbor policy had been inaugurated by the withdrawal of marines from Nicaragua and Haiti and the abrogation of the Platt amendment. Secretary Hull, chairman of the United States delegation to the Montevideo Conference, convinced Latin Americans that this country had no desire to dominate them. The desire for cooperation changed public sentiment in those countries toward us. It has been said that for the first time in the history of pan-American conferences the delegates of the United States left with the esteem and friendship of the Latin American delegates.

Mr. Hull, in his trade-agreements program and in other matters, has clearly indicated that the good-neighbor policy was more than a friendly gesture. Cuba was the first country with which a trade agreement was concluded under the Trade Agreements Act. The act was passed in June 1934, and by September of that year a trade agreement went into effect with Cuba. In addition, agreements have been concluded with Brazil, Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador, El Salvador, Haiti, Nicaragua, Guatemala, Honduras, and Costa Rica. Unfortunately, the negotiations between the United States and Argentina and Uruguay were terminated; and I say this with the full understanding that those countries raise pretty much the same kind of agricultural products as the United States. Nevertheless, without opening up our markets to the detriment of American farmers, we could have considerably expanded our commerce with these Latin American neighbors. Now is the time when all possible points of trade friction should be mollified. By a more liberal trade policy we might have prevented the influence of "fifth columns" in some of those countries. Those opponents of expanded trade stirred up misunderstandings which may cost us far more than increased imports of a few thousand pounds of this or that product. Cheap politics in this connection should have been abated long ago. We now need the cooperation of other countries of the Western Hemisphere. At a time when we hope to gain inter-American solidarity and security, partisan propaganda ought to be discontinued by irresponsible politicians. Every possible method of trade cooperation should be explored.

As another step in Pan American cooperation Secretary Hull consolidated his good-neighbor policy at the Convention for the Maintenance and Preservation of Peace at Buenos Aires in 1936. He strengthened it again at the Conference of the Declaration of Principles of American Solidarity at Lima in 1938.

Although Secretary Hull did not attend the Panama Conference in 1939 regarding the transfer of sovereignty of geographical regions of the Americas held by non-American states, this conference further evidenced the cooperative spirit of the 21 American Republics. In a recent letter to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the House, the Honorable SOL BLOOM, Secretary Hull indicated that all the American states were the guardians of the Monroe Doctrine. These are a few illustrations of Mr. Hull's sound realistic foreign policy which have been accepted by a great majority of the American people.

The trend of events have more than justified Secretary Hull's life-long position of the widest sort of trade on sound principles which increases prosperity and eliminates the causes of war. Those immediately before him went too far and too fast in the opposite direction. The United States unfortunately set an unwholesome example with its inconsistent high-tariff-creditor-nation position. When our foreign loans ended in the late twenties our post-war commercial policy helped to produce an unexampled international crisis. This led to the depression of 1929 and made possible the conditions which brought forth dictators, who are now playing such an important role in world history.

One of the first things Secretary Hull did when he came into office was to revise our high-tariff policy. His trade-agreements program was a moderate tariff course. In spite of spirited opposition at home and abroad, that program made important progress. It was a belated attempt to stem the tide against totalitarian methods of barter trade and bilateralism, which eventually brought the weaker states under both the economic and political domination of the dictators.

The original principles of the trade-agreements program remain sound, although at the end of the present war we are apt to find ourselves in a position where it is necessary to engage in "barbaric methods"—bilateral balancing—of foreign trade. Opponents of trade agreements have frequently stated that foreign trade is not important to the United States; that it can be given up without serious injury to the United States; that we are largely self-sufficient. If we are going to produce at anything like capacity, it will be necessary to trade some of our surpluses to foreign countries. The real importance of foreign trade will become clear to those who say it is not important to our economy. The importance of trade as it relates to the program, however, may be largely academic until the war ends. But the administration is carefully considering the situation, particularly with respect to the Western Hemisphere. If it becomes necessary to engage in a program of general barter, we ought to be able to hold advantages in some lines. If we can drive some hard bargains, this in itself may have a tendency to influence other countries to go back to a policy of freer competitive trading, such as was adopted in our trade-agreements program.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial, I submit the following from the Saturday Evening Post. I most earnestly commend a careful reading thereof to every Member of the House of Representatives and of the Senate, and to every American citizen having a proper veneration for the fundamentals of our Government:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, July 13, 1940]

This is written on June 10. With no notice to the American people or to the Congress that is supposed to interpret their will, this country entered the war 4 days ago. Stranger than the fact was the passive acceptance of it.

While the Senate was debating, with intent to kill it, a resolution that would have conferred upon the President of the United States certain extraordinary powers, the President seized those powers and involved this country in the European conflict by an act of physical intervention.

This he did by sanction of his own will. The Congress did not know what he was going to do and debated it after the fact. The people, whose war it will be, first read it in newspaper headlines.

What we now write is to complete the record. We have no idea what the next consequences will be or what will have happened by the time these words appear. But as in time to come it may be bitterly remembered, so now be it said that in the one hundred and fifty-first year of its existence the house of constitutional republican government was betrayed, even as the builders feared. Unawares to the people, the exalted Executive principle could involve them in war. We dare to look at the truth and to ask why the house of our fathers had to be half surrendered before it was attacked. We do not here touch the question of whether or not we should go to the side of the Allies. What we are saying is that if the American people may be involved in a world war unawares and without a specific act of Congress, then much else has happened to them of which also they are unaware.

We do not believe the people had ever thought of going again to the battlefields of Europe. They had been misled to think this country somehow could put forth its economic strength and not itself become involved. That is what they were thinking when they were polled on whether we should be giving more aid to the Allies. The idea that we could help to destoy the aggressor in Europe and not get hurt was a propagated phantasy and produced on many minds the hypnotic effect that may or may not have been intended.

To accomplish his purpose, it was necessary for the President to outwit the law. First was a statute, enacted in time of peace, permitting the Military Establishment to sell to any foreign government with whom we were at peace on a certain date surplus munitions and war materials for which there was no other market, and to exchange motor vehicles, airplanes, engines, and parts for new and similar equipment. When that statute was written, nobody could have dreamed that it would ever be used by the President as a pretext for opening this country's arsenals to either side in another world war.

Secondly, it was necessary to beat the prohibitions of international law and especially Article VI of The Hague Convention of 1907, to which this country put its name, which is still in force, and which reads: "The supply in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war material of any kind whatever, is forbidden."

Observe here the very strict distinction. The private citizen of a neutral country may sell arms and war material to a belligerent power; that is permitted. American industry, acting privately, could sell airplanes and guns to the Allies. But for a government to do it is an act of intervention. The government that does it is no longer neutral. It has taken part. It is, in fact, at war.

The President of the United States could not himself, of his own will, declare war. Only the Congress has the constitutional power to declare war. But he hit upon a device for getting the country into the conflict without declaring war.

As Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States he declared the Navy to have a surplus of airplanes, at a moment when there was a panic of anxiety over the shocking inadequacy of the country's air defenses. As Commander in Chief he ordered the Navy to deliver this alleged surplus of planes back to the factory they came from, in exchange for new planes yet to be made—and this under a previous stipulation with the airplane factory that as fast as it received the planes from the Navy, it would hand them over to the Allies.

We had no surplus of airplanes; so far otherwise, we very urgently want more than we are yet able to make for ourselves. Nor were these obsolete planes, for if they were, of what use could they be to the Allies in battle? Thirdly, then, the make-believe that in the end it became simply a transaction between the private American airplane industry and the Allies, because the Navy, on delivering the planes to the factory, quit title to them, was only clever, and far beneath the dignity of a great people.

The next day it was guns. As Commander in Chief, the President would declare obsolete or surplus a lot of United States Army guns, including thousands of the 75 mm.'s the French were greatly in need of, sell them to American gun makers, who would sell them at once to the Allies, undertaking to replace them later in the American armory out of new manufacture.

That day, as reported in the New York Times, "In his press-conference discussion of national-defense plans, President Roosevelt refused the role of prophet when asked how far this Government was prepared to go in supplying the Allied powers with guns, ammunition, and aircraft." And how about bombs to go with the bombing planes? That question was asked because only the Government itself manufactures the bombs. Therefore there could be no subterfuge of turning back bombs to private manufacturers in exchange for new and better bombs later. The reporters could not quote the President directly at this point. The New York Times reporter wrote: "It was remarked, however, that the law does not require surplus munitions to be returned to the factory whence they came, but merely specifies that they may be exchanged for other munitions." Which means, if it means anything, that the President was thinking the Government could manufacture bombs to go with the airplanes, sell them to somebody who would sell them to the Allies, and itself take anything in exchange.

Then what of warships? What of turning warships back to the shipyards that made them on an undertaking by the shipbuilders to sell them to the Allies and make new ones for the United States Navy? The reporters asked the President that question. The New York Times reporter wrote: "He explained that he had been unable to get to that question so far."

How far on this line would the Government go? Only the President could say, and he declined to be prophet.

What else might the Government do? If the people would know that, let them read the cryptic words of newspaper reporters writing under the censorship imposed upon the White House press conference.

What a text is there. Government by Executive inspiration. War by Executive impulse.

We shall survive the war. But how? As a government of the people, by the people, for the people? Or as a state that has embraced in the New World what it had wished to destroy in the old?

For it is war. Since the first week of June this country has been in fact at war with Germany. Take it in simple fact. Suppose we were at war and a government that had been neutral in form, but not in feeling, suddenly opened its arsenals to our enemy, exactly as we have opened ours to the Allies.

Would we regard it as an act of war? We would. What would we do about it? We would declare war on that government, and if for strategic reasons not actually at once, then certainly in our hearts and minds, for a future settlement.

If it should turn out that to strip this country of armaments and send them to Europe at a moment in history when our existing power of national defense was pitifully inadequate and the crisis in Europe was such that no one could say how many hours remained of the British Empire, or that the aggressor might not win, capture the Allied fleet, and dictate a peace before enough American aid to turn the battle against him could possibly arrive—if it should turn out that this had been a tragic blunder, beyond recall, then the leader who had done it might wish that his page in the book of fame would refuse to receive ink, for it would be written of him there that in his passionate zeal to save civilization in Europe he had forgotten his own country.

Mr. Speaker, the implications of the Presidential actions referred to in the editorial above are plain indeed and they constitute further reasons why this Congress should not adjourn.

If the President of the United States can, while the Congress is in Washington and in session, covertly transfer to a country at war the very best airplanes, ordnance, and other military equipment of our armed forces, all of which we desperately need for our own defense, and which cannot in the immediate future be replaced; and, if he can do this with no authority of domestic law other than that arrogated unto himself; and if he can, in violation of international law, and especially of article VI of the Hague Convention of 1907 which we still are legally and morally bound to observe, then what in the name of common sense may we expect from him if the Congress adjourns and thus relieves him of all restraint?

Mr. Speaker, we still have the ships of the fleet, or at least all that have not been declared obsolete and disposed of. Our Navy constitutes our only first line of defense notwithstanding recent mouthings to the effect that this first line is in France or on the Rhine. Let it remain our Navy. Let us maintain and strengthen it for our defense. Further, let us see to it if we can that the Executive Department of this Government cease its muddling and meddling in the affairs of the Old World and that it refrain from doing those things which inevitably will push us completely into the present European war.

Intelligence Unit, Bureau of Internal Revenue, Finally Receives Recognition

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, for years, many times I have taken the floor and pleaded for an increase in the appropriation for the Intelligence Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. A few months ago when it became evident we would have a tax bill, I appealed to the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue when the time arrived to apply for additional funds to enforce our tax laws that an item be included for additional help for the Intelligence Unit. I am happy to say that money was appropriated in the last deficiency bill. Five million dollars of the five million eight hundred thousand dollars asked by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the Bureau of the Budget was allowed. As a result Hon. Elmer L. Irey, Chief of the Intelligence, will be able to increase his force by about 80 agents and 20 clerks and accountants. Every additional employee will be required to qualify through the civil service. Irey's office alone will bring to the Treasury many times the $5,000,000 that has been allowed.

A very interesting article concerning the activities of this Government agency appeared in the New York Times of July 14, and under permission granted me, I include that article as part of my remarks. It follows:

ON THE TRAIL OF THE TAX DODGER

(By L. H. Robbins)

WASHINGTON.

Another eminent tax dodger confesses the error of his way, parts with a million dollars or so, and prepares for a chastening stay at Fort Leavenworth. In his reluctance to pay his dues in the democracy that gave him his golden opportunity he reckoned without the Secretary of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and Elmer Lincoln Irey.

Mr. Irey, Chief of the Intelligence Unit of the Treasury, says he is only a cog in the mill that grinds tax evaders fine. He hands the bulk of the credit to others—to the revenue accountants who trace truth through mazes of mendacious bookkeeping, the Attorney General's people who try the cases, and the Treasury higher-ups who stand firm against the pressure that powerful culprits bring to bear.

All the same you may notice that Mr. Irey is usually mentioned as among those present at the show-down. His unit assembles and organizes most of the evidence. It got 103 convictions last year in 104 cases brought to trial. Often it is so thorough in its work that the haughtiest violators have nothing to do but to come into court, flanked by embattled lawyers, and meekly plead guilty.

The genial Mr. Irey at his desk, with his free-and-easy air, his ready smile, and his buoyant way of talking, seems like anything but a man hunter. But when his telephone brings him a problem for quick decision and you see how his eyes sharpen and his mind concentrates you conclude that he would be a bad one to cross.

Capone and Pendergast and Annenberg found him so. Scores of self-elected tax exempts, including lords of big business, sweatily puffing their jowls, and queens of Hollywood, registering disdain fading into hysterics, have sat in this very chair and made the same discovery about him. He is not impressed by any of them.

He would as soon wreck the richest as not. He routs organized crime when no one else can. He fills the Federal prisons, from Lewisburg to Alcatraz, with fuehrers, political czars, and other money-making celebrities who dislike to help the rest of us support the Government. In their home towns they may be above the law, or perhaps they themselves are the law, but when they don't do right by Uncle Sam about their income taxes, Mr. Irey gathers them in.

Since 1920 he has gathered in 12,000 such ingrates, many of them as illustrious, in their way as our day can boast—liquor kings, match kings, sewer kings, circus kings, moguls of the narcotics and the slot-machine industries, Senators and Governors, predatory bankers, evangelists and college presidents, labor leaders and big-time gamblers. There's no end of distinguished scalps hanging from his belt.

Convicting 92 percent of his prey, he has thrown the fear of the United States of America into hundreds of other dodgers. They may not be suspect, but, reading of Mr. Irey's big kills, they come running to make first returns or to amend returns falsely made. In the year after the Capone conviction delinquent tax collections in the Chicago district doubled. The hesitant American taxpayer is honest at heart, especially when he is scared.

If excuses are good enough, Mr. Irey remarks, or if criminal prosecution seems uncompromising, the late comers are allowed to pay principal, interest, and penalties and go at large. Nine in ten are lucky that way. But if deliberate fraud is clear they are out of luck. The Government settles no case of fraud privately. It turned down a proffered million and a half from Al Capone. It is leery of all free-will disclosures of understated income or offers of settlement, magnanimous or remorseful. When a citizen walks in under his own power and begs to shell out $200,000, the Government has the instantaneous hunch, born of experience, that he owes $400,000 at least.

To check on the veracity of all the taxpayers in this great, rich country is such a large order and the crooked ones are so slick it seems an awesome mystery to the layman that Mr. Irey and his agents should be able to nail so many. How, in the first place, do they get wind of a tax dodger, and how, then, do they proceed to run him to earth? Mr. Irey replies that it might undermine the wholesome awe in which the public has learned to hold the Revenue Bureau if he should give away his stuff. Nevertheless, he mentions some general principles.

The first line of defense against tax avoiders is inspection of returns at local offices of collection, where the avoiders are known. People who indulge in riotous living, make big winnings in the market, sport low license numbers, contribute lavishly to campaign funds, train with shady gangs, or stand in with political machines are naturally looked over. Most of them get their names in print and collectors read the newspapers.

Informers help to put the Government wise. Hundreds of letters from them, signed or not, are open-mindedly investigated. Says Mr. Irey: "People who cheat the Government are not likely to stop there; they go on and cheat their partners and their helpers, and these victims, being human, get square by turning them in. Dishonest people, too, tend to be cruel. A half-starved old bookkeeper or a mistreated typist may be driven to squeal on the man who lies to the tax collector.

"Good citizenship also does its bit. A public-spirited soul who pays his tax like a man points to a prosperous neighbor who is holding out. A man of wealth puts us on the trail of people who offer to show him how to doctor his return or bribe a tax official. But common report is the best tipster."

An officeholder is protecting vice. A contractor on public work buys a racing stable. A corporation does a rushing business in hot oil. An architect in the Whoozie Ring is piling up a fortune in kickbacks. The bargaining agent of a trade union acquires a Park Avenue penthouse. When rumor turns the spotlight on these fortunates and their returns seem fishy, or there are no returns at all, Mr. Irey's special agents go to work.

They need Job's patience. They may have to march around an extra-clever tax dodger for weeks to find the first chink in his armor. If he has filed a return, they have something to start with. His deductions for expenses, losses, depreciation, and lowered inventory can be scrutinized. It is no great trick to discover that an expense item of $25,000 for a "salesmen's convention" represents the cost of a week-long private carouse at a leased hotel. It is a simple matter to learn that he has incorporated his steam yacht, chartered it for a week to friends and run it himself the rest of the season at a heavy loss, said loss duly deducted in his tax return.

When he owns many corporations and shuttles his income back and forth among them till all possibility of tracing it seems lost, the investigation brings in expert bookkeepers, cost accountants, and auditors of the Revenue Bureau to toil over the baffling records. Often the records are intentionally incomplete. Perhaps the man has two sets of books, one for Government inspection, the other for private use—and for quick removal across a handy international boundary in time of stress. One recent notorious case of concealing income through fake bookkeeping had 45 Treasury men busy for 5 years.

Still harder is the problem of the tax dodger who gains his income nefariously and makes no report of it. When, on top of that, he collects and spends it in cash, or when he delegates his banking, along with his murdering, to his pals, then the going is tough. In such a case the banks are circularized for signs of his invisible deposits. The Government men establish airtight surveillance of him. They get in with his gang, risking their lives. By and by, after devious search, the deposits turn up. Then Uncle Sam's bank wizards and handwriting experts are called in.

The case against many a foxy miscreant is broken a thousand miles from his lair. A malefactor of sudden wealth may be too smart to splurge in his home town. Perhaps he lives as humbly as his neighbors. But what are his habits and his scale of living at Whoopee-by-the-Sea, Fla., or Steamy Waters, Ark.? Through watching his spending his pursuers form a fair estimate of his hidden income.

Bit by bit they assemble their evidence—"it is like putting a jigsaw puzzle together," says Mr. Irey—and almost always, at last, they get their man. "You can't win" against the Federal Treasury. They have had their little disappointments, of course, as when the honest and trusting associates of a labor-union executive who has been caught with an undeclared couple of millions bump him off before his trial. That sort of slip will happen.

The Annenberg case, lately concluded, Mr. Irey regards as his second most difficult. The one harder case is still in the courts. The Annenberg settlement of $9,500,000 was the largest in any fraud case. There have been civil settlements still larger. In 20 years Mr. Irey's unit has helped to recapture close to a half-billion dollars.

Commissioner Guy T. Helvering, of the Internal Revenue Bureau, who dislikes tax dodgers as wholeheartedly as Mr. Irey, agrees that their successful prosecution has had a salutary effect on the general public. "But there are always new tricks," he says. "As soon as the loopholes in the tax law are stopped with a new law, the tax advisers study to find loopholes in the new one." You gather also that he expects that the imminent broadening of the tax base to admit new classes of taxpayers will only add gray hairs to his head.

"But won't the new classes of taxpayers be conscientious in reporting their incomes and proud to do their share? Isn't tax dodging confined pretty much to the criminal elements? Wise people, respectable people, they don't gyp the Government, as a rule, do they?"

Mr. Helvering gives his questioner a look as hard as nails and answers, "You'd be surprised!"

Henry Morgenthau, Jr., on becoming Secretary of the Treasury, declared that the day was over when the rich, the wise, and the good, or anybody else, could stay the Revenue Bureau from the completion of its appointed job. There would be, he said, no more favors to the elite. That defiance of privileged tax dodgers has made the work easier for Mr. Helvering and Mr. Irey, though Mr. Helvering says the pressure is still strong.

Not expecting to become the terror of tax dodgers, Mr. Irey, born in Kansas City, grew up and went to school here in Washington; his father worked in the Government Printing Office. Young Irey's first job was stenographer in the Post Office Department. By and by he was a post-office inspector. In 1919, when war profits were high, the income-tax law was still young and taxpayers hadn't learned to take it seriously. Irey was chosen to form an intelligence unit in the revenue office and called in six other post-office inspectors to help.

From that start his unit has grown to include 245 special agents. They serve the Government in many ways; they check on applicants for Treasury jobs, for one thing, and they investigate tax officials as diligently as they do taxpayers; but they are concerned mainly with income-tax violations. It is said that for every $2 they cost they bring $100 into the Treasury.

Mr. Irey has still another job. Under this administration the six law-enforcement agencies in the Treasury—the Secret Service, the Customs, Coast Guard, Narcotics, and Alcohol-tax services, and the Intelligence Unit—have been coordinated both at Washington and in the field. And Elmer Irey, with his gift for seeing conclusions in clues and for putting two and two together, is the coordinator.

The adventures he has had would fill a detective-story library. To mention just one, he flew with Colonel Lindbergh over Vineyard Sound on a bleak day in 1932, looking for the boat Nellie in which Lindbergh had been told his kidnaped child would be found. Nothing came of that flight; but it was Mr. Irey who insisted, against the wish of the anxious father, that the serial numbers of the banknotes in the ransom money should be recorded, and that precaution led at last to the kidnaper's capture, as the world knows.

Mr. Irey's home is on the West River, down Chesapeake Bay way. There, in slacks, he sails a smart little knockabout with his two tall and lively sons—when the tax dodgers give him a day off for it.

A Timely Word From a Patriotic American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

QUOTATION FROM BOOK BY FRED TAYLOR WILSON

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, on July 11, I attempted to outline my own views as to what constitutes adequate educational preparation of the defenders of America and also the nature of such training. After indicating the scientific, industrial, technical character of service which the machine wars of today require, I pointed out the need of another type of education, not so much of the head and hand as of the heart. We desire a loyalty and patriotism born of a knowledge of our glorious history, together with a deep respect for American institutions based on an understanding of them. All this develops that love of country which we would like every citizen to have, and which we want especially to be the motivating force actuating our defenders.

This zeal, loyalty, and faith may be inspired by a study of our best literature, as well as gleaned from our greatest educational and spiritual guides. As a teacher I have often turned for inspiration to the writings of Fred Taylor Wilson, having used his books in my classes for many years. Today I was privileged to read a manuscript of a new book of his which will soon be off the press under the title of These Three Alone. To my mind it conveys a message for all the American people in this dark hour. I therefore ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a brief quotation from this forthcoming book.

FAITH IN OUR OWN COUNTRY

Believe in your own country. If you are not pleased with your native land or adopted country, and think that better conditions obtain beyond the seas, why not go there? Just at present, at least, the situation is not inviting. Sir Walter Scott exclaimed:

"Breathes there the man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!"

Later on in the poem he makes known the fate of such a man.

Everyone should have pride in his own town, city, or rural community and work to make such the most ideal place possible. The writer will always remember a conversation he once heard in a little east Texas town called Corrigan, a typical American village, with hogs running freely in the streets, and either mud or dust always everywhere. An old colored man who had been living for awhile in Lufkin, a nearby county seat, was being heartily welcomed back home by a white friend. In replying, the old Negro said, "I have been over the world a good deal, but I have concluded that Corrigan is the best place in the world.'" And no doubt it was to this much-traveled son of Ham. He was back home, "the best place in the world" to him.

We should love America, our homeland. It is the land beautiful. Two great oceans and one wide gulf wash its picturesque shores on our east, west, and south. Three thousand miles of boundary line lie between us and a friendly rival on the north, with not a single soldier or gun needed as defense. We are at peace, with a common language, a common democracy, and a mutual desire to live in peace and harmony. To our own land come the people of all nations in search of freedom of worship, freedom of speech, and freedom of assembly—blessings which we ourselves do not always fully appreciate. The mayor of New York, in a fiery speech, once denounced Hitler. So outraged was the German nation that its authorities appealed to our Department of State to disavow the accusing outburst of the New York mayor. This calm reply was sent back to Germany: "In America we have freedom of speech."

Nothing is lost by the fullest discussion of any subject. If foolish, it will die when it reaches fresh air, like plants which grow in the dark. If it deserves to be heard, it should and will be heard in time. To forcibly suppress any man or movement not openly seditious simply makes way for a plausible excuse to seek martyrdom. A cursory review of our history as a nation will reveal the bleached bones of countless causes killed by the power of pitiless publicity.

Every loyal American loves his native land. We are properly proud of America. Our territory may not equal that of Russia, nor our population be that of China, yet we have inherent in our people that which excels both plains and population. We have a just pride in our material progress. The United States, with only 6 percent of the area of the world and 7 percent of its population, owns 80 percent of the automobiles in the world, produces 70 percent of the world's oil, raises 60 percent of its wheat and cotton, and mines more than 50 percent of all the world's gold. Nearly 70 percent of the world's banking is under American direction and 60 percent of all telephones are ours. We also supply 69 percent of all the crude petroleum in the world and 36 percent of its coal. As consumers, America uses 48 percent of the world's coffee, 58 percent of its tin, 53 percent of its sugar, 56 percent of its rubber, 42 percent of its pig iron, 47 percent of the copper, 36 percent of the coal, and 72 percent of all its silk.

We, Midas-like, now have buried in a grave of marble in Kentucky and elsewhere 80 percent of all the world's gold.

Perhaps we boast too much of our material greatness. We need often to remind ourselves that a nation's greatness, like the greatness of an individual, is not measured by the things which it possesses, but by the extent that it is possessed by the real values of life. Real values are moral not material. Our permanent gain is a gain in goodness and not in goods. Freedom of spirit is more to be desired than financial supremacy and to be devoted to truth is a nobler aim than a desire for world trade.

This volume appears at an anxious hour in our history. Sinister shadows steal across our skies. Gray's line, "kept the noiseless tenor of their way," has applied to us. For a long time we have kept the noiseless tenor of our way, as we saw the changing flags of other nations torn by the cruel winds of war.

We have felt ourselves secure thus far from the ignoble strife abroad. But unlooked-for events may force us to put aside our flutes and search again for fifes. Our debates may be silenced by drum beats. But whatever the future may bring, we will be true to our own flag.

Where we have been weak we will become strong. Where we have been indifferent we will become alert. As we see the lamps of liberty lowered in other lands we will lift still higher our own. As "the lovely brow of Freedom grows cold, in trampled muds," across the seas, we will keep our own freedom more alive than ever. As democracy, bleeding, elsewhere retreats we will put to the quivering lips of our own the wine of a new faith. As justice and righteousness flee in fear from other lands we here will hold them to our hearts with an increasing devotion. We will sing anew,

America! America!
God shed His grace on thee,
And crown thy good with brotherhood
From sea to shining sea!

Nomination of Hon. William B. Bankhead for Vice President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER PATRICK

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. HENRY B. STEAGALL, OF ALABAMA

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Speaker, please let me at this time come forward and present to you the speech of the gentleman from Alabama, Hon. HENRY B. STEAGALL, presenting the name of Speaker WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD at Chicago:

Mr. Chairman and members of the convention, at no time in our history have Democrats had more cause for rejoicing than at this good hour. No national convention of any party ever assembled under auspices so inspiring or with a record of accomplishments so far reaching and enduring. Every member of this convention was thrilled with emotions of patriotism and pride as he listened to the masterly address of our Temporary Chairman in his eloquent portrayal of the achievements of our party during the seven and one-half years of the present Democratic Administration. The Democratic Party has never failed to provide leadership adequate to any task confronting the Nation. The path of our history from this hour back to its beginning shines bright with the contributions of Democratic leadership to human progress.

It was the world's greatest Democrat who flung into the face of his king the challenge that all men are created free and equal and entitled to equal opportunity in the pursuit of happiness. It was he who taught that the inalienable rights of individuals and minorities should be placed forever above and beyond the edicts of rulers or legislative enactments.

Our Constitution was written under the guidance of Democratic leadership. Under this Constitution has been developed the greatest republic the world has ever known. It was a great Democrat, who, as Chief Executive of the Nation, proclaimed the doctrine that this republic should forever stand guard over the freedom of the peoples of the Western Hemisphere and against encroachment of any foreign power threatening inroads affecting our free institutions.

It was a great Democrat who redeemed and restored the sovereign right of the Government to control the Nation's supply of credit and currency free from the domination of selfish, greedy, private interests.

It was a Democrat, the great Commoner, who as Secretary of State, sought to have the nations of the world covenant to allow time for the settlement of their controversies by peaceful solution before resort to force. If this proposal had been adopted it would have averted the World War.

It was another great Democratic leader, who, following the World War, sought to establish a power to put an end to international anarchy and provide for the adjudication of problems affecting international relationships in a common council and upon principles of justice. If this plan had been consummated, the conflict that now threatens civilization would have been averted.

In every crisis confronting the Nation our party has met its responsibility and furnished leadership suited to the demands of the the time. We can never forget the conditions faced by the present Democratic administration on the 4th of March, 1933. No such challenge to leadership had ever been presented in time of peace. Every business interest—agricultural, industrial, and commercial—was threatened by bankruptcy and paralysis. Our banking system had collapsed. Millions of citizens were unable to find employment for the support of their loved ones. The chaos and confusion of that dark hour had become a source of alarm to every thoughtful citizen in the land. With masterly courage and capability the Administration turned its hand to the task. The banking system was reestablished, bank deposits insured, and bank failures ended. The system was never on a sounder basis nor so well prepared to serve the public as now. The rights of labor have been secured and strengthened. Agriculture has been given unprecedented consideration and the income of our farmers doubled. The challenge of that hour was met heroically, constructively, and with gratification to the people of the United States. They recorded their approval 4 years later by a verdict without parallel in our political history.

Again the people of the United States face a crisis threatening established order and the cherished institutions that represent the growth and advancement of centuries of civilization. Our heritage, our achievements, our safety, our future demand of all citizens, whether in private or public life, the fullest measure of patriotic service.

The selection of candidates for President and Vice President by either of our great political parties at any time involves stupendous responsibility. In the midst of the disturbed conditions now existing this responsibility is felt more keenly than ever before by all who have part in what we are doing here. As delegates to this convention we propose to meet our responsibility to the people of the Nation. No man will be selected here for a place on our ticket who does not have the background, the experience, the training in public life that fit him for the service that will be required of the next President and Vice President of the United States. I bespeak the sentiment of every delegate here when I declare that no one lacking these qualifications need expect favorable consideration by this convention.

Alabama offers for the nomination by this convention as candidate for Vice President her most brilliant and beloved son—a man whose unquestioned fitness meets every requirement. His record of distinguished public service extends over a period of more than a quarter of a century. He has been tested and tried. Soon after graduation from the University of Alabama he was elected to the legislature of the State and filled the position with distinction. He was next elected prosecuting attorney for his district. In that office he displayed rare legal attainments, superb courage, and a sense of fairness and soon was recognized as one of the State's ablest advocates and most gifted solicitors.

In 1916 he was elected to Congress following his nomination in the primary election of that year as a victorious candidate over Richmond Pearson Hobson, the hero of Santiago—a national character, a great orator, and masterly campaigner. That contest for the Democratic nomination for Congress was one of the most brilliant ever staged in any State in the Union. Since then the tenure of the victor in that campaign has never been seriously challenged.

In the House of Representatives his industry, tact, and ability in debate soon gave him a place as one of the leaders of that body. He was assigned to membership on the Committee on Rules and became chairman of that most important committee. An accomplished parliamentarian—he became the highest authority in all matters of parliamentary procedure in the House. In 1935 he was elected majority leader of the House. As majority leader he employed remarkable political sagacity and understanding, superb tact and diplomacy, and brilliant gifts of oratory. He commanded the unfailing loyalty and support of his party associates and enjoyed the profound esteem of the opposition. Neither party ever had an abler or more successful leader in the House of Representatives.

In 1936 he was elected Speaker of the House. I have had the honor of serving in the House of Representatives under Speaker Clark, of Missouri, Speaker Gillette, of Massachusetts, Speaker Longworth, of Ohio, Speaker Garner, of Texas, Speaker Rainey, of Illinois, and Speaker Byrns, of Tennessee, all of whom, regardless of party affiliation, like those who preceded them in that high office, were eminent statesmen and great Americans. Each was regarded as worthy of any honor his party could bestow. The Speakership of the House is the greatest office of the Nation next to that of President and Vice President. No man has ever been elected to that position by accident. It has never been reached except by merit. The present Speaker was elected because of his demonstrated ability and fitness. No Speaker of the House ever displayed a higher order of ability, a more profound grasp of parliamentary procedure, or enjoyed a larger measure of admiration and affectionate regard of his associates in Congress than our present Speaker.

No man was ever called to any office within the gift of the people of the Nation with a finer background. He bears a name long honored and cherished in Alabama and throughout the Nation. His honored father was for 20 years a Member of the House of Representatives of the Congress and ended his career in the Senate of the United States after 13 years of service in that body. He was leader of the movement for Federal aid for roads and became known as the "father of good roads." His name will be forever linked with the legislation establishing our great road-construction program.

A brother, now senior Senator from Alabama, ranks among the ablest Members of the Senate. He is a recognized leader in that body in all matters of legislation touching agriculture and enjoys a popularity among the farmers of the United States not surpassed by anyone in public life.

In the Democratic primary in Alabama this year the Speaker was accorded unanimous endorsement for President of the United States. He is fully equipped for the creditable discharge of the duties of any office, however exalted. He is ripe in experience and rich in learning. He has a knowledge of Government affairs not excelled by any. He possesses high culture and intellectual attainments combined with rugged common sense. He is cautious and constructive—prudent and progressive. He understands political and economic conditions in the United States and is familiar with international affairs. He has a national viewpoint and a sympathetic heart free from prejudice and as broad as humanity. He embodies all the refinements of a brilliant mind and a knightly soul, a Christian gentleman who walks with God. He has rare personal charm and gifts of speech unsurpassed by any man in national public life. He is an ideal American statesman with all the qualities of leadership required to unite the advanced forces of the Nation and point the way to another triumphant victory for the Democratic Party. This convention has chosen for first place on our ticket the greatest living Democrat—the most invincible leader known during the lifetime of this Republic.

Our party is going before the country upon the record of the present Democratic administration. In all the great constructive and humanitarian legislative program of this administration, the Speaker of the House, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, as majority leader, and as Speaker, has borne a responsibility second only to that of the President. Every great measure was submitted to his enlightened judgment and entrusted to his skillful leadership. During these years he has been at all times the President's strong right arm. Surely no nomination for Vice President could be more logical or give greater assurance of harmonious and successful administration than that of the Speaker of the House. It is certain that no selection could supply better promise of party success or the Nation's welfare. His nomination would complete the fulfillment of the duty of this convention to supply leadership representing all that is best in the ideals, the aspirations, and the hopes of the people of this Republic.

We stand upon the mount where rests the ark of the covenant of human freedom. It is ours to preserve what is left. From this will come a rebirth and broader life for the priceless treasures now undergoing destruction. The clouds that cast their shadows over other lands lie beneath us. We live in the blessed sunlight of liberty—the liberty to think, the liberty to speak, the libery to print, the liberty to worship, the liberty to find truth—the truth that makes men free. The nominees of this convention will for 4 years hold in their hands the colors of civilization upon which will be fixed the gaze of all men everywhere who are struggling to be free. These colors can never rest in safer or more worthy hands than when entrusted to the great leader chosen by this convention and the strong right arm on which he has relied during these recent trying years. It is now my great pleasure to present as our candidate for Vice President the name of WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, of Alabama.

The Negro and the Democratic Party

OF

HON. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I delivered at the National Democratic Convention on last Tuesday in Chicago:

Mr. Chairman, members of the convention, my fellow countrymen, in these tragic days when the lives of nations and races are being ruthlessly crushed out and when conferences are being held between leaders of conquering nations for the purpose of directing further attacks upon small and defenseless nations and groups, it is most important and significant that the greatest political party in the greatest and freest Nation in the world, assembled in convention, should include among those whose voices are raised in behalf of human freedom, justice, and good government, that of its largest and, without question, its most loyal and dependable minority group, the Negro.

At the very outset, permit me to say that I bring to this great Democratic conclave greetings from the hearts and souls of 15,000,000 loyal Americans who are deeply conscious of the gravity of our present situation, and who pledge to our country a continuance of that unbroken loyalty of spirit and action which have characterized our conduct in this country since 1619, when the first Negro settlement was made on the banks of the historic James River in the great State of Virginia. There have been no "fifth column" soldiers on our side. There will be none. We know no country besides America. There has not been, and there will be no room for disloyalty in our hearts.

Just a few days ago I was honored to be one of the Independence Day speakers at Williamsburg, Va., a quaint old colonial town situated near the spot where Capt. John Smith, with his party of English settlers, landed May 13, 1607. This landing of white men became the first permanent English settlement in our country.

In my speech at Williamsburg, July 4, I took occasion to call attention to the significant fact that just 12 years after Captain Smith made his landing at Jamestown, another history-making vessel anchored at the same spot and brought to the American shores the first Negro settlers. These 20 Negro settlers joined the white settlers who had preceded them by only 12 years and together these two groups of men, white men from the cold, bleak shores of England, and these black settlers from the great sunny continent of Africa, joined hands, battled and worked successfully for the establishment of this Government which we here represent today.

The Negro is no imposter in this country as some would seem to think. May I remind you that he came here and took up his abode in America in response to a most urgent invitation extended to him by the white settlers of this country, an invitation which he could not refuse to accept? We take pride in the fact that like you we grew up with the country and have gone side by side with you in making it what it is today. After spending more than 300 years on this continent and increasing our numbers from 20 to 15,000,000, we are constrained to call this our country. Together we cleared the forest, we subdued every foe and force which rose to obstruct our patn leading to independence, freedom, liberty, and prosperity. Today, 321 years after the setting up of the first Negro settlement in our country, we look around us and see that here has been founded the greatest and most powerful Nation in the world. A Nation with the richest resources in minerals, materials, and men. Richest in opportunity for growth, development, freedom, and for service to mankind. The Negro has played his part on the battlefield and in every bloody conflict in which we have engaged from the Battle of Bunker Hill to that on Flanders Field where we, two decades ago, along with you, met the enemy and defeated him in this effort to destroy world-wide democracy. We have built here a country and a Government which rightly challenges the admiration of the world. This achievement was made possible only by cooperation between the races in all constructive matters. It will be maintained in the future, as it was achieved in the past only by the two races working harmoniously together for the common good of the country and Nation.

The Nation has passed through many crises, but God has blessed us and enabled us to continue our march upward and onward. It seems to me, today we are face to face with the greatest threat our country has encountered, certainly the greatest since the Civil War. At this crucial moment the duty and responsibility of protecting and maintaining this Government rests upon the shoulders of every true American regardless of race, color, or creed. At the same time the program by which we are to continue our march is in our hands and must be prepared and executed under the leadership of the Democratic Party which has held the reins of government during the past 8 years, and which has demonstrated its ability to bring order and prosperity out of chaos and confusion, such as held the country in its grip March 4, 1933. The Democratic Party saved the country in that crisis; it will save the country in this crisis.

Mr. Chairman, it is my firm opinion that it was through the wise and courageous leadership of this Democratic administration that the Nation has been able to emerge from our long period of depression. The Democratic Party, because of its achievements in saving our Nation, and bringing the real and practical benefits of government to the people of the Nation, the humble as well as the powerful, all racial elements of the nation must feel that we owe a debt of lasting gratitude to our leaders, and especially to our great President. It is for others to speak more at length touching these affairs. I think I should use the brief time allotted me in speaking of what this Democratic administration has done for my group. Especially is this necessary on this occasion because of false propaganda being spread by paid leaders of my race who are engaged in a country-wide effort to deceive Negro voters and to bring them again into the Republican fold.

It is a known fact that because of the burden of slavery sustained by the Negro that he has not been able to share as fully and as largely in the blessings of our great country as has shared the members of the majority group, namely, the white people. For a half century the Negro had been last and least of all groups to come in for favorable consideration at the hands of the National Government. Under this present administration a new day has dawned for the American Negro, and under this administration have come the first real rays of hope for the Negro.

The good-neighbor movement enunciated by this administration is being put into practical operation, with the result that improvements of social conditions are noticeable on every hand. Racial injustices and antagonisms are disappearing as never before, and there is being ushered in an era of good will between the races in all parts of our country heretofore unknown. Only a few days ago I sat in the House of Representatives and heard a distinguished Member of Congress, from the State of Alabama, call to the attention of that body and the world the fact that the first 6 months of 1940 had passed without being marred by a single lynching in our country. He closed his remarks by saying that it was the earnest prayer of every true American that the crime of lynching should be speedily and everlastingly wiped out in our country. Every Member of the House applauded this announcement.

While this administration has worked incessantly to advance the spirit of good will among the nations of the world, and especially among the South American countries, it has done a remarkable job in cultivating friendly relations between the white and the Negro races in the United States. The President has taken the initiative in seeing to it that the Negro, America's most forgotten man, is included in our program.

Whatever others may say about this administration falling down on its platform promises—and it is my contention that there has been no falling down on promises—the Negro certainly cannot say this administration has made him promises which it has refused or failed to keep. This has been a standing and true indictment against the Republican Party for the last 40 years. The Republicans have inserted in their platform such words and promises as they thought would capture the Negro vote, and as soon as they got into power they conveniently forgot those promises until another platform-making day came around. When this administration said it would seek to help the forgotten man of America, it included the Negro as well as the poor of all other races. What are the practical benefits coming from this administration to the Negro? Passing over much of the general benefits coming to all the people and shared by the Negro, I wish to speak specifically of a few of the most outstanding things done by the Democratic Party during this administration. These things I shall mention are only the high points and are known by all the people of the country. I shall not spend any time pointing out the high positions held under this administration by Negroes. I hail these appointments, which are larger in number and higher in degree than those enjoyed by the race at any time in its history, with approval and joy. But, Mr. Chairman, I am far more interested in what this administration has done for common members of the race. I know it is far better to lift the race to a higher level of living than a dozen or two of select members of the race to a few high offices. I want to see my race rise as a race and take its rightful place in our great Nation.

More than 300,000 Negroes have been employed by W. P. A. and through this employment it is estimated that a million and a half of my people have been saved from actual starvation. From the employment of W. P. A. alone, the Negro has received $15,000,000 in monthly wages, and although we constitute only 10 percent of the total population of the country, we constitute 14 percent of the W. P. A. workers.

Of the nearly $35,000,000 spent for the erection of school buildings under this administration, about $8,000,000 have gone to Negro colleges. This does not include appropriations made for Howard University amounting to more than three and a half millions. Hospital buildings and furnishings for Negroes have amounted to several million dollars. Recreation and health centers such as we have never known have been built and provided for my people. Seven thousand, two hundred and forty-two new hospital beds have been made available for Negro patients. At present there is one hospital bed available for one out of every 999 Negroes, while for the whites there is one hospital bed available for one out of every 110 persons.

Through the N. Y. A. the Negro youth stranded in the effort to continue in school has been provided for. Out of a total of 708,000 youths helped through N. Y. A. there were 78,300 Negroes. That is to say that although the Negro constitutes only 9.7 percent of the total population he received 11.1 percent of the aid given through the facilities of the N. Y. A.

About 300,000 colored youth have been enrolled in the C. C. C. camps of the country. The Negro boys have allotted about $700,000 monthly to their parents and needy ones at home. This means that over a period of a year these boys through the C. C. C. have contributed nearly nine millions of dollars to the upkeep and the support of their dependents at home. While this is more than any previous administration has done for the Negro, it is not the largest benefit Negro boys have derived from C. C. C. camps. Thousands of these boys have been taught to read and write. All of them have been given an opportunity to further their training, both in books and in useful trades, and have greatly improved their health and their physical, as well as their moral condition; thus, they are being developed into useful and substantial citizens.

This administration found the Negro on the farm and in the city so poorly housed that his health and morals were being seriously undermined and destroyed. A long step forward has been taken by the Government in providing decent housing for the Negro. In almost every city slum, clearance projects fostered by the Government are providing decent quarters and wholesome environments for the poor and needy of the race; while in the rural section conditions on the farm are being rapidly improved. Tens of thousands of city homes have been saved to the race through Government loans, and in the rural sections hundreds of thousands of Negro farmers are being aided in the purchase and in the operation of farms. These things of which I speak are a reality and are known by the people; they are not platform promises made by a party seeking Negro votes.

If time would permit, I could point out thousands of instances in which the condition of the Negro has been made better by this administration, but, Mr. Chairman, have I not already pointed out such facts as would show beyond all question that the Negro of all groups has no quarrel with the Democratic Party and its program?

You need not become alarmed because of the paid Negro propagandists who are now carrying out part of the Republican program, spreading propaganda throughout the country in an effort to shake the confidence of the Negro voters in the program and principles of the Democratic Party.

The Negro lived with the Republican Party long enough to know it. He has learned to discriminate between election promises and actual promises. No longer, thank God, can the Republican Party boast that it has the Negro vote in its vest pocket.

I venture to say that 8 out of every 10 Negroes who vote in November will cast their votes for the New Deal party, whose banner, we hope and pray, will be carried by that greatest of all humanitarians, the greatest of all leaders of this day, that great American—loved, trusted, and honored by the American people—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

My final word to the Negroes all over the country listening in is this:

Let us continue to give to our country the best we have, ever keeping in mind the words of that great writer who said:

"Give to the world the best you have
And the best will come back to you."

Text of the Cuban President's Welcoming Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

TEXT OF THE WELCOMING SPEECH BY PRESIDENT FEDERICO LAREDO BRU OF CUBA, AT THE OPENING OF THE PAN AMERICAN CONSULTATIVE CONFERENCE, HABANA, CUBA, JULY 21, 1940

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the text of the welcoming speech of President Federico Laredo Bru of Cuba, opening the Pan American Consultative Conference at Habana, Cuba, July 21, 1940:

Excellencies, for the second time the unusual responsibility that places in your worthy hands the destiny of 21 nations entreats you urgently to put solemnly into words the anxious but firm will of free America.

The first [pan-American consultative] meeting, held in Panama following the agreements of Buenos Aires and Lima, was an important landmark in inter-American relations. The records of that conference bear witness that the momentous agreements, strengthened by continental friendship, binding us to each other and maintaining our countries in their traditional adherence to laws and rules, have given life and success to their democratic institutions, and, even now in the midst of disconcerting events, make our relations with other countries peaceful, decent, and respectable.

This time you have elected to meet in Habana, capital of one of the last republics to constitute itself in this hemisphere, but one which never was remiss in asserting characteristically American ideals, based on liberty, peace, and international justice. These very same ideals inspired the heroic decisions and immortal exploits of our illustrious men—companions of Washington, Bolivar, Hidalgo, San Martin, Sucre, Artigas, Petio, and Duarte among others—who fought indefatigably to the end for the independence of the Cuban people.

Certainly, this great assembly does not evoke the historical memories lent to your first meeting in Panama by the fact that that occurred in the legendary city where was held the very first conference of American countries, called by Simon Bolivar to resist the designs of foreign regimes anxious to reestablish their lordship over these lands, where, eventually, right would triumph.

This historic coincidence was happily pointed out by the late illustrious President Arosemena, whose recent death was so deeply mourned by the whole continent.

But if in Habana you do not find an opportunity for such prestigious recollection, you will find at least a people the apostles of whose political faith exerted themselves to stress the necessity of promoting international common feeling; a people whose independence was kneaded not only by the blood of its sons but also by the blood and the encouragements of other continental peoples.

Marti was one of the forerunners of this movement, and this sentence of his was fittingly selected by his countrymen to be engraved on the bronze fence encircling the tree of American fraternity: "This is the hour of recounting and united march, and we must go forward closely pressed together, silver ore in the roots of the Andes."

America is constituted by States of similar political organization hatched in the warmth of the same afflictions. Its analogous enthusiasms had created, by living together in a sympathetic neighborhood, an atmosphere of fraternal regionalisms which would have permitted our hemisphere to keep itself within its geographical unity and its peaceful traditions, away from conflicts not directly affecting it. We lived decorously in peace and aimed at keeping that peace. Our aspirations could not have been nobler nor our behavior more specifically transparent.

We envied nobody anything; our sole preoccupation was thriving on our democratic institutions, which we considered good enough to consolidate our well-being in safety. We endeavored to succeed in our own behalf and also to become serviceable to others. We proclaimed the worthiness of lawful acquisitions over brittle conquests by force and violence.

Unfortunately this regime of quiescence and confidence does not seem assured of further continuance. Nobody with an honorable conscience can deny that the Western Hemisphere is entering a new life of alarms and threats. From October of last year—the date of your former meeting—to the present time, humanity has gone through on its march, gradually becoming dizzy and senseless,

It seems as if divine predestination forces us Americans, the heirs of western culture, to be definitely the sole custodians of an international morale which becomes dim and deteriorates with the ruin of great peoples and the dramatic, contemptuous silence of the highest virtues, of which yesterday mankind was proud.

This sacred mission that the American continent assumes through setting itself up as trustee for the remainder of betrayed civilization—civilization pushed to the edge of the precipice—is the aim that reunites you today in order to defend and harbor it, relieving it from the utter rejection that might harass it to its last corners in the New World.

The dangers you know well, Excellencies, increase day by day, and our America will be lucky if, due to its miraculous isolation, it can continue to avoid profound reactions to the distressing events we are living through. The fiendish fate which has befallen scientific instruments created by human wisdom for friendlier, more effective intercourse between individuals and peoples turns them into a tragic admonition of our countries, which trusted that their remoteness and manifest lack of interest in illegitimate ambitions would keep them out of the roving conflict that respects no right which is weakly claimed nor forgives the justified abstentions of those who have not made out of covetousness for another's possessions their ideals for national aggrandizement.

Upon this bleak present reality, that nevertheless cannot, withal, cloud the hopes of daybreak in the hearts of its men of good will, America has made itself ready for a protective preparedness and for a progressive defense of its common rights, which is the only policy proper to maintain it in its own peaceful life and insure it permanent enjoyment of its own felicity.

Men from the north, the south, and the center, solidly joined together and consecrated every one by the blessed equalizing religion of America, welcome! The government and people of Cuba, in stretching toward you sincerely hospitable arms, earnestly hope for the success of your difficult task.

So, while other countries may vegetate around the margins of the law of nations, trusting only in force, we Americans proceed perfectly renewed within our traditional concepts of regional independence, reciprocal consideration, and fraternal solidarity, the indestructible bases of the relations of this hemisphere.

Excellencies, I have the honor to proclaim inaugurated the second meeting of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the American Republics.

Announcement of Candidacy for Reelection

OF

HON. JOACHIM O. FERNANDEZ

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

LETTER OF HON. J. O. FERNANDEZ OF LOUISIANA

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter which I addressed recently to one of my constituents.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I have formally announced and have qualified as a candidate for reelection to Congress from the First Congressional District of New Orleans, a post I have held for the past 10 years. During that time I have given faithful service to the people of my congressional district, my city, my State, and my Nation. My record is one of tremendous accomplishment, due solely to my own ability and initiative.

I am a member of the powerful Appropriations Committee and ranking member of the subcommittee on naval appropriations, which membership was only acquired after years of seniority. Membership on this influential committee constitutes one of the most important reasons for the State of Louisiana and for the city of New Orleans why I should be reelected to Congress, particularly at this critical time.

I deem it my privilege to number you amongst my friends and call on you at this time to render me a distinct service in my campaign for reelection. I therefore shall consider it a personal favor if you will consent to become one of my active supporters and workers.

As I will need commissioners and official watchers at the polls on election day, which has been fixed for Tuesday, September 10, 1940, kindly advise me if you will serve for me in either of these capacities. You can either telephone me at Franklin 4114 or write to me at my residence, 3501 St. Claude Avenue.

I wish to assure you that after I am reelected I will continue to serve you and the people of my congressional district in the future as I have in the past.

Sincerely yours,

J. O. FERNANDEZ.

P. S.: Announcement as to the location of my campaign headquarters will shortly be made.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the red network of the N. B. C. from Chicago, Ill., on July 13, 1940:

Ladies and gentlemen, tonight in every nook and corner of these United States the American people are enjoying the blessings of a real democracy. While, on the other hand, many of our neighbors in the Old World have experienced the destruction of their various forms of government and have been reduced to a state of virtual slavery at the hands of ruthless dictators.

For more than 150 years America has existed as a nation of liberty-loving people, under a form of government that represents a masterpiece of statesmanship and one which belongs exclusively to the people of the United States. In our form of government the American people have a priceless heritage. It is not shared by the people of any other nation. This inheritance sets the American people apart from all other people in the world. It has given them advantages so great that most minds fail to comprehend them.

By virtue of this greatest of all gifts, 130,000,000 Americans have more than twice as many automobiles as are owned by the other 2,000,000,000 human beings that inhabit the earth.

By virtue of it, with 1 hour of labor, an American workman can buy twice as much bread as can an English or French workman and four times as much as can a German workman.

By virtue of it, a child born into the home of an average family will live years longer than will a child born into a similar home in any other great nation in the world.

In the short span of 150 years it has brought to the American people nine twentieths—45 percent—of all the tangible wealth in the entire world.

Surely, this is a priceless heritage.

Yet, because the American people do not fully understand its workings—because they are unable properly to appraise its value—there is the prospect, or at least the possibility, of its forfeiture.

This gift of the American people made it possible for them to take the great discovery of Bessemer and gird this continent with tens of thousands of miles of railways. It made possible every suspension bridge, every ocean liner and every great battleship.

By virtue of this priceless heritage it became possible to know electricity, to harness it and to utilize it as light and as power.

To this inheritance goes the credit for the invention of the mower, the reaper and the steel plow which, with the farm tractor, created an agriculture figured in terms of billions of bushels and tens of millions of bales. To it goes the credit for a vast manufacturing industry that produces billions of dollars worth of products that add to the convenience and comforts of men.

Countless centuries had passed and all of these accomplishments were unimagined only 150 years ago. They constitute the world we know. The credit goes to this priceless heritage of the American people.

What is it?

This priceless heritage was—and is—a right.

This greatest of all gifts, the advantage that belongs almost exclusively to the American people is:

"The right to think without restraint and to voice thoughts with words without limitation or restriction."

This priceless right, this most potent of all forces, was given to the American people by the Constitution. Prior to its adoption, governments, all governments, to a greater or lesser degree, controlled the thinking of men.

There are two kinds of government:

(1) Governments that are amenable to and that fear the people. These governments are creatures of the people.

(2) Governments which dominate the people and which the people fear. These people are creatures of their government.

For the first time in the history of the world, the American Constitution established a government subject to the will of the people. It removed fear from the hearts of men. It freed men's minds. Men began to imagine limitlessly, to strive and to achieve.

Self-reliance was born. The only true security is the absence of fear. For the first time in the history of the world—security became a reality.

Many times since the founding of this Nation our country has been severely tried, but on all occasions has successfully united against the common enemy.

At this very moment another crisis confronts us with democracy being put to its greatest test. Since the close of the World War one democracy after another has been wiped out and dictatorial forms of government substituted.

From the side lines we have witnessed in the past few months the mad rush of power-crazed dictators in subduing peaceful nations. We have seen demonstrated the havoc wrought by a highly mechanized German military machine the like of which the world has never known. The efficiency of this motorized military monster has dazed and horrified the world. Constructed at a cost of $40,000,000,000 it consumed the energies of Europe's greatest industrial country for a period of 7 years.

Every energy, talent, and resource of the industrious and talented German people was harnessed in producing a modern, balanced, and amazingly effective striking force.

In the world today there is nothing superior to this Hitler war machine. In the short space of 21 days Hitler conquered Poland, destroyed a half million soldiers, and took 700,000 prisoners.

In spite of the British blockade Hitler invaded and mastered Norway in 8 days. In similar fashion he crushed Holland in 4 days and vanquished Belgium in 17 days. In like manner he required but 21 days to destroy or capture the British Expeditionary Force in France, together with three entire French armies.

Following the surrender of Belgium it required Hitler but 17 days to conquer Paris, capture the Maginot Line, drive the French Army more than 100 miles south of Paris, and reduce the French people to servitude.

In 2 months of active military operations Hitler has conquered a territory as great as New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin. He has conquered more than a hundred million people, possibly destroyed 2,000,000 soldiers, and taken as prisoners 3,000,000 more.

With the exception of Norway and Denmark, each of the nations subdued was of the opinion that they had set up a real defense against German aggression.

The stark reality of the desolation wrought by these enemies of democracy has aroused the American people to the realization that if we are to preserve our priceless heritage we must have an adequate national defense without further delay.

Congress, as the mouthpiece of the American people, has discarded partisan politics, and rightly so, in appropriating billions of dollars to streamline our national defense. With the executive branch of our Government rests the responsibility for building our defenses to a degree never before attained. The industries of our Nation are alive to their responsibility and with citizens in every walk of life making their daily contributions in the form of defense taxes America goes forward as one happy family determined that our priceless heritage be preserved.

If this objective is to be attained, our national unity must be above suspicion. America will not countenance the presence of those who harbor a desire for other forms of government. Such deluded individuals with their warped minds and false political philosophies are the scum of creation and unfit to associate with liberty-loving Americans. These breeders of international hatred and disrupters of the American way of life are the tools of Stalin and Hitler and form the backbone of the "fifth column" in America.

Despite the love of Americans for national unity, it is a known fact that the "fifth column" is running hog-wild throughout the country. Yes, the "fifth column" is on the march.

No city in this great land is immune to the workings of these disciples of Stalin, Mussolini, and Hitler. They preach and practice their un-American doctrines with a sneer on their faces and a song of hate in their black hearts.

With reckless abandon and unmitigated gall they have invaded Government departments in the Nation's Capital, enlisting Federal employees in their determined drive to undermine this Government.

Make no mistake about it—the "fifth column" is on the march.

Daily the corridors of many Government buildings in Washington resound to the footsteps of hundreds of Federal employees known to harbor un-American doctrines.

I hold in my hand a printed membership list of the Washington, D. C., branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy containing the names of 563 Government employees known to be members of this organization branded by the Dies committee as a Communist front organization. The salaries of this group range from $1,080 to $10,000 annually, which are paid from the pockets of the taxpayers of America. Since this list was published in the official hearings of the Dies committee on October 5, 1939, only 20 persons named therein have notified the Dies committee that they have renounced their membership. During the month of June the House of Representatives was informed that this group of employees was still on the Federal pay roll. One week later specific attention was directed to a fellow traveler in the Department of Labor, who, while occupying a $7,000-a-year position, finds time to carry on at the expense of the American taxpayer the program of another Communist front organization.

A week later I had called to my attention that the acting chairman of the Federal Advisory Council for Employment Security, when asked to consider a motion granting preference to American citizens, publicly confessed the fact that he was an alien.

The climax in this parade of "fifth columnists" was reached several days ago when there arrived in Washington a man who, from his own lips, asserted that he was a delegate to the twentieth anniversary of the Russian Revolution in Moscow. This individual is daily awaiting an appointment to a key position in our national-defense program concerning the training of the youth of America.

Congress has enacted the necessary laws to suppress the "fifth column" if only those high in authority would recognize this menace and move promptly to exterminate it.

America cannot afford to allow this parade of "fifth columnists" to go on unmolested. With the entire country working at a feverish pace to attain the objectives of our national-defense program, it is not difficult to realize how the "fifth columnists" or, as they are more appropriately termed, "filth columnists," can disrupt our well-organized plans.

Every loyal American will find no difficulty in recognizing the real threat of the "fifth column" to our national unity and likewise to our priceless heritage—a free democracy.

It is unthinkable that the taxpayers of America should be called upon to pay the salaries of Federal employees who have "fifth column" tendencies. Nor should the mothers and fathers of America be asked to entrust the training of their sons to Moscow-minded individuals. We have only to recall the sad fate of France and other countries of Europe betrayed by the "fifth columnists" who were permitted to thrive unmolested at the expense of the people.

Let the message of the American people to these alien agitators be phrased in plain language—if you don't like the American form of government, get out and stay out.

We have heard a lot recently of purging political officeholders for differences in opinion. If we are to attain the required solidarity of this Nation, let us witness those in high authority conducting a worth-while purge in ousting from Government circles known enemies to the American way of life.

America has a gigantic task in building a national defense to preserve our priceless heritage of liberty and freedom. But we can never accomplish our task while there lurks in the shadows of the Nation's Capitol a group of alien-minded ingrates who, like vultures, are bent on destroying this Nation.

America is at the crossroads. If we are to proceed in the right direction, let us with a firm hand and a stout heart inform the "fifth columnists" that their heyday is over and that they will be no longer coddled, nursed, or tolerated.

In short, there is no choice. You are either an American or not an American.

Let our actions and our words convey to these "fifth columnists" in blunt language the command of all liberty-loving Americans—if you don't like America, get out and stay out.

Legislators' Burden

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from today's Washington Post:

[From the Washington Post of July 22, 1940]

LEGISLATORS' BURDEN

Congress resumes its work today with a heavy legislative burden hanging over it. In the hectic weeks preceding the national party conventions Congress passed numerous defense bills with extraordinary haste. Yet it left unanswered many questions vital to our domestic welfare as well as to our national security.

In some respects the respite provided by the political conventions should be an advantage to the legislators who are shaping our national policies. It has given many of them an opportunity to consult with representative men and women from their home States. And a considerable number have probably taken advantage of this breathing spell to analyze afresh the problems that are crowding upon Congress for solution.

When an emergency in national defense suddenly loomed up on the European horizon Congress acted with commendable dispatch to strengthen our inadequate naval and military forces. Both the Senate and House demonstrated their responsiveness to changing conditions and to the public will. In addition to voting enormous sums for new defense weapons, they loosened restrictions upon the Army and Navy so that those agencies may now move full speed ahead with their program designed to secure the entire Western Hemisphere against attack.

It is no disparagement of this record to point out that only the easiest part of the task has been performed. Congressmen are now returning to Washington to face more baffling problems: How shall the defense program be financed? How shall the manpower of the Nation be organized for defense without encroachment upon rights and privileges that the people have long cherished? How far should the United States go in extending economic ties with Latin America in the interest of hemispheric solidarity?

It is not to be supposed that these and similar difficult issues will be fully explored and disposed of at the present session. But they ought to be faced realistically by this Congress as well as its successors. Congress has been bold in authorizing expenditures. It will have to be courageous, too, in voting new taxes and expanding available reserves of trained men. And, if grave mistakes are to be avoided, that courage will have to be tempered by a large measure of good judgment.

A few weeks ago Congress was warmly applauded for enactment of a billion-dollar tax bill in an election year. But that sum now seems insignificant beside the enormous expenditures approved and contemplated. Representative DANIEL A. REED says that Congress has already voted at this session to spend more than $15,500,000,000 in appropriations and contract authorizations. Requests still before Congress, he notes, bring this total to more than $20,000,000,000.

Senator WALSH estimates that the two-ocean navy bill signed by the President on Saturday will cost taxpayers $10,000,000,000 over a number of years. To raise the enormous sums required for adequate national defense will require sacrifices of every man and woman in the United States. Is Congress willing to face that fact and enact tax and economy bills accordingly? This issue is likely to provide one of the severest tests to which American democracy has ever been subjected.

So it is well that Congress has had a breathing spell. It faces a dilemma of enormous proportions. The people demand national security without the accompaniment of either bankruptcy or totalitarianism. If Congress at its present and future sessions fails to solve this basic problem, nothing else it may do will be of much consequence.

Swiss System of Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

LETTER FROM THE LEGATION OF SWITZERLAND

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, under permission granted to me to extend my remarks, I am inserting the letter received from the Legation of Switzerland, under date of July 15, which is in reply to my inquiry for details on the compulsory military training program of Switzerland.

In the closing paragraph of his letter, the Minister of Switzerland refers to two books which will undoubtedly be of interest to Members of the House.

The fact that during the World War Switzerland was able to keep out of hostilities and, during the recent war, her territory is respected, indicates that there must be some real merit to her preparedness program.

LEGATION OF SWITZERLAND,
Washington, D. C., July 15, 1940.

The Honorable WILLIAM J. MILLER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter of June 20 in which you express the wish to be furnished with information concerning the Swiss system of compulsory military training. I regret very much that due to an accumulation of urgent affairs I have not been able to reply to your letter at an earlier date.

I have made several attempts to obtain a recent and comprehensive study of the Swiss military system with a view to putting it at your disposal, but failed to get such a publication in English. I hope, however, that the following information will serve your purpose.

Switzerland was the first nation in modern times to introduce compulsory military service. The Federal Constitution adopted in 1848 and revised in 1874, provides in its article 18: "Every Swiss is bound to do military service." The federal law concerning the organization of the Swiss Army of April 12, 1907, called the Military Constitution of the Swiss Confederation, amended in 1927 and subsequent dates, provides that the army shall consist of 3 classes, namely, the elite or first line: Men from 20 to 32 years old; the "landwehr" or second line: Men from 33 to 40 years, and the "landsturm" or territorial troops: men from the age of 41 to 48.

Every male Swiss, when reaching the age of 19, must submit to a mental and physical examination. The mental test includes reading, arithmetic, geography, history of the Government, and composition. For physical examination he performs various gymnastic exercises. Some Cantons (States) compel the youths from 17 to 19 years of age to go to night school for 64 hours during winter to prepare for the examination.

When accepted in his twentieth year, the infantry recruit enters the recruiting school of his territorial division, or, if he is to become an artilleryman, or a cavalryman, or a pilot, etc., he joins his respective school, of which there are several for each branch.

The length of time devoted to the first year's training of the recruit (recruiting school) is for all branches of the army (infantry, artillery, sanitary troops, supply trains, etc.)—day of entrance and day of discharge included—116 days, for the cavalry 130 days. The pilot has to undergo an additional training of 6 months.

At the time the recruit reports for his service he is given a complete equipment and regulation rifle, all of which he takes home after finishing the course. For yearly inspection and active duty he must turn out with his full equipment, which finally becomes his private property upon his discharge from active duty at the age of 48.

The recruiting school course is hard work, as each day means 8 strenuous hours, with night work, such as patrolling, entrenching, and maneuvers probably twice a week.

The completion of the course promotes the recruit to a full-fledged soldier, assigned to a battalion in his home district, which is a unit of the division of which his Canton is a territorial part. As a member of his unit, he serves each year a so-called repetition course of 19 days, until he is 26. He belongs to the first line for 6 years longer, until he is 32, but in these 6 years he is bound to serve only every second year for a period of 3 weeks. A private of the first-line troops must therefore undergo within a period of 12 years after completion of the recruiting school a military training of eight repetition courses of 19 days each.

The repetition courses of the first-line troops are so arranged that an adequate change in smaller tactical units with training in army units will take place.

From 32 to 40 years, the Swiss soldier belongs to the seccond line or "landwehr." In this capacity he serves two repetition courses of 19 days each. For the next 8 years, until he is 48, he serves in the "landsturm" or territorial troops and is called to the colors only under special orders. In addition, every "landwehr" soldier presents himself for annual inspection, at which time he must account for the care of his uniform and arms.

A recent decree of the Swiss Government extended the army age limit to 60 years, thus keeping every able-bodied man up to 60 years of age subject to military service in case of general mobilization.

The figures of the time of instruction for a Swiss infantry private are therefore:

	Days
Recruiting school at his twentieth year	116
First line or "auszug," up to his thirty-second year, 8 repetition courses at 19 days each	152
Second line, "landwehr," up to his fortieth year, 2 repetition courses of 19 days each	38
Plus annual inspection	6
Territorial troops or "landsturm" up to his forty-eighth year, annual inspection and subject to service under special orders	8
Territorial troops from the age of 48–60, subject to special services only in case of general mobilization.
Total	320

Specialists, like for instance gunsmiths, farriers, etc., receive their necessary professional training in special courses. Those belonging to the ambulance corps take besides the recruiting school a hospital training course.

Part of the military training of the Swiss soldier is the obligatory and voluntary rifle practice which he attends in civil life under the auspices of a rifle club. Every community is compelled by the Federal Government to build and maintain a rifle range in the open field. Enlisted men and noncommissioned officers of the first line and the "landwehr" armed with rifles or carbines, as well as subaltern officers of the troops, must pass a yearly rifle practice test. Such tests, as well as the rifle practices, are conducted by the rifle clubs according to the military regulations. Those who neglect this test must take a special course without pay. The federal government refunds the cost of the ammunition used to all those who pass the test and subsidizes the rifle clubs. The federal government encourages and aids financially any movement toward preparatory military training.

Those Swiss who are found physically unfit to serve in the regular army are assigned to certain of the auxiliary branches, as for instance the ambulance corps, commissary department, information department, transportation department, and, more recently, are trained in the air defense of the civil population and as antiparachutists, etc. Members assigned to the auxiliary service attend instruction services of much shorter periods than do the regular soldiers.

Citizens who for physical reasons are not serving personally in the army, as well as those incorporated in the auxiliary service, must pay an annual tax of exemption. Swiss citizens living in foreign countries are also obliged to pay this tax, and with few exceptions they do so.

The foregoing concerns privates in the Swiss Army. The officers and noncommissioned officers naturally are subject to additional instructions and training. Every Swiss who has the ambition and possesses intelligence and ability, can become an officer in the army. After completing the 116, or as the case may be, 130 days in the regular recruiting school, if his conduct warrants the recommendation from his superiors, he will be called to attend a school for noncommissioned officers lasting 3 weeks, for those in the artillery, in the air corps, engineering and fortress troops, 4 weeks, after which he receives the rank of a corporal. As such he attends another recruiting school a year later and the corporal with a good record and the ambition to become an officer enters the school for officers. The duration of this school varies between 60 and 120 days, according to the branch of service (for instance infantry 88, artillery and air corps 102 days). For practical and training purposes a school for noncommissioned officers is connected with the school for officers.

The newly appointed lieutenant must pass a recruiting school as instructor to qualify and thereafter he serves the regular annual repetition course of 19 days with his unit. If qualified, he will be promoted to the rank of first lieutenant after the completion of three or four repetition courses. To advance to the rank of captain he must take a 30-day course in the Central Military School No. 1, and attend several other special courses. Officers above the rank of captain devote a considerable part of their time to special courses in tactics, information, etc.

Furthermore, it should be mentioned that the Swiss military constitution provides for a small corps of instructors. They are professional or career officers and conduct the instruction of recruits and the training of noncommissioned and commissioned officers in the respective courses. A fixed number of instructors are assigned to each of the different branches of the Army. The commanders of division and Army corps are chosen from among the professional officers.

The military training program is not coordinated with the educational institutions. There are projects to make preparatory training for boys of the age of 17–19 compulsory. This program would be conducted by educational institutions as well as by gymnastic societies.

The Swiss military system, which has been functioning most satisfactorily and efficiently for many decades, is described in the booklet, Right and Duty, or Citizen and Soldier, Switzerland Prepared and at Peace, by Frederick A. Kuenzli, assistant appraiser of the port of New York, formerly an officer of the Swiss Army, published by the National Defense Institute in New York, selling agents, G. E. Stechert & Co., New York, 1916.

The booklet contains in its annex an English translation of the military constitution of the Swiss Confederation of April 12, 1907. This act is the basic law for the organization of the Swiss Army and is, with few amendments, specially pertaining to the extension of the training periods still in force.

I trust that you will be able to obtain this excellent publication from the Library of Congress; otherwise I shall be glad to lend it to you for your perusal.

The book Civic Training in Switzerland—A Study of Democratic Life, by Robert C. Brooks (1930), also contains some information on the Swiss militia system and its functioning.

Very truly yours,

C. BRUGGMANN,
Minister of Switzerland.

National Party Shifts Not News

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which was published recently in the Knoxville (Tenn.) Journal:

NATIONAL PARTY SHIFTS NOT NEWS—GRANT WAS DEMOCRAT—LINCOLN NOT REPUBLICAN—WILLKIE, WALLACE CONVERSIONS HAVE MANY PRECEDENTS—CLEVELAND FOUGHT BRYAN DESPITE NOMINATION

(By E. E. Patton)

The recent Republican Convention nominated Wendell Willkie as their candidate for President. Until 1938 he had been a Democrat. The Democratic Convention renominated President Roosevelt and named Henry Wallace as the candidate for Vice President. He was a Republican until he went into the President's Cabinet 8 years ago; his father was Secretary of Agriculture under Mr. Harding.

There is plenty of historical precedent for all of this as I shall show in the following paragraphs.

In 1840, the Whigs passed over their long-time candidate and hero, Henry Clay, and nominated William Henry Harrison because he had a war record. On the ticket with him was John Tyler, a State-rights Democrat from Virginia. Harrison died after only 1 month in office; Tyler succeeded to the Presidency.

He showed that he had no disposition to go along with the Whigs, so all the members of his Cabinet resigned with the exception of Daniel Webster, who remained for patriotic reasons; he was negotiating a treaty with Britain over our boundary line between Canada and Maine. He stayed until he consummated this treaty and he took to the woods. Tyler was afterward a member of the Confederate Congress from Virginia, but died before he was sworn in.

HARRISON UNIQUE

It might be mentioned in this connection that Harrison had been the unsuccessful candidate against Van Buren in 1836, the only instance in American history where a man was defeated for the Presidency and came back. Of course, I know that Cleveland's defeat by Harrison will be marched out, but it should be remembered that Cleveland had already had one term when Harrison defeated him.

When Mr. Lincoln was renominated in Baltimore in 1864, Andrew Johnson was named as the Vice Presidential candidate with him. Johnson was then, had always been, an uncompromising Democrat and remained one as long as he lived. However, it should not be forgotten that this convention was not listed as a Republican convention, but as the National Union Convention.

U. S. Grant is the only man elected as a Republican to the Presidency that ever served two full terms, yet the fact remains that the only vote Grant had ever cast, nationally, before he became a candidate himself was for James Buchanan, a Democrat, in 1856.

His father, Jesse Grant, visited his illustrious son while he occupied the White House and is said to have criticized him openly to visitors. The old gentleman was a Democrat then. We will admit that this was not quite fair for the old gentleman to eat his son's food and sleep in his beds and criticize him openly, but he could not get away from his democracy.

LOGAN CHANGED

Then there are other precedents for these two strange proceedings in the recent conventions. When the Republicans named James G. Blaine, the "plumed knight," as Bob Ingersoll dubbed him, they chose as his running mate none other than John A. Logan, a man who had been elected as a Democrat from southern Illinois to the House of Representatives in 1858. There was a great deal of secession sentiment in southern Illinois by reason of the fact that that section of the State had been settled by people from many of the Southern States. Mr. Lincoln asked Representative Logan to go back to southern Illinois and make some speeches for the Union.

He served through the war and became a major general, was elected in 1868 to the House of Representatives as a Republican and remained one the remainder of his life, was sent as a Republican to the United States Senate from Illinois.

There used to be an old saying in England that "no gentleman ever changes his politics or his religion," but we have seen many instances in this country to the contrary. Grover Cleveland was not for Mr. Bryan, the Democratic nominee for President in 1896, and we have President Roosevelt's word for it that he voted for Theodore Roosevelt in 1904.

This is not being written from the standpoint of political bias or partisan prejudice but merely to keep the record straight. Al Smith always wanted to "look at the record"; here it is.

The President Drafts Himself

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt has decided he is the only logical Presidential candidate of the Democratic Party. All other candidacies have been submerged and he virtually forces himself upon the American people for a third term. But the people will speak with their votes in November and they will retire him from office. The following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal discusses the self-deception practiced by Roosevelt:

WHO DRAFTED THE PRESIDENT?

The President's speech to the Democratic Convention was both masterly and Rooseveltian. It was masterly in the sense of marshaling a line of reasoning that carries people along. There is no denying Mr. Roosevelt's powers of presentation. It was Rooseveltian in this—that its success depended on the listener's willingness not to analyze or ask questions. A few well-put questions in any man's mind and the reasoning fails.

The President says, in effect, that world events drafted him. He was seeking to escape the burdensome office for retirement to the Hudson—was all set to do this when the war in Europe broke. Then, day by day, month by month, he had to put off his announcement. So great was the crisis that he could find no opportunity to make a statement up to the very time that the convention was permanently organized. Then he spoke through his mouthpiece, Senator BARKLEY.

At this point you have to make the assumption that Mr. Roosevelt believes no other man than himself could carry the work of the Presidency through these times. Of the one hundred and thirty-odd millions, he is the only one fitted for the job.

Out of that assumption you come to a conclusion—and it is inescapable—that the President was drafted but that he drafted himself. He alone made the decision. He alone decided that he could not make a statement, even in the face of the political manipulations by the inner circle New Dealers who were gathering in the delegates to hand him a third nomination he did not want.

We give Franklin D. Roosevelt more credit than this, more than he gives himself by this self-deception. So we seek further in his speech to find the real reasons for his third-term aspirations. They are not long hidden. One finds them in that part where the President talks of the program, the accomplishments, and the aspirations of the New Deal. He is running for the third term because he does not believe that this program would be safe as to its future in any other hands. He wants 4 more years to perfect and make the New Deal permanent American policy.

Whether this thought originated in the President's mind or was planted there by that inner circle controlled by Harry Hopkins, Harold Ickes, and Mme. Perkins is beside the point. The President believes it and he is sincere about it. It would have been a sincere, valid reason for him to put forward for his decision.

Evidently he did not think that it was quite big enough. It would have been a political reason instead of a reason founded on a world crisis—there must always be a crisis. Besides, there was that awkward third-term tradition.

So you come down to this, as you so often do in the President's speeches: Mr. Roosevelt gives you a reason and with a marvelous marshaling of statement carries you along as he builds a bridge of rhetorical support. But when you probe into it all, you discover that the reason he gave could not have been the real reason in his mind.

It isn't legerdemain and it isn't a conscious effort at deception. But it is something to question—unless you want to be fooled.

No Dictatorship for America

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, from time to time the remark is made that this country needs a dictatorship. Only yesterday I talked with a man who expressed that thought. I disagree entirely with those who are willing to abandon our form of government and our institutions for something new and, so far as we are concerned, filled with the dangers of enslavement of the American people. The following editorial from the International Falls Daily Journal of Minnesota expresses very aptly what would happen if we did away with our form of government and pursued the experiment which has been tried in foreign countries. Says the editorial:

IF PRIVATE ENTERPRISE QUIT

Speculate for 5 long minutes on what would happen in this country if personal enterprise and ambition gave way to a general willingness to climb up on the lap of some high official, a fuehrer, a duce, or a commissar. Suppose he—but you would think of him with a capital "H"—suppose He said to you:

"All your childish ideas of right and wrong are out. The old fairy tales about honor, chivalry, integrity, and kindness are dead. There is no such thing as personal progress. There is no such thing as private property. All your effort must be subordinated to the good of the state. And the state is Me. Do as I tell you. Exercise at dawn, chop wood in the forenoon, drill in the afternoon, and read My books and speeches at night. Then you will be saved."

That is what extreme conceit, backed by the supreme authority of a dictator, would tell you, says Nation's Business. It would be sugar-coated. You would be given the most becoming of work pants to wear while you chopped; the most gorgeous of helmets and puttees for your drill. You would sing. If you couldn't sing cheerfully your vocal chords would be lubricated with castor oil. And your day would be filled much too full for the practice of any business, unless you had manual dexterity enough to run a complicated machine, or mental training enough to do the work of a government scientist.

Would you be paid for this work? Oh, yes. You would be paid what the dictator saw fit. Would you be allowed to invest your wages? Yes; as the dictator saw fit. Would you be called on for foreign service? Yes; if the dictator saw the propriety of placing Mexico, Guatemala, Costa Rica, or some other country under the dictator's flag.

None can deny the facts set forth in this editorial or the dangers that would result to the American people if we did away with our system, which has grown up under a Constitution that was adopted in 1789, just 151 years ago. That document guarantees the right of personal enterprise and ambition. It guarantees to our people every fundamental political concept that has made it possible for America to become a great and powerful nation.

One hundred and fifty years ago the first meeting of the Supreme Court of the United States was held. The founders of the Republic intended for this Court to protect the people against aggressions from either or both of the other branches of our Government. It has carried out its work as was intended.

For those who indulge in idle talk and gossip, let me commend to them a study of the Constitution. Then let them give attention to this history of the Supreme Court; let them make comparisons with the despotic governments of the Old World; and, in my opinion, there will come about a greater appreciation of this country of ours.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, we have supported the national-defense program and this means, of course, that our votes were in favor of Army and Navy and aircraft expansion in the interests of national defense. Likewise, we voted for the tax bill which is to produce revenue to pay for the national defense weapons. Congress should tender its services to the National Defense Council, and instead of taking a 3-day recess, we should go into this question of how the national defense funds are to be expended. Newspaper releases indicate that the Midwest is being ignored in connection with the manufacture of war materials. It may or may not be significant that the new $25,000,000 powder plant is to be built by the Du Ponts in the State of Indiana. Think it over. I hope there are no politics in this procedure.

We noted with considerable interest the announcement from The Assistant Secretary of War some 3 or 4 days ago, to the effect that contracts were concluded between July 1 and July 13 for $150,000,000 worth of new war planes; also that $200,000,000 in contracts was awarded for small arms, artillery, ammunition, tanks, and educational orders. The Assistant Secretary further explained that contracts for $38,000,000 worth of motor transports had been let. All announcements up to date would indicate that various factories and plants, and particularly in sections of the country far removed from the Midwest, intend to expand and increase their productive capacities.

If such a development is to take place, it means, to quote a man in the Midwest who would like to have a chance to make some of these war materials, that sections of the Midwest, including northern Minnesota, will be raked by scouts seeking skilled labor. It also means that shop machines, tools, and equipment, which are suitable for the manufacture of war materials, will be transferred to eastern locations.

Such a program will result in the Midwest going backward industrially, and its factories will be closed and its skilled mechanics located in the East and the South.

The Government should not so injure and cripple our inland empire. The manufacturers in the Midwest and in Duluth and northern Minnesota seek an opportunity to bid on these various contracts for the production of war materials. The only fair policy that the Government can pursue is a policy that will make it possible for our section of the country to receive its share of these orders for war materials.

I believe that all existing factories and plants should be utilized before there is an expansion of existing plants in the East and in other sections of the United States. There is plenty of unemployment in northern Minnesota, and much of it can be relieved if proper consideration to our section is given in the placing of Government contracts.

Constitution of Inter-American Bar Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22, 1940

CONSTITUTION AND BYLAWS ADOPTED AT EIGHTH AMERICAN SCIENTIFIC CONGRESS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for insertion in the RECORD the constitution of the Inter-American Bar Association with certain accompanying papers.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSTITUTION

ARTICLE I. NAME AND PURPOSE

There is hereby established the Inter-American Bar Association. Its purposes are:

To establish and maintain relations between associations and organizations of lawyers, national and local, in the various countries of the Americas, to provide a forum for exchanges of views.

To advance the science of jurisprudence in all its phases and particularly the study of comparative law; to promote uniformity of commercial legislation; to further the diffusion of knowledge of the laws of the various countries throughout the Americas.

To uphold the honor of the profession of the law; and to encourage cordial intercourse among the lawyers of the Western Hemisphere.

To meet in conference from time to time for discussion and for the purposes of the association.

ARTICLE II. MEMBERSHIP

The association is composed of national associations and constituent geographical (State, Provincial, Territorial, city, and local) organizations and groups of lawyers throughout the Americas that have been admitted to membership pursuant to article XI.

(a) "National association" signifies a Nation-wide professional organization of lawyers in any independent nation or self-governing dominion, or, where no such national association exists, a combination for the purpose of representation of constituent geographical organizations or groups.

(b) "Constituent geographical association" signifies a professional organization of lawyers in a constituent State or Province or Territory or city or other subdivision of an independent nation or self-governing dominion or colony.

(c) Professional associations of lawyers devoted to particular branches of the law, whether nation-wide or local, may be admitted to membership, but shall be entitled to representation and vote in the conference and to representation in the council only on the basis of constituent geographical associations.

(d) If at any time in any nation or self-governing dominion there is no national association, the bar organization of the capital city may be deemed to be a national association, or, if more than one, that which may be selected in such manner as the bylaws may provide.

ARTICLE III. DIRECTING BODIES AND OFFICERS

Subordinate to the association assembled in conference, the directing bodies and the officers are the council, the executive committee, the president, the vice presidents, the secretary general and any assistant secretaries general, the treasurer, and such other officers as may be prescribed by the bylaws.

ARTICLE IV. THE COUNCIL

The council consists of one councilor chosen on behalf of each independent nation or self-governing dominion from a participating national association, or, where there is no participating national association, in such a manner as may be locally determined from nominations of the largest nation-wide association or from other associations recognized by the council or by the conference assembled, together with such number of other councilors, elected at large by the conference, as may be provided by the bylaws. All councilors shall hold office until the close of the next conference following that at which they are severally recognized or elected, and until their respective successors are recognized or elected and qualified.

ARTICLE V. OFFICERS

SECTION 1. There shall be a President, the number of Vice Presidents as hereinafter provided for, a Secretary General, and a Treasurer. There may be such Assistant Secretaries General and such other officers and employees as the bylaws may prescribe.

SEC. 2. The President shall be the chief officer, and shall have all the usual powers of the chief executive officer of similar associations. The President shall be ineligible to succeed himself.

SEC. 3. There shall be one Vice President elected by the conference from each independent nation or self-governing dominion.

SEC. 4. The Secretary General shall have an office at the executive headquarters of the association. He shall have custody of the records, and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the bylaws. Assistant Secretaries General may have such offices in such countries and perform such duties under the general direction of the Secretary General as may be prescribed by the bylaws. Other officers and employees may have such offices in such countries and perform such duties as the bylaws may prescribe.

SEC. 5. The Treasurer, subject to the direction of the council, shall have the management of the moneys and properties of the association, shall receive and disburse the subscriptions of members and other funds, shall attend to the keeping of the accounts, and shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by the bylaws.

ARTICLE VI. THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

The executive committee shall be the managing directorate. It shall be composed of (a) the president, the secretary general, and the treasurer, together with (b) four additional councilors, to be chosen by the council at its first meeting following each meeting of the conference, as the bylaws may prescribe. The committee shall hold such meetings and at such places as may be designated by the president or by a majority of the members of the committee, if he fails to act, and shall have such powers and duties (in addition to those fixed by this constitution) as shall be prescribed by the bylaws. The committee shall keep a record of its proceedings.

ARTICLE VII. ELECTION OF OFFICERS

SECTION 1. The president, the secretary general, assistant secretaries general, the treasurer and such other officers as may be designated by the bylaws from time to time, shall be elected by the council at its first meeting following the close of each conference. They shall hold office until the close of the first meeting of the council following the next conference. Vacancies in any such offices, and any vacancy in the executive committee (other than ex officio), occurring at any other time, either by the creation of new offices or otherwise, shall be filled by the executive committee at its next meeting, to hold office until the next regular election of officers and until their respective successors shall be elected and qualified. Interim vacancies in the council itself shall be filled by the executive committee, to hold office until the next conference. A majority of the council (or of the councilors remaining in office) shall constitute a quorum for elections and for all other purposes.

ARTICLE VIII. SECTIONS AND COMMITTEES

Sections and committees to further the purposes of the association may be established, with such powers, functions, and duties, as the council may determine subject to the approval of the conference, or as may be provided by the bylaws.

ARTICLE IX. CONFERENCES

SECTION 1. The association shall meet in conference at a date and place to be fixed by the preceding conference; except that the initial conference shall meet at the city of Panama, at such time as may be fixed by the original signers of this constitution who, together with such other persons as they may invite to join them as representatives of national and other associations, of the categories mentioned in article II, shall constitute the first council, shall effectuate the initial organization, and shall hold office until the close of the first conference.

SEC. 2. Transitional provisions: Any delegate in attendance at the Eighth American Scientific Congress, may sign this constitution provisionally, such signature to be binding only if and when ratified by competent authority of any national or constituent geographical association. By adding after or underneath any such signature the word "provisional" or "conditional," it will be understood that such signing will not be operative to bind the association until written notice, signed by the chief officer of the association that such association has ratified the act of the delegate in signing the constitution has been received by the secretary general of the Inter-American Bar Association. When written notice shall have been received by the secretary general that any association disaffirms the act of the delegate, then the signature shall thereafter be for naught held, and there shall be no obligation whatever resting upon such association by reason of the provisional signature.

When five such associations shall have signified their ratification or adherence, then the conference of the Inter-American Bar Association shall come into existence, and the provisional Secretary General shall be authorized to call the initial conference in the city of Panama.

SEC. 3. If a conference at any time fails to fix the date or the place of the next conference, then it shall be the duty of the council to do so. In any such case, notices stating both date and place shall be sent to member associations as may be provided in the bylaws, which may provide for the council to ballot by mail upon any proposition.

SEC. 4. The conference shall consist, in addition to the members of the council and the officers, of as many delegates from each member association as it may desire, such delegates to be designated by the respective member associations. But the council or the executive committee may from time to time, by notice at least 5 months in advance, limit the maximum number of delegates from member associations (except national associations), including the local association at whose home the conference meets.

SEC. 5. Voting: Each member association shall have but one vote when the association is assembled in conference, irrespective of the number of its delegates; except as expressly otherwise provided elsewhere in this constitution; and all motions, resolutions, and elections shall be decided by a majority of the votes cast, a quorum of the conference being present.

SEC. 6. Quorum: A quorum of the conference shall consist of the delegates representing at least a majority of the national associations who are members; together with such delegates as may be present representing constituent geographical associations as defined in article II.

SEC. 7. The agenda for each conference will be prepared by the council or, if the council so directs, by the executive committee. The secretary general shall duly notify all member associations or groups of the proposed agenda to be discussed at any meeting of the conference.

ARTICLE X. OBSERVERS

The council or the executive committee may invite associations of lawyers not members of the association to be represented at any particular conference by observers who shall have no vote.

ARTICLE XI. ADMISSIONS, RESIGNATIONS, AND EXPULSION

SECTION 1. Admission of members: Applications for membership will be made and acted upon in the manner prescribed by the bylaws.

SEC. 2. Any member may resign from the association by mailing to the secretary general a written notice of intention to resign, stating the date when the resignation will take effect. Such notice must be mailed at least 1 month before the effective date of the resignation so stated. On and after the effective date of the resignation the member so resigning shall stand relieved of all obligations to the association except for the amount of dues of such member due and unpaid prior to the effective date of the resignation.

SEC. 3. Expulsion: Expulsion may be voted by the conference on the proposal of the council. The conference need not state its reasons; but before action on the council's recommendation, the member association involved shall be notified and given an opportunity to furnish explanations to the executive committee and to be heard before the conference.

SEC. 4. In case of resignation or expulsion the former member association concerned shall be deemed to have renounced all rights to any share in the assets or privileges of the association.

ARTICLE XII. LANGUAGES

The official languages of the association shall be English, Spanish, Portuguese, and French. All documents printed shall be distributed to member associations in any or all of these languages on request.

ARTICLE XIII. DUES; CONTRIBUTIONS

SECTION 1. The general expenses of the association shall be met by dues from the member associations. The membership dues shall be fixed by the council and shall be due and payable annually in advance on or before January 1 of each year. In fixing such dues the council need not fix uniform dues for all members, but shall be authorized to graduate the dues of the various members upon such basis as to the council may appear to be equitable. The dues thus fixed may be changed from time to time, but no such change shall become effective until at least 6 months after written notice thereof has been mailed to each member.

SEC. 2. Contributions may be received by the secretary general at any time, with the approval of the council.

ARTICLE XIV. BYLAWS

SECTION 1. The bylaws shall be adopted, and may be amended, by the council of the conference subject to change or modification by the conference.

SEC. 2. The bylaws shall provide for the location of the executive headquarters and may provide for the publication of the proceedings of the association and of any journal or other periodical publication that may be deemed desirable.

SEC. 3. The bylaws may provide for the delegation by the council of any of its powers to the executive committee.

ARTICLE XV. AMENDMENTS, DISSOLUTION

SECTION 1. Amendments to the constitution may be proposed at any conference, on motion either of the council, or of any three of the national associations who are members, or of one-tenth of all of the member associations, but shall be placed on the agenda only if received by the secretary general at least 6 months before the date of the opening of the conference.

SEC. 2. A proposal to dissolve the association may be entertained only upon notice to the members given at least 3 months before the date of the next ensuing conference, and after prior approval by the council; and may be carried only by the votes of at least two-thirds of the members, including at least two-thirds of the member national associations. In case of dissolution the assets shall be distributed under the direction of the executive committee holding office at the time it is ordered; which shall likewise make provision for the custody and preservation of the records and proceedings.

SEC. 3. Failure of the conference to convene at the scheduled time shall not dissolve the association, nor affect its life or status in any way; but the next conference shall be called as promptly as practicable.

SEC. 4. No member of the association shall by reason of membership in the association, be liable for any debt or obligation of the association. Nor shall the fact that any member shall have contributed moneys or services to or on behalf of the association at any time, or shall have paid at any time any expenses of the Association incident to promoting or maintaining the association or furthering its purposes or any of them, obligate any such member, in the absence of an express promise or agreement in writing to that effect, for any debt, service, or obligation of the association.

INTER-AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION BYLAWS

ARTICLE I. NATIONAL ASSOCIATIONS

If at any time, in any nation or self-governing dominion there is no national association, the bar organization of the capital city may be deemed, if so determined by the council, to be a national association; or, if there be more than one, or where there is no participating national association, then the representation of that nation or self-governing dominion in the conference and in the council shall be determined and chosen in the same manner prescribed by article IV of the constitution for choosing a councilor for such nation or self-governing dominion.

ARTICLE II. OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

SECTION 1. Five assistant secretaries-general shall be elected by the council, on the nomination of the secretary general, to serve for the same term as the secretary general himself; and such other officers and employees may be elected or appointed from time to time as may be determined by the council or by the executive committee to serve for such term and at such compensation as the council or the executive committee may from time to time prescribe.

SEC. 2. One of the assistant secretaries general shall have his office at the executive headquarters of the association. The other assistant secretaries general shall have their offices at such places as may be determined by the council or the executive committee from time to time. The secretary general, in addition to the duties prescribed by the constitution, shall perform the usual duties of that officer in similar organizations, together with such other duties as the council or the executive committee may prescribe from time to time. The assistant secretaries general shall each, under the general direction of the secretary general, perform such duties as the secretary general, the council, or the executive committee may from time to time prescribe.

SEC. 3. The treasurer, in addition to the duties prescribed by the constitution, shall perform such duties and have such powers as may be prescribed from time to time by the council or by the executive committee. He may, by the direction either of the council or of the executive committee, be required to give surety bond in such amount as may be prescribed, the expense of which shall be paid from the funds of the association.

SEC. 4. Inferior officers and employees appointed by the council or by the executive committee or by any one of the officers in accordance with authority from the council or the executive committee shall have such powers and duties as may be prescribed from time to time by the appointing authority. The council or the executive committee may from time to time, on the recommendation of the treasurer, determine the depository of the association's funds and securities.

ARTICLE III. COUNCIL

Councilors elected at large: There shall be 15 councilors elected at large in accordance with article IV of the constitution.

ARTICLE IV. EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

The executive committee shall be chosen by the council at a meeting of the council to be convened immediately after its election at each conference, and at the same city where the conference is held, but may be adjourned to any other place or time. The executive committee shall, as prescribed in the constitution, be the managing directorate of the association, and shall have such other powers and duties as may be prescribed by the council from time to time. The council may delegate any or all of its powers to the executive committee; and may provide that, between sessions of the council, the executive committee may exercise all of the powers of the council, except those in relation to admission and expulsion of members under article XI of the constitution and those relating to amendments to the constitution or dissolution of the association under article XV of the constitution; but the executive committee shall report all its acts to the next succeeding meeting of the council.

ARTICLE V. SECTIONS AND COMMITTEES

Pursuant to article VIII of the constitution the council, or the executive committee as the delegate of the council, shall establish such sections and committees as it may determine in order to further the purposes of the association, but always subject to the approval of the conference.

ARTICLE VI. CONFERENCE

Failure of any conference to fix the time or place of the next succeeding conference: If a conference at any time fails to fix the date or the place of the next conference, or if for any reason the plans for holding the next conference need to be changed or fail to materialize, then in any such case the council may fix the date or place for the next conference, and upon fixing such date or place, or both, in accordance with article IX of the constitution, shall give notice thereof in such manner and for such length of time as the council may determine; and such determination, as well as the determination of the time or place, or both, for the next conference, may, as provided in section 3 of article IX of the constitution, be made by the councilors by ballot by mail upon any or all of such propositions.

ARTICLE VII. DUES

Membership dues shall be as follows:

(a) National associations, $ per annum.

(b) Constituent geographical associations:

(1) Having more than 3,000 members, $ per annum.

(2) Having more than 1,000 members but not more than 3,000 members, $ per annum.

(3) Having more than 500 members but not more than 1,000 members, $ per annum.

(4) Having not more than 500 members, $ per annum.

Dues are payable either in dollars or in the currency of the country of the association, at the current rate of dollar exchange.

An association in default for 6 months or more in the payment of its dues shall not be entitled to exercise its privileges of membership, nor shall its delegates be recognized at the conference. Nevertheless the council or the executive committee may, at discretion, remit or postpone the payment of the dues of any member association, under special circumstances.

ARTICLE VIII. EXECUTIVE HEADQUARTERS

The initial executive headquarters of the association shall be in the city of Washington, D. C., at the offices of the Pan American Union, until the first conference of the association to be held at Habana, and until otherwise fixed by the council.

ARTICLE IX. PUBLICATION OF PROCEEDINGS

Journal. The council or the executive committee shall from time to time provide for the publication of the proceedings of the association, and shall determine as to the publication of any journal either by the association alone or in conjunction with any other organization.

ARTICLE X. MEETINGS OF THE COUNCIL

Notices: A stated meeting of the council shall always be held immediately after the election of a new council at each conference of the association, and at the same city where the conference is being held, upon the call of the secretary general, but may be adjourned to any other place or time.

Other meetings of the council shall be held at such times and places and upon such notice as the council or the executive committee shall from time to time prescribe.

ARTICLE XI. TAKING EFFECT OF BYLAWS

Provisional officers: These bylaws shall take effect immediately upon their adoption by the managing committee of six appointed by the initial signers of the constitution of the association, in accordance with the resolutions adopted by such original signers and with the provisions of article IX of the constitution; but the officers and the managing committee of six initially elected hereunder by such signers shall be designated as "provisional officers," and "provisional executive committee" respectively, for the purpose of effectuating the initial organization of the association and providing for the holding of its first conference at Habana; and shall hold office only until the close of the first conference and until their respective successors shall be elected and qualified.

PRESS NEWS FROM THE PAN AMERICAN UNION

LAWYERS OF CONTINENT UNITE

WASHINGTON, June 16.—An inter-American bar association, long a dream of lawyers all over the continent, reflecting their desire for effective Western Hemisphere solidarity in the field of law, has at last become a reality.

The organization was created at the eighth American Scientific Congress, held in Washington last month, and an organizing committee is now making plans for the first meeting of the association to be held sometime next year, probably at Habana, Cuba, it was learned today at the Pan American Union.

The purposes of the new entity are "to establish and maintain relations between associations of lawyers, national and local, in the various countries of the Americas, to provide a forum for exchanges of views, to advance the science of jurisprudence in all its phases and particularly the study of comparative law." Also "to promote uniformity of commercial legislation, to further the diffusion of knowledge of the laws of the various countries throughout the Americas, and to encourage cordial intercourse among the lawyers of the Western Hemisphere."

Three types of legal organizations are eligible for membership in the association: 1. National bar associations; 2. Municipal and State bar associations; and 3. Societies, local or national, dedicated to a special phase of jurisprudence.

Delegates representing local and national bar associations in 13 different American republics signed the constitution of the association when it was first opened for signature last month. Adherence of bar associations in the other eight American republics and Canada is expected to follow shortly.

United States organizations which have already signed up for membership in the association are: American Bar Association, New York City Bar Association, American Foreign Law Association, Puerto Rican Bar Association, Missouri Bar Association, and Federal Bar Association.

The government of the association will consist of a council, executive committee, president, vice presidents, secretary general, assistant secretaries, and treasurer. Pending the election of permanent officials to fill these posts, the administration of the association is in the hands of an organizing committee composed of Natalio Chediak, of Cuba; J. Blanco Uztáriz, of Venezuela; Luis Anderson, of Costa Rica; Dantès Bellegarde, of Haiti; and Camilo de Brigard, of Colombia. Col. William C. Rigby, of Washington, D. C., is chairman of the committee.

Manuel Fernández Supervielle, dean of the Bar Association of Habana, Cuba, is the provisional president of the association, and Mr. William Roy Vallance, of the State Department, the provisional secretary general.

THE INTER-AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION

ADDRESS BY WILLIAM CATTRON RIGBY [1]

Mr. President, fellow members of the Federal Bar Association, and guests: I have been asked to say a word about the Inter-American Bar Association organized last month during the sessions of the Eighth American Scientific Congress. Its constitution was signed on May 16, 1940, pursuant to a resolution of the ninth section of the congress, the section on international law, public law, and jurisprudence. It was signed by representatives of the American Bar Association for the United States, as well as by representatives of 12 Latin American countries, and was also signed on behalf of a number of State and Territorial and city bar associations in the United States and in other countries in accordance with the provisions of the constitution of the association. A representative of the Canadian Bar Association was present and expressed approval, but did not have sufficient authority to sign on behalf of his association. It is understood it is to be presented to the governing body of that association at an early meeting. The signers are:

Adherence of bar associations in the other eight American republics and Canada is expected to follow shortly.

The Inter-American Bar Association is a new departure in this hemisphere among associations of lawyers. Its primary object is to develop friendly contacts among the lawyers of the different countries the whole length of the North and South American Continents, from Canada all the way down to the tip of Argentina and Chile. In this respect its purpose is directly in harmony with the good-neighbor policy of the administration of the United States. It is a remarkable fact that, as was noted, back in 1934, in the report of the American Bar Association's special committee on international bar relations at the Milwaukee meeting of the American Bar Association (59 Am. Bar Reports, 621):

"Ours is the only profession—almost the only occupation, indeed—that thus far has developed no form of affiliation between all the national organizations in its own field. It stands alone in that respect, and it should stand alone no longer."

That special committee of the Bar Association comprised a very distinguished membership, and was headed by our revered and world renowned Col. John H. Wigmore. The committee went on to say (Reports of American Bar Association, vol. 59, pp. 621–622):

"The legal profession throughout the world has the strongest ties that ought to bind—ties of sentiment, ties of public duty, ties of common experience in human nature. One is apt to think of foreign law as something alien and irrelevant. And the law sometimes may be that—at least, to many of us; but not the lawyers. Cicero, our great predecessor, long ago told us, 'Quibus autem Lex at Jus sunt inter eos communia, et civitatis eiusdem habendi sunt.' (Those whose common interest is law and justice should be regarded as belonging to the same civic fellowship.) It is the personal side of our profession that draws us together inevitably. The fact is that all who belong in the legal profession have a common fund of tradition and experience in all countries. Whenever a lawyer from abroad visits our bar associations, we treat him like a brother. His views and his anecdotes confirm the fraternal feeling.

"And there is a material reason for some sort of better personal acquaintance, in view of the constantly multiplying relations of international litigation. A natural and inherent trait in our profession, at its best, is mutual trust and confidence. Practice at the bar is most agreeable, most efficient, and most normal in those communities where bench and bar know each other best and where trust and confidence can be placed where it is merited. It is important that the organized bars of all nations should be so connected as to afford some formal means of mutual acquaintance, especially in a world where every occupation represented by their clients has a network of international connections.

"That the organized bars of the various nations are ready, in their latent sentiments, to be drawn together in some form of affiliation for personal contacts is evident from the correspondence held by this committee during the last 2 years. Those sentiments are well typified in the concluding remarks of the president of the Brazilian Bar Association on the occasion of his interview with the president of this association in Chicago in December, 1933:

" 'A greater approximation between the bars of Brazil and other countries of the Americas and their colleagues in this country should be sought, as a desirable and necessary step to bring about a more complete understanding of the many questions presented by the complexity of our present civilization. There is a very sincere and wholehearted wish on the part of the Brazilian attorneys to build up a closer relationship with their fellow colleagues in this country.'

"Therefore, we deem ourselves amply justified, as an abstract propcsition, in the conclusion that some sort of affiliation ought to exist, and that we ought to be found taking our part in it."

That report of that special committee of the American Bar Association 6 years ago had in mind some broad association of the organized bars of the whole world, without special reference to any separate association of the bars of the Western Hemisphere. The committee envisaged a prototype in the International Union of Advocates (Union Internationale des Avocats), founded in 1928, and organized under a Belgian charter of 1930. The committee appended to its report a copy of the constitution of that international union. (Reports of the American Bar Association, vol. 59, 1934, pp. 629–633.)

Affiliation of the American Bar Association with the Union Internationale des Avocats was approved at Boston, in 1936 (61 Am. Bar Reports, 273–277, 846–847).

But since that time rapid developments in the world, and the closer drawing of the ties of friendship and commerce in many directions among the countries of this hemisphere, have increasingly indicated the value of an association here in this hemisphere, of the lawyers of the different countries of the New World, among themselves, without regard to the Old World, for all of the purposes outlined for general world association in the American Bar Association committee's 1934 report; and for the cultivation of the spirit of good neighborliness and friendliness among the lawyers in the different countries of this hemisphere, in these emergent times—bearing in mind always that the lawyers comprise so large a part of the intellectual and administrative and legislative leadership of the various countries—leadership that both reflects and leads the currents of thought.

The American Bar Association soon fell in with this trend toward a separate intercontinental association in the Americas. In line with the Brazilian idea expressed by the president of the bar association of that country back in 1933, as already quoted from the report of the committee of the American Bar Association in 1934, that "a greater approximation between the bars of Brazil and the other countries of the Americas and their colleagues in this country should be sought," the American Bar Association, at its meeting in 1937, adopted through its house of delegates a resolution reading (62 Am. Bar Reports, 393)—

"Resolved, That the American Bar Association, in its sixtieth annual meeting, held in Kansas City, in the State of Missouri, expresses itself in favor of cooperation with the other 21 national bar associations of the American continents in promoting uniformity of law in the Americas through the study and investigation of mutual problems of comparative law, and for this purpose it is recommended that, on the occasion of the forthcoming session of the Eighth International Conference of American States, to be held at Lima, Peru, in 1938, delegates or representatives of the said bar associations of the Americas meet with a view to taking appropriate steps for the preparation at subsequent meetings, to be held in connection with later inter-American conferences, of projects on certain phases of comparative law problems pertaining to the Americas."

Following that 1937 resolution, studies were made in the section of international and comparative law of the American Bar Association of methods for carrying its purpose into practical effect, and at the sixty-second annual meeting of the association at San Francisco in 1939, the section presented two resolutions, one relating to an inter-American bar association, and the other to an institute of comparative law for the Americas. Those resolutions were referred to the house of delegates, and by it back to the section on international and comparative law, for further exploration of means for putting their purposes into effect. The resolution with relation to an inter-American bar association read (64 Am. Bar Reports, 399):

"Whereas the American Bar Association adopted at its annual session in 1937 a resolution in favor of cooperation with other national bar associations in the Americas with a view to promoting uniformity of law in the Western Hemisphere;

"Whereas such cooperation would be greatly facilitated by the establishment of a central organization in which all the national bar associations in the Americas were represented:

"Resolved, That the American Bar Association with due regard to the membership of the American Bar Association in the international union of advocates favors the establishment of an inter-American bar association, authorizes the section of international and comparative law to explore fully the possibility of establishing such an association, and directs the said section to submit a report on the subject and recommendations as to future steps which should be taken for the realization of this project."

The section of international and comparative law of the American Bar Association continued its studies through its committee on Latin American law, and the matter was presented to the Eighth American Scientific Congress when it convened in the city of Washington in May 1940, and, as I have already said, was considered by the ninth section of that congress and approved, and the constitution was signed. A number of drafts for such a project were presented by representatives of different countries taking part in the congress, showing widespread international interest in the idea. The different projects were harmonized in a committee of the ninth section of the congress of distinguished representatives of various countries, headed by the Honorable William S. Culbertson, former Ambassador of the United States to Chile, so that the constitution as finally adopted, while it follows in the main the draft prepared by the committee on Latin-American law of the American Bar Association's section, yet also embodies some features taken from drafts prepared by eminent lawyers from other American countries, and truly reflects the composite thought and the results of the joint labors of representatives of the bar associations of all of the countries taking part in the congress.

The constitution of the Inter-American Bar Association is molded broadly upon the underlying principles of that of the International Union of Advocates, to which reference has already been made. Like that of the International Union of Advocates, it adheres to a basic principle which the distinguished special committee of the American Bar Association in its 1934 report "deems to be vital," that "the basis of the affiliation should be representative, i. e., by delegates from organized bars of the respective nations and not by individual membership. By this means alone could the affiliation become truly comprehensive and typical of the respective bars.[2] Experience in other professional fields makes this so plain that it needs no argument."

Accordingly the membership of the new Inter-American Bar Association is composed of delegates of two classes of associations:

1. "National associations": Nation-wide professional organizations of lawyers in independent nations and self-governing dominions in the Americas.

2. "Constituent geographical associations": Professional organizations of lawyers in constituent States, provinces, territories, cities, and other subdivisions of independent nations, self-governing dominions, and colonies in the Americas.

Professional associations of lawyers devoted to particular branches of the law, such, for example, as an association of patent lawyers, or as this Federal Bar Association, whether Nation-wide or local, may be admitted to membership but, as the constitution of the association provides, "shall be entitled to representation and to vote in the conference and to representation in the council, only on the basis of constituent geographical associations."

The purposes of the Inter-American Bar Association are stated by its constitution to be—

"To establish and maintain relations between associations and organizations of lawyers, national and local, in the various countries of the Americas, to provide a forum for exchanges of views."

"To advance the science of jurisprudence in all its phases and particularly the study of comparative law; to promote uniformity of commercial legislation; to further the diffusion of knowledge of the laws of the various countries throughout the Americas.

"To uphold the honor of the profession of the law, and to encourage cordial intercourse among the lawyers of the Western Hemisphere.

"To meet in conference from time to time for discussion and for the purposes of the association."

The provisional officers of the Inter-American Bar Association, elected to serve until the first conference at Habana, are:

President, Dr. Manuel Fernandez Supervielle (president [dean] of the Habana Bar Association).

Vice presidents (one to be named by each country).

Secretary general, William Roy Vallance.

Assistant secretary general, Curtis Shears.

Treasurer, William Cattron Rigby.

Organization committee (provisional executive committee): Natalio Chediak (Cuba); J. Blanco Uztariz (Venezuela); Luis Anderson (Costa Rica); Dantès Bellegarde (Haiti); Camilo de Brigard Silva (Colombia); William Cattron Rigby (United States), chairman.

In these troubled times the value of such an intercontinental association among the lawyers of the democratic countries of this hemisphere seems doubly clear. Democracy is truly on trial. It is needful for the peoples of these countries who have it, and believe in it, to take every opportunity to manifest their belief, and to show its value to the world. The lawyers of every country have always been numbered among the foremost exponents of liberty. There was a time when it seemed unnecessary to defend the theory of democracy. Throughout the nineteenth century the tide ran strongly in its favor. It was apparently assumed everywhere, even in countries under monarchic forms of government, that the democratic form was ideally the best. But that is no longer the case. Our forefathers thought it sufficient to set every man on his own feet, and to leave him free to run his own race. But we are coming to be compelled to recognize that that alone is not sufficient; that there are other forms of freedom that apparently appeal even more strongly to a great portion of mankind than do the traditional ideals of freedom of action and liberty of speech of the democratic form of government. Predominant among these other forms is freedom from economic insecurity. That is the deep basis of the appeal of Nazi and Fascist forms of government; an appeal which we must recognize is making intellectual headway throughout the world. It is our job, the job of the democratic peoples, to preserve our established traditional forms of liberty, liberty of speech, liberty of individual action, liberty of individual enterprise; and at the same time to work out and to secure this additional new kind of liberty which the needs of our time demand, the liberty from economic insecurity; to harmonize this additional form with our traditional forms of freedom; and to preserve and to restore the crusading faith of our fathers and of all the democratic peoples in their ideals of government. That is the job, primarily, of the lawyers of democratic countries. It rests on them, more than on any other one group among the peoples; more than on any other profession. It demands their best brains, and their best efforts. It requires association among the lawyers of the different countries; acquaintance with each other; knowledge of each other's trends of thought; personal contacts; intercommunication of all sorts. To aid, even a little, in that great work, is among the primary tasks of the Inter-American Bar Association.

[2] A proposed amendment to the constitution of the Inter-American Bar Association, offered by Mr. Phanor J. Eder, a distinguished international lawyer of New York, who was a member of the American Bar Association committee to which reference has heretofore been made, now pending for consideration at the association's first conference, to be held in Habana, would permit admission of distinguished individuals as "honorary members." That, however, if adopted, would not change the essential character of the organization as a delegated body, representative of the organized bars of the different countries.

Selective Training and Service Act of 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

STATEMENT BY GEN. CLAUDE V. BIRKHEAD, MAJOR GENERAL COMMANDING THE TEXAS NATIONAL GUARD, ON THE SELECTIVE TRAINING AND SERVICE ACT OF 1940

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks and include therein statement made by Gen. Claude V. Birkhead, major general commanding the Texas National Guard, I submit herewith General Birkhead's statement made to committee hearing on the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940.

Several members of the Texas delegation in the House have requested me, as chairman of the Texas delegation, to have General Birkhead's statement published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

CLAUDE V. BIRKHEAD, MAJOR GENERAL, TEXAS NATIONAL GUARD—STATEMENT TO COMMITTEE HEARINGS, SELECTIVE TRAINING AND SERVICE ACT OF 1940

Gentlemen, I thank you for the opportunity to appear at this hearing. I strongly oppose the bill under consideration because it carries provisions for a peacetime draft and from a practical standpoint I do not believe it is one that will work except in war. I do not believe that mothers and fathers will support any system which contemplates the drafting of their sons in peacetime nor one which contemplates retaining the right to call their boy to service over a period of years. At this time national defense requires consideration of action in (a) emergency when (as now) we should have selective service to last for the emergency, and (b) peacetime training that will keep us prepared. In 1919 I made a study of preparedness for our country and compiled a long-range plan of peacetime preparedness under which military training would be popular and which could be successfully administered to the youth of our land without excessive expense.

The outline of that plan is as follows:

1. The establishment and maintenance of a thorough national system of universal military training to be administered locally by citizen soldiers. (This is now R. O. T. C.-C. M. T. C. system.)

2. The establishment and maintenance of an organized militia, a citizens' army (National Guard), controlled and coordinated by its own citizen-soldier staff corps, and entirely aside from the control of the Regular Army (in peacetime, but at command in war) a coordinate corps, not a subordinate.

3. The establishment and maintenance of a trained and organized reserve of officers and men, who shall be passed into this reserve as a result of the universal training system and the citizen army.

4. A small Regular Army, large enough to garrison the Philippines, Hawaii, the Canal Zone, Puerto Rico, and our continental posts, plus, say, 100,000 men (for fighting units), plus the personnel necessary for a chemical warfare service and an air service, would be ample; total, about 400,000.

That plan was presented to the Members of Congress in 1919 and 1920.

You will note that all three of the basic elements in this plan were then adopted either in whole or in part. No. 1, the plan of training in schools and colleges and field training camps proposed then was partially adopted and is in our present law, and is represented by the R. O. T. C. and the C. M. T. C. systems. No. 3, the trained organized Reserve of officers and men, was adopted insofar as the officers were concerned, and today there are more than 100,000 Reserve officers who are subject to call in a national emergency. The Reserve of enlisted men was not adopted until 20 years later, and then partially only. The Chief of Staff, General Marshall, testified a few days ago that there are now 30,000 men in the enlisted Reserve who had formerly had military training who could be called to fill in the Regular Army. Had that been adopted in 1920, together with the system of universal military training, this Reserve would have numbered many times 30,000, and, besides, there would not be a young man in this country physically fit, under 36 years of age who had not received good military training during the five junior-high and high-school years that would enable him quickly to take his place in the defense lines of our country and to efficiently fill it. Point 2 in that plan, the citizens' army, was adopted with provisions to increase its numbers to about 500,000 and is now known as the National Guard. It, like the others, has only been partially supported, and the National Defense Act has not been carried out.

On June 30, 1940, the week before last, the authorized strength of the National Guard of the United States was 251,195 instead of about 500,000, as it should be, and it had an aggregate of 252,698. The shortage in the present authorized strength of officers in the guard is 1,134 and in the enlisted strength 7,363. I mention this because there has been considerable discussion about the inability to get enlistments. Seven thousand three hundred and sixty-three sounds big, but I point out that there are about 3,700 units in the guard, so that the officer shortage is less than one-third of an officer for each unit and less than two enlisted men for each unit. There is a maximum above which a company commander must not enlist, so you realize that if his company is at full strength, he must go under maximum before he dares add another enlistment. This, together with the mechanics of processing men in and out and other small factors, makes it impossible for a company to be anything but under strength, and two per unit under strength is nothing. The guard recently was increased in strength. They have absorbed that. In the Thirty-Sixth Division, Texas National Guard, which I have the honor to command, we had 1,499 additional authorized. On June 30, my division was short 36 officers out of a total of 752, or about one-fifth of an officer per unit, and 177 enlisted men, or about one man per unit. Raise the authority to whatever you will and and we will still be short of maximum for the reasons stated. At this time, every day we are required to discarge men who have been recruited for the Army and Navy. We have to replace them. I do not believe that the guard has had any great difficulty in enlisting, except that which arises from the present uncertainty about what is going to happen to the guard and the continuous loss to the regular services.

Last week I received a telegram from headquarters, Thirty-sixth Division, that 96 towns in Texas have applied for new National Guard units.

This and the demand for R. O. T. C. units in schools show the people are sold on the present system.

What I have said about enlistments in the National Guard and the strength thereof makes apropos a discussion of the ability of the Regular Army to sustain itself by voluntary enlistment.

General Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, than whom no officer in the Army stands higher with the National Guard, as I understand it, indicated recently in the hearing on first supplemental national defense appropriation bill that a strength of 375,000 men in the Regular Army at this time, peace strength, with the authority to bring the Army up to war strength was satisfactory from his point of view, and in respect to the enlistments to meet that strength General Marshall stated on June 15 of this year, "I do not anticipate any trouble." The trouble he anticipated was too great a number in the Regular Army at this time because of the difficulty of training and supplying them. In this connection he stated:

"Another factor which convinces me that our policy is a correct one is the matérial problem. If we should continue to expand the Regular Army, we would be forced to obtain equipment for the new units by taking it from the National Guard. That would be a very unfortunate, a very unwise thing to do. We would have to strip the National Guard and certainly destroy its morale. Then, instead of its being the nucleus of a very valuable force, it would be seriously weakened, if not fatally emasculated."

The outline I shall submit for perfecting our present national-defense system, if adopted, will I think eliminate all difficulty in obtaining enlistments in the Regular Army.

The chance for an enlisted man to become an officer in the Army may be as much as 1 in 100 and 99 to 1 that the best he can do is to retire after 30 years' service as a technical sergeant or a warrant officer. Change this and give the qualified boy a 50-50 chance to become an officer through the simple process of enlisting and making good, and you will find no difficulty in enlistments, and while the enlisted personnel of the Army is of a pretty high type now, such change will bring a much higher average personnel to the Army. With such a change, your boy and mine could get our approval to enlistment. At present you and I will not approve. Only yesterday I was told an instance exactly of this and the boy did not enlist.

There has been talk of Swiss systems and of this and that, but why talk of copying the Swiss or other foreign systems? There is nothing the matter with our own defense system except that it has not been put into full effect.

There is needed:

(1) A sufficient Navy for each side of the continent. It seems that is now being provided for.

(2) Increase the officer and noncommissioned officer personnel of the National Guard to war strength so as to now provide and train the necessary key men to handle expanded numbers and added equipment. This is preferable to increasing the number of organizations. The Guard is an emergency organization. If a national emergency is threatened, then there should be no hesitancy in calling them for such service as the emergency seems to require. (And do it now.)

(3) Increase the Regular Army to about 400,000 to provide at least 10 thoroughly mechanized divisions now, and in addition meet the necessities of a superior air force. The Regular Army should be big enough to take care of sporadic necessities arising in connection with the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine, provide the air force, and to garrison our possessions and our continental stations. (Apparently done.)

(4) Make junior and senior R. O. T. C. effective in every junior high and every high school, and in every college and university in the land. Heretofore many schools could not get R. O. T. C. because of lack of funds. This training should not be compulsory, but be a "required" course for promotion or graduation just as mathematics is now a required course. Administer this as a normal school activity, not extracurricular, through capable officers drawn from local officers of the Reserve Corps and National Guard so as to preserve home acquaintance and atmosphere. (And do it now in time for September opening.)

(5) Provide training camps for field training of all R. O. T. C. boys, as well as C. M. T. C. and others. (And do it now.)

(6) Increase and amplify the Officers Reserve Corps (and do it now). This is a basic element of our national-defense system and, in comparison to this opportunity for training, its members are well-trained and efficient. They compare very favorably with officers of the Army and the Guard. Right now it can probably furnish all of the officers needed for the immediate emergency. Provisions should be made for annual field training of the entire corps. As time goes on, the increase in this corps would be the natural result of the increase in the R. O. T. C. and C. M. T. C. under Nos. (4) and (5) above.

(7) West Point is a wonderful school, and its fine traditions, history, and efficiency should be turned into a school for training officers, not cadets. Increase it to the extent necessary, or establish similar officer schools as may be needed for the education of officers aside from that furnished by the various service schools.

(8) Provide material for these schools from officers made from selected graduates from the R. O. T. C.-C. M. T. C. systems and our great military schools, many of which administer practically the same education as West Point now does. Others would conform as need be.

(9) Divide the commissions in the Regular Army between those mentioned in No. (8) above and the enlisted personnel of the Army and National Guard, so that an Army career will be available to any qualified man simply by enlistment and then winning his way. This is the American way. (And do it now.)

(10) Provide for field training of the Army, all of the Guard, and all of the O. R. C. annually, in large bodies similar to the training that was done in the Third Army in the Texas-Louisiana maneuvers. (And do it now.) That training was, in my opinion, extremely valuable, value far above the cost. It demonstrated the bitter need of such training.

Had the system outlined above been put into effect in 1920 (see Aims and Purposes of the National Guard Association, published September 1919), practically every physically capable man under 36 years of age in this country would now be fairly well trained, and the development of officer personnel thereby would now furnish plenty of qualified officers.

Don't look to foreign countries for your system of training and national defense. Improve and perfect our own. It has demonstrated that it is successful. A compulsory system adopted now will not be supported by the people when security again returns to us.

This plan avoids the dangers of centralization and of militarism. It democratizes our entire military establishment.

The promotion of a major portion of the officers from the ranks would open a military career to any capable young man which he could adopt simply by enlisting in the Army and making good as officer material. It should result in the selection of officers because of demonstrated aptitude and qualities of leadership.

It preserves the local civilian military organization, and the local esprit de corps and morale.

It will prove a national asset because of the production of a better manhood physically, mentally, and morally.

As a measure of preparedness against war it will be entirely adequate.

It furnishes an immense reservoir of trained men, officers, and officer material, both in the organized and unorganized reserve.

Its cost is vastly less than any other system proposed, less than one-third as costly as the bill proposed.

Training as it does without taking the boy away from school or from business pursuits after he has entered them, its saving in economic loss is almost beyond calculation.

It provides an active, equipped organization and a ready organized reserve of great numbers that would be immediately available for any emergency.

This plan renders a large standing army unnecessary. A small Regular Army, large enough to garrison the Philippines, Hawaii, the Canal Zone, Puerto Rico, and our continental posts, plus say 100,000 men (for fighting units), plus the personnel necessary for a Chemical Warfare Service and an Air Service, would be ample.

Our present system insofar as it has been permitted to operate has proved itself to be a success and has the hearty support of the people.

Now as to the basic training system, I think you gentlemen know that in your respective States there are many schools clamoring for R. O. T. C. (I know that Chairman SHEPPARD knows because I have, through him, tried to get R. O. T. C. for many schools in Texas.) They would all have had them had the R. O. T. C.-C. M. T. C. system been supported properly, and instead of the few thousands, there would have been 10 times those few thousands now receiving training.

A few public and a few private schools have R. O. T. C. or Junior R. O. T. C. Literally hundreds of schools, public and private, want R. O. T. C. and will pay all of the extra costs and expenses. To grant these applications means practically nothing except the authority to call their school an R. O. T. C. Junior or an R. O. T. C. school, and the loan of a few of the thousands of the rifles now in cosmoline and a little supervision. I understand we have a presently sufficient supply of Springfields and a reserve of about 600,000 Enfields, plenty of rifles to lend for training. If needed, they could be gotten back in 48 hours. Another answer is made that there are not sufficient officers to allot to this training. It seems that by law or regulation it requires 1 Regular Army major for each private school so that in my own town, San Antonio, there are 2 private military schools, each having a major to supervise 150 or 200 R. O. T. C. each, while in the public schools there are 5 or 6 different schools that have these units with 1,200 or 1,500 cadets and 1 major supervises all of them. This 1 major instructor-inspector could take on every private school in San Antonio without loss of efficiency in the instruction. I understand that each public school furnishes the commandant of cadets and assistants at its own expense and the private schools furnish their own uniforms. In the public schools the Government does issue some uniform equipment. I think under the present system the private schools get the exclusive use of the Regular officer free. If true, that is basically wrong. Amend and authorize Junior R. O. T. C. to take boys from 12 years up and amend so it will not require so many Regular Army officers to supervise these schools. The Officers' Reserve Corps now can and will furnish all the officers needed as instructor-inspectors, commandants, and assistant commandants of these schools.

Let no one tell you that our Reserve officers are not capable of administering this training either with or without the supervision of a regular officer. Let no one say that the Army has so failed in its mission of training the Officers Reserve Corps. I think no one will dare say to the more than 100,000 Reserve officers all over America that they are failures and the system that produced them is a failure. I know better. I have had hundreds of them serve under me, and I know that they average up mighty well. I understand that the Army takes this same attitude and feels that the system has ready for their use at this time all of the Reserve officers they now need except possibly second lieutenants, and that they don't want to amplify and increase the Reserve system. If the system doesn't produce enough second lieutenants, obviously it is because the many hundreds of schools wanting them have been and are today unable to obtain R. O. T. C. Junior units covering boys from 12 years old up. The schools are clamoring, and the boys themselves are clamoring, for the training. Witnesses before this committee have said we were so woefully short in training. We are short in that type of training but not so short as we are so pitifully short in large unit field training for our Army and our Guard.

If a real war emergency comes, the present O. R. C. would be exhausted with the first million men. This Congress should issue a mandate to the Army to increase and perfect the R. O. T. C.-C. M. T. C.-O. R. C. system to where it will produce officers for at least 4,000,000 men.

Anyone who witnessed the Louisiana maneuvers had demonstrated to him, especially by comparison with the Second Division and a few other longer trained units, the glaring need of more of such training, and yet the quarter of a million men of the guard remain at home in uncertainty, wondering why all this "march them up the hill and march them down again" and months lost that might have been devoted to that essential training. I do not know what those maneuvers cost, but I will say that our Army never got more value out of money spent than was gotten in those maneuvers. They were well conceived, planned, and executed, and the Army is to be congratulated on them.

If there is an emergency, a real emergency, it is almost criminal not to have had that quarter of a million men and officers and the sixty or seventy thousand of the Regular Army in the new organizations in intensive field training. If there is no emergency or threatened emergency, we should say so and tell the guard to stay at home and tell the Regular Army they need neither men, more training, nor equipment.

The National Guard is an emergency force. It should not be called or ordered except in an emergency or a threatened emergency, but if such exists it should be inducted without hesitation. They are ready and willing. There are 22 divisions in the National Guard, and the commanding generals of all 22 divisions of the guard, and a great many of the adjutant generals of the State, and a great many of the commanding officers of separate regiments and brigades have voiced the willingness of the National Guard as a whole to perform the mission for which it has trained for 20 years. I believe they feel that the emergency now threatened is a serious one. The morale of the National Guard is of the highest and its equipment for intensive training is greater than it ever has been since the World War.

No projectiles are fired in maneuvers; training for the use of the high-powered weapons, with which we shall later be equipped, can be administered practically as well by simulation as with the actual weapons. Hitler trained with vehicles camouflaged as tanks and many other such. A truck can simulate a tank, a trailer a gun, etc., etc.—the mechanics of movement and of battle can thus be taught nearly as well as with the real thing. The truth is that troops in large bodies require more training in the mechanics of movement and the mechanics of battle, coordination, cooperation, liaison, etc., than they do in the actual handling of their weapons; or, to put it another way, to attain efficiency in the mechanics of movement and of battle requires a longer time of training than does the handling of the weapons, for, after all, whatever weapons we may be equipped with in the future, they are very similar to weapons now in the hands of our troops. We now have automatic pistols and semiautomatic guns, 30- and 50-caliber machine guns, 37-millimeter guns, and 75-millimeter mortars, etc., the shooting of which the great body of our troops understand. New equipment will not so much differ in type and methods of handling as it will differ in the number of such weapons allotted to the units.

Our military experts have not, so far as I know, proposed that we abandon the system which has demonstrated itself to be a success even in its partial use. Though talked of by others, none has proposed the adoption of the Swiss or other foreign system, but they may desire to superimpose something on it such as draft for peacetime.

The draft law is all right in war or for a major emergency, and we should now have one ready for use when needed, but if because we are now intense about national defense, a proposal which provides for peacetime draft of our boys and our men for peace service (as distinguished from training), you will find that when the piping times of peace come again it will fail because you gentlemen then, and practically all the rest of your citizenship, will refuse to permit your sons to be drafted into a peacetime Army.

Adopt a peacetime draft system and your people will not support you in it when peacetime comes.

Perfect your own system and do it now. Your people will support you.

Why Wallace?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
Monday, July 22, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, considerable uncertainty and confusion seem to exist among commentators, editors, and even among many of the Democratic delegates to the Chicago convention, themselves, as to why President Roosevelt personally insisted on the selection of Henry Wallace as his running mate in the forthcoming election. Judging from the jeers and boos which greeted every mention of Secretary Wallace's name during the nominating roll call, many of the rapidly diminishing contingent of Jeffersonian Democrats left in the New Deal party which has come to replace the traditional Democratic Party of Jefferson and Jackson hoped up until the very last that they might be permitted by the boss in the White House to have something to say about the convention which bore their party label but which booed their party heroes, traditions, and elder statesmen. Their hopes were in vain.

The man upon whom the party had heaped too many superlatives had captured their party and did a superlative job of dictating its every action from beginning to end.

BUT—WHY WALLACE?

However, even though the influence and inspiration of regular Democrats like Carter Glass, Millard Tydings, Speaker Bankhead, Jim Farley, Jack Garner, and other war horses of democracy were thrown into the proverbial ashcan of discarded disciples along with the philosophy and preachments of Andrew Jackson, Thomas Jefferson, Woodrow Wilson, William Jennings Bryan, and other Democratic statesmen of a more glorious era of that late-lamented party, some still ask the question of "Why Wallace?" It was the Republican Wallace against the field of Democratic entries, and the Republican won. Why? I think it is an ill-considered question to which the answer is as obvious as the cunning with which the President planned and promoted his own renomination. Robert C. Albright, Washington Post columnist, suggests the complete answer in a one-sentence paragraph in last Sunday's Post.

President Roosevelt may forget his party platforms before the ink on them is dry or renounce them completely as he did in the case of the foreign-affairs plank of the platform adopted in Chicago, but his memory is superb in remembering whom among his associates deserve the lash of punishment or the touch of royal reward. He rewards his flatterers and punishes his critics with equal gusto and determination. Witness the attempt to drive from public life and into obscurity such obstructionists—as he denominated them—as Senator GILLETTE, of Iowa; Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland; Senator "COTTON" ED SMITH, of South Carolina; Senator GEORGE, of Georgia; and others who dared to criticize or oppose his drive for enhanced Executive power. And his affection for such unquestioning followers as Frank Murphy, Harry Hopkins, Robert Jackson, Sidney Hillman, and others of the inner circle of the undemocratic party of the New Deal has been equally demonstrated by his repeated promotion of these new patron saints of what was one time the party of democracy.

To anyone who has followed the manner in which the President has swung the lash or awarded the toga, his insistence that it must be none but Wallace is not surprising. It is found in the following short but significant paragraph from Robert C. Albright's article analyzing the recent Chicago puppet show:

He (Wallace) was the first important administration figure ever to propose the President for a third term in a public speech.

Mr. Speaker, there you have the answer to the President's drive for Wallace in the potent story of 20 words. Wallace was the first man in the President's Cabinet to suggest openly that the President be given the goal which he coveted above all else. And Mr. Wallace followed through. The President got the nomination which he craved. My friends, the President is no piker. He rewards his idolaters. He named the Secretary as his running mate.

"Drafted" by Himself

OF

HON. ALBERT G. RUTHERFORD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SAYRE (PA.) EVENING TIMES

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Speaker, the so-called drafting of President Roosevelt for a third term by the Democratic Convention at Chicago last week fools no one. It was premeditated by the President and his close political friends and was the result of many months' hard work before the convention. As stated in an editorial in the Evening Times of Sayre, Pa., which follows, the issue is clear and simple. It is Roosevelt—Roosevelt, his record and his ambition. His record for real achievement during the past 7 years is bad but his desire for more and greater power is still unsatisfied. I believe, as does the editor of the Times, that in November the people of this country will overwhelmingly decide that we want no Hitler here in this country and that there is more than one man in this country able to run the affairs of this Nation.

"DRAFTED" BY HIMSELF

That the campaign now under way will be hard fought and perhaps unparalleled in bitterness in the history of American politics seems certain.

Having succeeded in "drafting" himself for a third term at the Roosevelt one-man convention in Chicago, Franklin D. Roosevelt now attempts to perpetuate himself in office by shattering the third-term tradition, faithfully observed by the Nation since the days of Washington.

The issue thus becomes clear. The issue is Roosevelt—Rooosevelt, his record and his ambition.

The manner in which the President has completely assimilated what was once the Democratic party and converted it to his own ends reeks of totalitarianism. That he wants to continue in the White House after the expiration of the two-term limit which has been the tradition of America since the beginning of independence, has an ominous meaning to the people of this Republic.

Mr. Roosevelt's record in the White House is too well known to require repetition. Debt, taxes, more debt, more taxes, experimentation, defenselessness, and a steady, planned drift to centralization of all power of government in the White House.

With Harry Hopkins at the Chicago end of a private telephone line to the White House and easily 90 percent of the delegates living off taxpayers' money under the New Deal, the stage was set from the opening day of the Roosevelt convention in Chicago for the ratification of Roosevelt's third term ambitions. This was not a great, deliberative political convention in the American manner. It more closely resembled a Hitler Nazi Party congress.

It might well be a preview, however, of American political conventions in the future, should Roosevelt be elected to a third term.

Thus, then, the campaign gets under way. Wendell Willkie, nominated by the overwhelming demand of public opinion as the Republican standard bearer, pledged to a free America for free people; Franklin D. Roosevelt, seeking to perpetuate himself in office with all the dangers to liberty and the future of this Nation that that implies.

When this issue is made clear to the voters, as it will be, the third term will be dealt the death blow at the polls it so richly deserves. The decision should be so overwhelming that no man will ever again have the temerity to aspire to life tenure in the White House.

What Goes On in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on July 14, 1940:

Good afternoon. This is another of my 30-minute broadcasts on the subject of what is going on in Congress. Once each month since January 1939 I have enjoyed the opportunity of reporting to my constituents. Judging from the mail I receive following each of these broadcasts, I am convinced that there is an increasing interest in this subject. That statement should not be surprising when we realize that the decisions made by Congress during the past 2 years will affect the well-being of every citizen, as well as the happiness of generations yet unborn.

At this time of crises our thoughts and our every effort should be directed toward solving the problem of how we can speedily build up and properly equip an adequate Army, Navy, and Air Force of sufficient size and strength to convince any aggressor that he could not successfully attack the United States. At the same time we must remain firm in our desire to maintain an honorable peace.

Before I go into a discussion of our national-defense problems, and I use the plural advisedly because our problems are numerous, I would like to refer briefly to a few other subjects on which the House of Representatives has taken action since I last reported to you.

Two things have happened recently in Washington which I think indicate a very healthy condition. The first is that Congress did not adjourn on June 22, as originally planned. The second is the approval of the Hatch "clean politics" bill.

The reason that Congress did not adjourn last month is due solely to the fact that the people of this country made it known in no uncertain terms that they wanted Congress to stay in session throughout the present emergency. That we face a very real emergency cannot be denied by anyone who has voted for, or approved of, the huge appropriations recently made by Congress for the use of the Army and Navy. Early in June the President stated at a regular press conference that Congress could pass the necessary legislation and adjourn by June 22. He further stated that if Congress stayed in session after that date it would only be for the purpose of making political speeches. Mr. RAYBURN, majority floor leader of the House, stated on the floor of the House that he would offer an adjournment resolution on or before June 22 and that it would be adopted.

The idea of insisting on the adjournment of Congress was forgotten when it was discovered by the House leadership that more than 100 Democratic members were ready to join with the solid Republican minority to defeat any adjournment resolution. Thus it was again proven that Congress will respond to the wishes of the people back home, if only they will make their wishes known clearly as they did in this case.

The second healthy situation recently apparent was the passage by the House of the Hatch bill. This bill passed the Senate several weeks ago, following 3 weeks of rather bitter debate. During that debate it was opposed by every Senator who represents a State from which we have heard much of corrupt political organizations, and voting with them were a few Senators who were honestly alarmed to see the Federal Government inject itself into purely State matters. After every effort had been made to load the bill down with undesirable amendments, and it had been sent to the House for action, an effort was made to kill it in committee. In fact, it was at one time reported in the press that a motion made in the Judiciary Committee to table the bill had been adopted. That vote was reconsidered and last Tuesday the Hatch Act was approved in the House by a vote of 243 to 122. The following day the Senate agreed to the few changes made in the bill by the House and it now lies on the President's desk awaiting his signature or veto.

Inasmuch as I discussed the provisions of the Hatch Act in quite some detail during my May broadcast, I will not go into its provisions again.

It would perhaps be worth while to take a few minutes to discuss the so-called Bridges bill. This bill was recently passed by the House in an effort to get rid of an alleged undesirable alien. The bill itself was very brief, simply stating that the Attorney General should proceed forthwith to deport Harry Bridges, without regard to any other provision of law. From all I have read in the newspapers there is no doubt in my mind but that Harry Bridges is an undesirable alien and that he should be deported. But at this particular time it seems more important than ever before that we hold fast, not only to the Constitution, but to the Bill of Rights, and that we insure that no person shall be denied his or her right to proper trial. The only evidence before the House was the statement contained in the committee report which simply said that the proponents of the bill felt that Mr. Bridges was an undesirable alien and that further than that he was known to have associated with Communists. Mr. Bridges himself was denied a hearing before the House Committee and no evidence was offered that he was or ever had been a member of the Communist Party. It seems to me that if our immigration laws are so weak that we cannot deport an undesirable alien without passing a deportation bill for each case, we should certainly revise our deportation laws so that we can get rid of every undesirable alien, Mr. Bridges included.

I imagine that most of my listeners are familiar with the provisions of the so-called Smith bill, a bill amending the National Labor Relations Act. The press covered the debate on this bill rather thoroughly because of the interest of both the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. in these proposed amendments. I have stated on numerous occasions that I would not vote for any amendment to the National Labor Relations Act that would weaken the declared purposes of the act as expressed in its preamble. I considered each of the amendments proposed with that thought in mind, and I am thoroughly convinced that rather than weakening the act these amendments will in fact strengthen it and make it more workable, and at the same time increase the chances for industrial peace. As finally approved by the House, the Smith bill had the support of the American Federation of Labor, according to a letter sent to each Member by Mr. William Green, president of that organization.

Now to the subject in which I know you are all interested—the efforts that are being made to improve and strengthen our national defense. In this regard I would like to go back to 1919 and review briefly what has taken place between then and the present time.

At the close of the World War, those who had been responsible for the maintenance of our Army and Navy felt that there were certain lessons that we should have learned from our experience in the World War. General Pershing expressed the thought of most military men when he said that never again should this country allow itself to reach such a state of unpreparedness as had prevailed in 1916 and 1917. After much study and the taking of a great deal of testimony from ranking officers of the Army and Navy, Congress enacted what has since been known as the National Defense Act of 1920. It was felt by those who wrote this National Defense Act that we should follow the time-honored American custom of maintaining a small standing Army, composed of professional soldiers, with a substantial reserve of both officers and enlisted men. Provision was made for the establishment of citizens' military training camps with the thought in mind that young men of high-school age could go to camp for at least 1 month each summer for a period of not less than 4 years. Our officer reserve was to be built up by the establishment of Reserve Officers' Training Corps in our various colleges. Unfortunately, Congress has never provided sufficient money to carry out this idea. Each year about twice the number who could be accommodated applied for training in the C. M. T. C. Instead of carrying out the provisions of the National Defense Act, the United States was intrigued by various disarmament plans. We signed a naval treaty with the other naval powers of the world and actually sank perfectly good battleships while other nations simply tore up blueprints. We signed the Kellogg-Briand Pact to outlaw war as a method of settling international disputes. I do not regret that we signed these treaties or that we made every possible effort to bring about disarmament and the maintenance of peace through such agreements. But we must now admit that this method has failed and that in a world such as we live in we must maintain an Army and Navy strong enough to protect our own shores.

If, in order to make secure our own liberties we must protect the entire Western Hemisphere, then certainly that should be done. I consider that a military question, and I am willing to follow the advice of men who have devoted their whole lives to the study of military and naval problems.

It may be a dangerous prediction to make, but I am thoroughly convinced that this phase of tremendous armament will be only temporary. The day will come, perhaps not in 5 years or even in 10 years, when the world will go back to the idea of the Kellogg-Briand Pact, for the simple reason that the countries of the world cannot afford to maintain the huge armies most of them are maintaining today. This period of attempting to bring about world peace through disarmament and treaties extended from 1919 to 1933. In 1933 two events took place that have had a tremendous effect on the lives of all of us. It was in 1933 that we saw the start of the Hitler regime and here in the United States the beginning of what we have come to know as the New Deal. And I certainly do not intend to imply that there is any connection between these two events. Hitler immediately started to rearm Germany with just one thought in mind—to avenge the defeat of Germany by the Allies in 1918. Here in the United States we continued to coast along, spending less money each year on our Army and Navy. It is a matter of record that during the campaign of 1932, President Roosevelt criticized the Hoover administration for spending too much money on national defense. And when he became President he proceeded to reduce Army and Navy appropriations by 35 percent below the previous year.

One thing that has puzzled me greatly in watching the developments of the past few months is the fact that we apparently knew very little of what was going on in Germany. Somebody fell down on the job. We maintain military attachés in every part of the world, and it was certainly the duty of our military representatives in Germany and elsewhere to advise our Government as to just what was taking place. One of two things is true: either our representatives in Europe failed to advise us, and if that is true they should be discharged from their posts, or else the President was aware of developments in Germany and failed to inform the Congress and the country.

From March 4, 1933, until May 16, 1940, Congress was given no intimation of the need for increased national defense. On May 16 the President called to the attention of the Congress the need for huge appropriations for our Army and Navy. That message to Congress was followed by a fireside chat the following Sunday evening. During the fireside chat the President contended that there was no need for alarm and that the situation was not as bad as the country apparently felt it was from reading his message on the 16th.

I have made every effort to find out just what the true picture is at the present time. General Marshall, Chief of Staff of the Army and a fine officer, testified that we could put into the field 75,000 fully equipped men. Under present conditions an army of 75,000 men is just a drop in the bucket in comparison to the numbers needed for a major conflict.

You may be interested to know just what equipment the Army actually has on hand at the present time. Starting with the large 90-millimeter guns, we have ordered 317 but we do not have a single one on hand at the present time. We have only 15 of the 37-millimeter antiaircraft guns, while we have on order 1,423. We have actually on hand 228 of the 37-millimeter antitank guns with 1,388 on order. We have 83 of the .50 caliber machine-gun packs with 962 on order. We have 16,264 of the 500–1,000-pound bombs with 49,000 on order. We have only 400,000 gas masks in the possession of the Army with one and one-half million on order. We have only 4,600 rounds of ammunition for our 37-millimeter guns, and we have recently ordered two and one-half million rounds. Important as tanks have proven themselves to be in modern warfare, we possess only 28 light or heavy tanks with 928 on order and delivery date uncertain. We haven't a single yard of woolen cloth out of which we could make army uniforms, while we actually need at the present time five and one-half million yards. That hardly seems believable when we think of the amount of money that has been spent on relief in those industrial cities of the country which are dependent upon the textile industry for their prosperity. We actually have on hand 38,000 of the new semiautomatic Garand rifles, and General Marshall stated that we should have a minimum of 240,000. And we have 141 of the 75-millimeter guns with 1,400 on order.

There has been a lot of misinformation circulated regarding the strength of our Army Air Service. General Arnold, Chief of the Air Corps, testified before a congressional committee that the Army has in its possession only 1,965 planes of all kinds—bombing, observation, and combat—but in response to a question he replied that every one was obsolete according to present standards. That statement is not quite as bad as it sounds, as General Arnold further explained that many of these ships were obsolete only because they did not have self-sealing gasoline tanks and because they were without armor protection.

I cannot understand where the engineering officers of the Air Service have been for the past 20 years. As a matter of fact, self-sealing gasoline tanks were known during the World War. I recall that a captain serving in France with the Army Air Service designed a self-sealing tank by making use of stretched rubber on the inside of the tank. This method was used quite successfully in several of the planes used at the front during the World War. In another case the pilots of one squadron took up a collection and bought armor from the French Government with which to protect the planes they were then using. It seems almost criminal that such important developments should have been overlooked during the past 20 years.

I have had several letters urging Congress to pass all needed legislation with the least possible delay and with a minimum of debate. Certainly no fair-minded person can criticize the way Congress has handled the national-defense legislation presented to it since May 16. The first request made by the administration was authority to increase the tonnage of the Navy by 11 percent. This bill was speedily passed, and almost before the ink was dry a second request was made to increase the strength of the Navy by 70 percent. This second request was speedily granted. On May 16 the Navy was limited to the possession of not more than 3,000 planes. This limit was immediately raised to 4,500, and a few weeks later to 10,000. All limit has been removed from the number of planes the Army can possess, the only limitation being the size of the appropriation made by Congress for that purpose.

Recently I read in a letter appearing in the Hartford Courant Forum the statement that the President had requested a $4,000,000,000 expansion program originally but that the Congress had refused to grant that request. I immediately consulted the chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee and the chairman of the House Naval Affairs Committee and both of these gentlemen have assured me that no such request was made by the President or anyone else.

This past week the President sent to Congress a message asking for an additional $5,000,000,000, approximately four billions to be used for the Army and the other billion for the Navy. Practically all of these funds will be used for the purchase of modern equipment, such as tanks, antiaircraft guns, planes, et cetera. It is apparent that we are embarking upon what will amount to practically a $15,000,000,000 national-defense program. This is a huge sum of money and it is going to mean a lot of sacrifice on the part of a lot of our citizens. I am sure that we are all willing to make the necessary sacrifice in order that we will be in a position to protect ourselves.

You may be interested to know that the $4,000,000,000 naval expansion bill passed the House with only 20 minutes of debate and not even a record vote. If anything, this is undue speed. I have pledged myself not to permit partisanship to influence any vote that I might cast on these various defense proposals. I do not believe, however, that that means every request should be granted without even studying the proposal. We need at this time a strong minority, not to harass the administration, but simply to serve as a check.

A study of the various bills passed by Congress since May 16 indicates that there is liable to be a great overlapping of effort. For example, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been empowered to loan money to existing industries and to create Government-owned corporations that are empowered to build and operate plants for the manufacture of material needed for the Army and Navy. In the Army appropriation bill, the Secretary of War is authorized to acquire factories or to build new factories for the manufacture of equipment needed by the Army, and the same authority is given to the Secretary of the Navy in the naval appropriation bill. No one can question the necessity of the Government building and operating so-called stand-by plants for the manufacture of 16-inch cannon, for example, or for other items that private industry is not equipped to turn out speedily. But I do not believe that it is necessary for the Government to enter into competition with private industries which can turn out needed materal at reasonable prices and with all possible speed. Somewhere in Washington there has been a bogging down of this expansion program. The necessary appropriations have been passed by Congress, the War and Navy Departments say that they have their plans ready, but for some reason actual contracts have not been awarded. I am informed that 14 contracts have been on the President's desk for more than a week awaiting his signature.

From every indication, private industry is making all possible efforts to cooperate with the Government in this emergency. We want to be sure that we profit by our experience during the last war and make certain that we will not have another crop of war millionaires as a result of this program. If excess profits are made on any of the contracts awarded you can rest assured that any unreasonable profits will be recaptured through tax legislation.

In addition to the procurement of needed supplies we face a problem in the training of personnel. We can spend as much as $15,000,000,000 on the expansion of the Army and Navy but if we do not train men to operate this equipment we will not be much better off a year from now than we are at the present time.

The National Guard in each State is an important component of our Army. It is known that if we should face an invasion, the National Guard would be immediately mobilized and taken into the Army as a part of the Regular Army. Men who have enlisted in the National Guard have proven their patriotism and demonstrated their willingness to equip themselves so that they will be a valuable asset to their country in time of emergency. Certainly the least a grateful Government can do is to provide them with the best possible equipment and an opportunity for adequate training. You may be surprised to learn that money has not yet been requested by the War Department or the President to bring the National Guard units even up to peacetime strength. We now have 280,000 men in the guard and peace strength is 330,000. Justifiable criticism can be directed toward the administration of the War Department. Two months have elapsed since the President's message and in the meantime practically nothing has been done toward improving the efficiency of National Guard units except what has been done by the officers of the guard in the various States. It is nothing short of criminal not to give the National Guard the advantage of all possible training. In my humble opinion, the National Guard should be recruited to peace strength at once. They should be given 2 nights of drill each week instead of 1, along with week-end training occasionally. At least a few of the new Garand automatic rifles and a battery of the latest antiaircraft guns, and at least one of each of the latest weapons, together with competent instructors, should be sent into each State at once for training purposes. Following that the guard should have a reasonable period of intensive field training.

Officers with whom I have talked who went through the World War dread more than anything else the thought of ever having to lead untrained men into battle. We have an example right here in Connecticut of the serious lack of equipment. The War Department recently authorized the organization of an antiaircraft regiment. That regiment is now in camp undergoing a 3 weeks' training program, but as a matter of fact it has little or no equipment with which to train. Governor Baldwin and General DeLacour spent a day in Washington last week in an effort to get needed equipment, only to be told that none was available.

A few weeks ago the President requested authority to federalize and mobilize the National Guard and if necessary send them overseas. The use of the word "overseas" was unfortunate as it was later explained by General Marshall that what the War Department had in mind was the possibility of some South American Republic requesting troops from us to put down anticipated Nazi uprisings. The House Military Affairs Committee reported favorably a bill empowering the President to call out the National Guard for service in the United States, our island possessions, and the Panama Canal Zone. No action has been taken on this measure inasmuch as the request was predicated on the idea that Congress would adjourn in June. As long as Congress stays in session there is no need for enacting such authority to be used at some time in the future. If the need should arise to mobilize the National Guard the necessary legislation would be enacted by Congress within a few hours.

Again, judging from my mail, there is a great deal of interest in the question of compulsory military training. The proposal for universal military training has passed the academic stage. Hearings are now being held in both the Senate and the House on the Burke-Wadsworth bill, sponsored by the Military Training Camps Association and approved in principle by many high ranking Army officers. It is to be hoped that this plan will not be confused with the President's Youth Training Program. I am definitely opposed to the suggested plan of giving every young man and young woman a year's training under the direction of the Federal Government, in either military or nonmilitary capacities. The phrase "disciplinary training" by the Government does not sound American to me. The home, churches, and schools are still capable of training our youth without supervision or interference by the Federal Government. Universal military training, however, is something else again. In view of world conditions we must do one of two things—either build up a huge standing army of professional soldiers, and by huge I mean an army of one and one-half to two million men, or adopt a plan that will give us the needed backlog of well-trained civilian soldiers. I am not prepared to express approval or disapproval of any particular bill. Prompt study must, however, be given to the various proposals now before Congress.

The Burke-Wadsworth bill requires the registration of all male citizens between the ages of 18 and 65, but provides that military training shall be given only to those between the ages of 21 and 45, those in the other age groups to be trained for noncombatant services. I believe that for the next year or two we will have our hands full in carrying through to completion a program limited strictly to military training. It is undoubtedly true that men between 45 and 65 would be valuable serving as mechanics, chauffeurs, radio operators, and so forth, but certainly such men should have, at least, a minimum of military training. Imagine the confusion that would exist if we had some 600 or 800 civilian mechanics working in an airdrome which happened to come into the zone of fire—without some military training these men would become simply a mob. We must have some plan of military training that will disrupt the civilian careers of our young men to the very minimum. We do not want the United States to go militaristic. That was one of the things that we held against the Kaiser's regime in 1914. Unless some training program is speedily adopted, either by tremendous expansion of the C. M. T. C. idea, the expansion of the National Guard, or the requirement of 8 months to a year of training for a large number of men each year, we will find the real bottle neck of our preparedness effort will be trained personnel.

Much has been written about the wisdom of transferring our aircraft and munitions factories to a spot between the Alleghenies and the Rockies. At first thought such a suggestion seems to have merit. If such a move was necessary for a proper defense of the United States, no loyal citizen of Connecticut would object. But such is not the case. We have here in Connecticut the largest reservoir of skilled mechanics to be found anywhere in the United States. Further, if we take the 10 most likely points of attack on the United States, we find that from 5 of them Chicago, Ill., or Indianapolis, Ind., are nearer to the possible point of attack than is Hartford, Conn. Taking opinions expressed by a high-ranking Army officer well versed in defense measures, particularly from the air, we find that the terrain of central Connecticut, with its hills, trees, and numerous roads, would be an ideal territory to protect from hostile aircraft. If any of my listeners are particularly interested in this subject, I will be glad to send them more detailed information.

Recently I received from the Hartford Chapter of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies a letter asking me to answer 12 specific questions. I wish I had time this afternoon to go into detail concerning these 12 questions. But I think I have time to discuss briefly the aims and purposes of this organization. No one can question the patriotism of those who are sponsoring this organization or those who have enrolled as members. In addition to rendering aid to the Allies, or to Great Britain as matters now stand, they have made many valuable suggestions to Congress. No one can doubt that it is an asset to the United States to have the British Navy between us and the aggressors in Europe, and, as I understand the committee's request, it is that all possible aid be sent Great Britain without violating international law, our domestic laws, or weakening our own national defense. Within those limitations there is little or nothing we can do to aid Great Britain. It is a matter of record that we have a shortage in every category of national defense. Take, for example, the recent shipment of 50 SBC4 dive bombers. No one can successfully maintain that these ships were either old or obsolete. As a matter of fact, no dive bomber has yet been designed that is an improvement on this particular model. A few of these planes were 10 months old while some of them had been delivered to the Marine Corps just 6 weeks before they were ordered shipped to Europe. We had in the United States 96 of these bombers before this order was issued, which leaves us now with only 46 on hand. Mr. VINSON, chairman of the House Naval Affairs Committee, testified that it would take from 13 to 17 months to replace these ships. It seems to me that it is a tremendous responsibility for anyone to take when orders are issued permitting the export from the United States of military equipment that we may some day badly need right here. Supposing we go further than we should go in our efforts to aid Great Britain and wake up some morning to find that we are being subjected to attack from the other side of the world. Then, too, there is the question of international law. No one can question that it would be a violation of international law to turn over to any belligerent nation vessels owned and operated by our Navy. The suggestion was recently made that we sell to Great Britain 20 submarine chasers now being built for the United States. It is my understanding that these vessels are nearing completion. After the necessary authorization had been issued it was discovered that not only would it be a violation of international law, but of our domestic law, to allow these vessels to get into the possession of a belligerent nation. In addition to that is the fact that if we should have to defend ourselves, submarine chasers would be among the most important vessels operated by the Navy. Without the formality of any declaration of war we might find foreign submarines off our shores.

My sympathies, like the sympathies of the vast majority of our people, are, of course, with the victims of Europe's aggressors, and there are many ways by which we can aid these nations. We can and should ship to them huge quantities of surplus foods. We can and should immediately offer refuge to women and children now residing in Great Britain who are being subjected to cruel attack from the air. I believe that ships of the United States lines should be permitted to go to the ports of Great Britain and bring to the United States the refugees who want to come here. This could be done either by securing safe convoy from the belligerent powers or under the protection of the Red Cross. I am advised that much has been done to cut the red tape and to make possible the bringing of these refugees to the United States. I hope that all possible action will be speedily taken to increase the number that can come here. Before I leave the question of aiding Great Britain, I would like to point out that Great Britain is getting a great deal of help from the United States at this time. They are getting a majority of the output of our munitions factories and of our aircraft factories. They are getting more help than it would be possible to give them if we were actual participants in the war. At least at the present time there is no shortage of manpower in Great Britain nor is Great Britain short of credit or money. The day may come when we can do a great deal more good toward restoring peace permanently in the world as a nonbelligerent than we could ever do as a formal belligerent sitting at a peace-conference table.

Before I bring this broadcast to a close, may I again thank those of you who have written to me as these various proposals have been before the House? It is most helpful to receive the point of view of numerous constituents, and you can rest assured that your letters are always welcome.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HINSHAW
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1940

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of July 18:

[From the New York Times of July 18, 1940]

HISTORICAL NOTE—SUBJECT: THIRD TERM

On February 10, 1928, the Senate of the United States adopted the following resolution:

That it is the sense of the Senate that the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the Presidental office after their second term has become by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions.

Among those who voted to approve this denunciation of the third term as "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions," were Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY, permanent chairman and second keynoter of the convention now in progress at Chicago; Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, chairman of the platform committee of the same convention; Senator KEY PITTMAN, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate; Senator PAT HARRISON, chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate; Senator HENRY F. ASHURST, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate; and the following other distinguished Democrats, all Members of the present Senate: GERRY, GLASS, HAYDEN, KING, MCKELLAR, NEELY, SHEPPARD, SMITH, THOMAS of Oklahoma, TYDINGS, and WHEELER.

Resolutions of Fifth National Townsend Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE TOWNSEND NATIONAL WEEKLY

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the text of the resolutions adopted by the delegates at the Fifth National Townsend Convention, recently held in St. Louis, as follows:

[From the Townsend National Weekly of July 20, 1940]

TEXT OF CONVENTION RESOLUTIONS

St. Louis: The text of every resolution adopted by delegates at the Fifth National Townsend Convention in St. Louis follow:

"Whereas Almighty God has blessed the Townsend Clubs of America in the preservation and protection of our beloved leader during this past year, and has given him the strength and health to carry on in this mighty work; and

"Whereas we of this great convention are duly grateful for the services of this great man, Dr. Francis E. Townsend: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Townsend clubs of America in this fifth national convention assembled, recommend that Dr. Francis E. Townsend shall continue as the president and leader of the Townsend National Recovery Plan, Inc., but if, for any reason, Dr. Townsend is unable to serve in such capacity, his son, Robert C. Townsend, shall become his successor as national leader and president of the Townsend organization, thereby perpetuating the name of Townsend, which has come to mean justice, security, courage, and recovery."

AMENDED MANUAL

"Whereas the 1939 amended Townsend Club manual is definite and certain in its structure and provides a real form of organization that will ultimately lead to complete democratization of the Townsend organization; and

"Whereas its system of club government is so complete that it stimulates each individual club to greater activity and greater unity; and

"Whereas this form of club government has not been in operation long enough to give it a fair trial and give it a sufficient opportunity to answer the objections which have been raised against it: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this convention go on record as accepting the 1939 amended Townsend Club manual with such corrections as imposed by the resolutions committee, if such corrections are acceptable to the convention, as the official Townsend Club manual for the ensuing year."

FINANCES

"Whereas the national headquarters is in need of funds to keep it in efficient operation, and

"Whereas funds are needed for extension of our Townsend Plan throughout the Nation by field workers: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That wherever possible each club make a voluntary monthly contribution of not less than $5."

CONVENTION MANAGEMENT

"Whereas the fifth annual convention of the Townsend National Recovery Plan, Inc., has reached the high mark thus far in the life of our organization and movement, furthered by the splendid work of the convention committee: Be it

"Resolved by the delegates in convention assembled, That we extend to this fifth annual convention committee and convention manager our heartiest congratulations upon the splendid success achieved here and extend to them our sincerest thanks for their efforts."

"Whereas the delegates to this convention have received the most courteous treatment at the hands of the citizens of the city of St. Louis: Therefore, be it unanimously

"Resolved by the delegates to this fifth annual convention, That we extend to the citizens of this beautiful city our sincere thanks for their great kindness."

THIRD TERM

"Resolved, That this organization go on record as being irrevocably opposed to a third consecutive term for any President of the United States."

MANUAL INDEX

"Whereas in the procedure of a meeting matters occur which must be settled by the manual, and although the president may be familiar with the manual, it is oftentimes difficult to find a particular section of the manual which is needed to rule on the situation: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the manual issued as a result of this convention be completely indexed in such a manner that it will enable any club president to quickly discover any rule contained therein."

CONVENTION MANUAL

"Whereas the Townsend organization can function more effectively under one national program: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That one manual only be adopted at the national convention, which manual remain in effect throughout the year and can be changed only by a majority vote and national referendum of our membership."

TOWNSEND FLAG

"Be it resolved, That the Townsend national recovery plan have a flag with appropriate design that will signify our belief in security, democracy, and Americanism; be it further

"Resolved, That such a flag be displayed along with the United States flag at all of our Townsend Club meetings and rallies; and be it further

"Resolved, That Dr. Francis E. Townsend appoint a committee to design said flag."

TOWNSEND PLEDGE

"Whereas the term 'America' represents all of the territory in the continents of North and South America; and

"Whereas the Townsend National Recovery Plan, Inc., as an organization, is specifically interested in obtaining the Townsend plan as a law in the United States: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the last clause of the Townsend pledge be changed to read: 'and rededicate myself to maintain the Democratic spirit and form of government in the United States of America.'"

MEMBERSHIP CARD

"Whereas all Townsend Club members should be required to accept the Townsend pledge: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That there be printed on the reverse side of the Townsend membership card a copy of the Townsend pledge and that under such a pledge there shall be a space provided for the member's signature."

TOWNSEND LITERATURE

"Whereas, many people who join Townsend Clubs are unable to attend club meetings thereby giving them no opportunity to enjoy a complete understanding of the principles of the Townsend plan, and

"Whereas, it is our desire that each new member be armed with sufficient information to enable him to spread the Townsend philosophy in the community and convert his friends and neighbors to become members of a Townsend Club: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That Townsend national headquarters issue an attractive pocket-size booklet bearing the facsimile signature of Dr. Francis E. Townsend, explaining the fundamental principles of the Townsend plan, the method that we intend to use to procure the Townsend plan as a law, the organization of our clubs including such items as the Townsend creed, Townsend pledge, and the pledge of allegiance to the flag."

UNIFORM RECORD SYSTEM

"Whereas, it is important to the welfare of our movement to have a uniformity of records throughout our Townsend Clubs in order to avoid confusion and complications that often lead us into serious difficulties: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That national headquarters devise a uniform system of recording membership, finance (income and expenditure), and secretary's minutes of all club activities; and be it further

"Resolved, That proper membership, finance and secretary books be prepared for sale at a nominal price to all Townsend Clubs and Townsend youth associations."

SOCIAL-SERVICE COMMITTEE

"Whereas there are many Townsend club members eligible for State pensions in their respective States; and

"Whereas the administration of this old-age assistance and of relief is oftentimes unjust; and

"Whereas there is no reliable person or group of persons to which these people can go to ask for advice and counsel concerning the numerous problems that arise regarding this matter: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we recommend to the Townsend clubs of America that wherever possible the local clubs set up a social-service committee of well-informed people of tested integrity for the purpose of aiding these unfortunate people."

IN HONOR OF THOSE WHO HAVE SACRIFICED

"Whereas many devoted Townsendites who have sacrificed of their time, of their fortunes, and of their life have passed away since last convention time, and that this does occur in the period between conventions: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That at each national convention we set aside a minute of meditation and prayer in the memory of these folks who have passed away during the time since the last convention."

T. Y. A. PAGE IN TOWNSEND WEEKLY

"We, the members of the MacGlad Club 31, Cleveland, Ohio, in approval of the services and leadership of Dr. Townsend, national headquarters and the Townsend National Weekly, desire to call attention to the fact that the Townsend Youth Associations are not receiving through the columns of the Townsend National Weekly the publicity necessary to encourage its continuation and growth; and

"Whereas we well know and understand the Townsend organization has achieved its great success by reason of our national leadership and publicity accorded through our own Townsend National Weekly: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we request that recognition be given to the Townsend Youth Association through the columns of the Townsend National Weekly; and be it further

"Resolved, That this convention go on record as favoring a separate and distinct department for the Townsend Youth Association through the columns of the Townsend Weekly."

T. Y. A. RESOLUTION

"Whereas the Townsend Youth Association has proved to be an effective way of bringing youth into the Townsend movement, and

"Whereas the Townsend Youth Association is becoming a great asset to the Townsend National Recovery Plan, Inc.: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Townsend Youth Association become a permanent division of the Townsend National Recovery Plan, Inc., and that the T. Y. A. continue to operate in accordance with the present T. Y. A. Manual."

RESOLUTION

"Whereas the Townsend bill now before Congress, unless it is made a law before this Seventy-sixth Congress adjourns, will become null and void: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Fifth Townsend National Convention delegates assembled in St. Louis authorize Dr. Francis E. Townsend to appoint a committee of members of our organization, to work in conjunction with a similar committee to be selected by our friends and supporters in the United States Congress, to properly draft, prepare, and present at the earliest opportune moment a bill embodying the principles of the Townsend plan."

PEACE RESOLUTION

"Whereas the people of any nation are best served by a democratic form of government; and

"Whereas the only way to preserve life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is through democracy; and

"Whereas it is probable such democracy cannot survive in war: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Fifth National Townsend Convention go on record as recommending to our people and our Government that in order to preserve our democratic form of government the United States must stay out of the European war and that we stand unequivocally opposed to the use of any of our manpower to fight any war apart from the Western Hemisphere and the defense of our Nation."

AMERICANISM

"Whereas proper adequate defense of the United States is of great importance at this hour when the rest of the world is at war; and

"Whereas it is imperative that we have a united Nation; and

"Whereas the members of the Townsend National Recovery Plan, Inc., are true, loyal, and patriotic citizens of these United States: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we as delegates to the Fifth Townsend National Convention condemn all un-American activities; and be it further

"Resolved, That we pledge ourselves to aid a program of adequate defense to establish unity among our people, give our allegiance to the United States flag and to maintain a democratic spirit and form of government in America."

RESOLUTION

"Whereas the most indispensable first line of national defense is a people contented and happy because they are prosperous and secure, and who, therefore, feel a satisfaction and pride in their country, its traditions and institutions, and are willing to fight and, if necessary, to die for its preservation and perpetuation; and

"Whereas millions of our people have no such feeling toward our country because they have been steadily reduced to want, poverty, and the degradation of the dole, through no fault of their own, while, all of the time, they have been eager to find employment of their talents and abilities sufficiently productive to assure to them and their dependents a decent, American standard of living; and

"Whereas the situation in which these people find themselves, as well as that of our millions of poverty-stricken elderly citizens, can be speedily changed, and our entire national economy rapidly restored to conditions of stable prosperity, making possible provision of all necessary national defense goods and services without increasing our national debt, through the prompt enactment into law of H. R. 8264, now pending before the House of Representatives of the United States Congress: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this Fifth Annual National Convention of the Townsend Clubs of the United States goes on record as condemning in the most severe terms the totalitarian and dictatorial procedure whereby a handful of 13 Members of the House—the majority of the Ways and Means Committee—have been permitted to flout and thwart the will and desires of the millions of our citizens who live and vote in the districts of more than 180 of their colleagues, who have petitioned to withdraw this bill from the Ways and Means Committee; and be it further

"Resolved, That we demand that the House of Representatives proceed to an early and affirmative vote on this bill, as a primary national defense measure, subject to further corrective amendment, if and when experience with the operation of the legislation indicates the same to be necessary or desirable, and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be dispatched immediately from the convention to each of the Representatives and Senators in the Congress of the United States.

CONGRESSMEN

"Be it resolved, That all clubs and club members in any congressional district whose Congressman gave his vote to the Townsend bill on the floor of the House and has repledged himself to our program pledge to work for that Congressman in the coming election campaign to show that reciprocity and loyalty to those who have supported the Townsend movement will be observed by the entire organization."

"FIFTH COLUMNS"

"Whereas the delegates to this, the Fifth Townsend National Convention, do hereby acclaim to the whole world that our Townsend organization is fundamentally an American institution; and

"Whereas we Townsendites believe in the United States of America as a government 'of the people, by the people, and for the people,' whose just powers are derived from the consent of our citizens; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseperable; established upon the principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity; and

"Whereas we Townsendites know it is our duty to our great country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to love and respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies from within and without; and

"Whereas we believe that the very first step necessary to get our Nation ready to defend itself against all foes, either domestic or foreign, is to make the American people happy and secure in those American principles which guarantee to all citizens, as a right of citizenship, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, the right to vote, the right to peacefully assemble, and the right to petition the Government of the United States for the redress of grievances; with the opportunity of securing economic freedom unto all citizens who but do their part; and

"Whereas we hereby take cognizance of the present dangers that tend toward the destruction of a government 'of the people, by the people, and for the people'; and

"Whereas free government and free men, in order to preserve those inalienable rights of religious liberty, political liberty, and economic freedom, and to protect our democracy against all enemies of liberty, self-government, and economic security in America demand the prompt consideration and earliest possible enactment of laws in each and every State of our Nation with respect to 'fifth column' activities: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention of the Townsend Clubs of America, duly assembled at St. Louis, Mo., that our national headquarters instruct the Townsend Clubs to sponsor the enactment of a uniform law in each State of the Nation defining 'fifth column' activities and providing penalties therefor; and be it further

"Resolved, That the attached proposed act be offered as the contribution of this convention in the safeguarding of our Nation from all acts of subversion, sabotage, and other un-American activities; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this convention, and that a copy be sent to the Governor of each State and to all Members of the Congress of the United States of America."

War Propaganda, 1917 and 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. RUSH D. HOLT, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, under permission granted me, I present for publication in the RECORD another of the articles referred to by me at that time as being part of a series entitled "Twenty-five Years Ago."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The same propaganda technique that proved so valuable in 1915 and 1916 is being used today. That technique is to get our own native Americans, our own American businessmen, our own American clergymen (some like Bishop Manning are English, however they have lived here long enough that they are not listed as English), our own American officials, our own American writers to be propagandists. Some of these have reasons to be interested in the financial side of the war. Others are conscientious in their belief that the war is a life-and-death struggle for civilization. The latter group are the 1940 edition of the people who believed the last World War was a "war to save democracy" and a "war to end all wars."

England praised the work of our own American propagandists in the last World War. They did their work well and they were not suspected. They were the Trojan horses of their day. It was their work that aided America to get "educated"—as they used that word—for our entrance in that terrible conflict in 1917.

Many of those in official life are like J. P. Morgan, who told the Senate Munitions Investigating Committee that he was not neutral from the first day of the war. They chase a hope that we can be unneutral and stay out. They want to get part way in the war and stay part way out.

They have forgotten that many swimmers felt they could swim above Niagara Falls by defying the strong current. We have officials who feel the country can defy a like current in international affairs. The result will be that we cannot get back to the shore of neutrality, neither can we reach the other side of peace, but that we will go over, over into war, its death, and destruction.

Some know we can't defy the current if we get into the stream. Others feel we can. History shows we cannot.

Some of the same names are found behind the war-propaganda drive in 1940 that were active in the war-propaganda drive of 1914–17.

Some of the same international bankers, lawyers, and industrialists who financed the propaganda preceding the 1914–18 World War are financing the war propaganda of today.

They are using many of the same slogans, many of the same reasons, many of the same atrocity stories, many of the hysteria-inciting fears. All are not identical. Some have been given a present-day renovation, but the same base is found.

LORD LOTHIAN SAYS "BE CAREFUL"

But the schemers say "Be careful. Do the work but don't be caught." In the words of Lord Lothian, the British Ambassador:

"If American sentiment became persuaded that the United States was being maneuvered into commitment to war by foreign intrigue or for reasons of politics or finance, it might swing back violently to the ultraisolationism of the Ludlow amendment requiring a referendum before the United States entered a war."

He brought that up to date in a speech at Chicago when he said:

"The British Government is not trying to drag you into this war," and "if you are ever driven to action it will not be because of propaganda but because of the relentless march of events."

This same sentiment was echoed by Duff Cooper, Lord Marley, and by many others who have tried to convince the American people that this war is our war.

When commenting upon the appointment of Knox and Stimson to the President's Cabinet, the London press said:

"Further comment could not be obtained in responsible British circles, chiefly because they were reluctant to speak on American policy.

"There is a shrinking here from any pronouncement which might be considered as propaganda, and almost all estimates of American policies nowadays might come under that head."

SOFT PEDAL PRESSURE

It will be recalled that Attorney General Conant, of Canada, had said that it was Canada's duty to "do everything within our power to enlist the active support of the United States in the cause of the Allies." This created a bad impression in the United States and brought reprimand from England.

Don Campbell, writing from London, said this in his dispatch:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of Saturday, April 6, 1940]

"BRITISH 'HUSH' IDEA IT'S UNITED STATES DUTY TO FIGHT—WANT FACTS TO SPEAK FOR THEMSELVES

"(By Don Campbell)

"LONDON, April 5.—On the eve of the twenty-third anniversary of the United States' entrance into the World War the British Government tonight put the 'hush-hush' on any suggestions it is America's duty to enter the present war on the side of the Allies.

"Nevertheless American sentiment on the question of entering or staying out of the war is one of the chief topics of discussion, and that is why thousands of Britons are following the course of the Presidential race in the United States with almost as much interest as if they were electing their own Prime Minister.

"SOFT PEDAL ON PRESSURE

"They want to know whether President Roosevelt will seek a third term, whether an Allied sympathizer will get the nomination, and whether the American isolationists will come out on top.

"But the government, in accordance with Downing Street instructions, is soft-pedaling arguments on the question of whether the United States is bound by moral and humanitarian responsibilities to line up with Britain and France.

"Too much high-pressure salesmanship of the Allied cause, the British have found, only generates sales resistance among the American people.

"Agitation along the lines of America's 'duty' have backfired in too many instances.

"The new British policy is that the Allies have an excellent case, strong enough to win American support, and the facts should be allowed to speak for themselves.

"In this connection the Ontario speech of Attorney General Gordon Conant saying it was the duty of Canada to do everything to draw the United States into the war on the Allied side was at odds with the official British policy. Britain has no power to dictate the policy of a Canadian or Ontario official.

"FIGHTING FOR DEMOCRACY

"Nevertheless, there is no reason to suppose Conant's speech was unwelcome because it provided a further opportunity to sound out American opinion without incurring any official British responsibility.

"Furthermore, the Canadians are in a far better position to urge the United States to join the war than the British because, as Britons say of the Canadians, 'they, too, are Americans helping the cause of the democracies in Europe.

" 'We are fighting for democracy and therefore we are fighting the war for the United States as well as for ourselves,' many Britons complain.

"HOPE UNITED STATES WILL FIGHT

"The British hope that if the war becomes a long struggle and the Allies are hard pressed the United States will join in to prevent a German victory. They eagerly seize upon any suggestions or indications supporting this hope.

"It is admitted generally in London that so long as the war remains unsettled, there is scant chance of bringing about any shift in American isolationist opinion.

"Nevertheless the British frequently draw a parallel between now and 1916, in the days before the United States' entrance into the war 23 years ago tomorrow."

Lord Lloyd's book, The British Case, has been circulated in America to get America to believe in the cause. However, it will be noted that this same Lord Lloyd was in the same school as that of Lothian, Cooper, Marley, and others. He did not want United States to be conscious that we were being propagandized. He so stated in 1939. His sentiment about this was almost identical with that expressed by Cecil Spring Rice, the British Ambassador to the United States preceding the World War.

Sir Fredrick Whyte, of the English Ministry of Information, hastens to assure the correspondents that England is not trying to propagandize America.

Two reports from the New York Times are interesting:

[From the New York Times of October 13, 1939]

"ONE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIVE ARRIVE HERE ON THE 'WASHINGTON'—LINER DELAYED AT LE VERDON AND SOUTHAMPTON—MEETS STORMS ON CROSSING—BRINGS FIFTY-FOUR BLOODED DOGS—LORD MARLEY, A PASSENGER, SEES LONG WAR, WITH ALLIES FINALLY BREAKING GERMANY

"The United States liner Washington, with 1,535 passengers from Southampton and Le Verdon arrived here yesterday after a prolonged voyage caused by delays in both ports. In addition to a number of notables, the vessel carried a large cargo of Bordeaux wines and French cheese, and 54 dogs, including several champions shipped here from England to prevent their possible destruction in the war.

"One passenger was Lord Marley, deputy speaker of the British House of Lords, who is here to fulfill a lecture engagement arranged several months ago. He predicted a long war, but one that eventually would break Germany. The present conflict he described as 'a war of machines—not men,' and said that Britain would settle only for 'a peace with honor.' "

DUFF COOPER SEES REVOLT ENDING WAR—EX LORD OF BRITISH ADMIRALTY, HERE, PREDICTS CONSERVATIVE INSURRECTION IN REICH—HOLDS MONARCHY LIKELY—OTTO VON HAPSBURG MAY RULE, HE SAYS UPON ARRIVAL ON THE MANHATTAN TO LECTURE—ASTOUNDED AT SUBMARINE FEAT

"He was accompanied by his wife, the former Lady Diana Manners, who, as an actress, played the virgin in The Miracle. They will stay at the Hotel Ambassador and will go to the west coast before beginning their tour. He will speak here on The Survival of Liberty and The World We Live In.

"S. K. Ratcliff, British writer and lecturer, another passenger, said that fear of public opinion was dominating the strategy of all commands. 'All governments are afraid of launching a great air war,' he said. 'They can't see what it will lead to and neither side wants the responsibility for starting it.'

"Besides Mr. Duff Cooper and Mr. Ratcliff, there were four other visiting British lecturers aboard the Manhattan. The others were Cecil Roberts, former war correspondent and novelist; I. O. Richards, lecturer at Cambridge University; R. Ellis Roberts, journalist and author; and Miss Phyllis Bottome, novelist.

"NOT SENT BY GOVERNMENT

"All refused to discuss what course the United States should take in regard to the war. They had agreed in advance among themselves not to do so, as a course of conduct out of place for a visiting alien. Mr. Ratcliff, who will lecture on Why Britain Went to War, said that while most of them would discuss war issues, none had been sent by the British Government. 'The British Government isn't sending any speakers,' he added. 'They are coming on their own steam.' "

ENGLISH INCREASE PROPAGANDA EFFORT

[From the New York Herald Tribune of February 11, 1940]

"BRITONS CHAFE AT WARINESS IN WOOING OF UNITED STATES. DEMAND RISES FOR LONDON TO INTENSIFY PROPAGANDA DESIGNED TO AID THE ALLIES

"(By Ralph W. Barnes)

"LONDON, February 10.—Strong pressure is being put on the British authorities by certain quarters in Great Britain to intensify their propaganda by publicity in the United States as a means of swinging the United States into closer line with the Allied cause. According to these authorities, even some Americans are complaining that Britain is not doing what she might do to put over her case in the great American Republic.

"When he assumed the post of Minister of Information last month Sir John Reith himself is understood to have had some doubts as to whether the officials charged with propagandizing the United States were doing their job.

"Sir John is understood to have seen the light when the policy being pursued with respect to the American Nation was explained to him by Sir Frederick Whyte, head of the American section, former director of the British version of the English-Speaking Union, and an authority on the United States. Sir Frederick and the powers that be at the British Foreign Office are working under the assumption that anything like an extensive campaign to bring the United States into camp would prove a boomerang.

"WARY OF CRITICISM

"Whatever the facts may be, the American public has been told, even by conservative students of the subject, that British propaganda had much to do with the entry of the United States into the last war. Therefore the authorities here insist that in whatever propaganda is fed across the Atlantic there shall be little or no trace that could be pointed to by those Americans who desire to raise the cry, 'British propaganda.'

"It may be argued by some Americans that the American section at the Ministry of Information, about whose existence there is no secret, is simply a facade to screen some insidious institution run on lines similar to those of the American section at the Wellington House Propaganda Department in the early years of the last war. From this 'hush-hush' section, Sir Gilbert Parker carried on an under-cover campaign which, according to the experts, was highly effective in influencing American opinion. But if there is such a bureau, this correspondent is being badly taken in.

"SIR FREDERICK'S SPECIALISTS

"Sir Frederick's three specialists, all of whom are British subjects and experts on the United States in one phase or another, are:

"Frank Darvall, 33 years old, who serves as deputy director of the section. Darvall has a master's degree from Columbia University and is the author of books and articles on the United States. His wife is an American. Before the war he was an official of the English-Speaking Union in Britain.

"Professor Basil Mathews, 61 years old, who also serves as deputy director. Holding a degree from Oxford, Mathews is the author of many books. Until the war he was serving as professor of Christian world relations at Boston University and Andover-Newton Theological Seminary. He is the only member of the staff of the American section who was in the British Ministry of Information during the last war.

"Arthur Hope-Jones, 28 years old, an economic historian and a research fellow at Christ College, Cambridge. Hope-Jones has studied in several colleges in the United States. His wife is an American.

"At the request of this correspondent, the American section prepared a list of activities which were undertaken by official propaganda agencies of the British Government in the last war and which are said to be banned under the existing policy. The list reads:

" '1. The dispatch to the United States of official lecturers.

" '2. Payment of the expenses to the United States of distinguished British visitors (at present only the members of diplomatic and consular services and of various purchasing missions have their expenses paid out of public funds).

" '3. The dispatch of propaganda leaflets to large American mailing lists.

" '4. The issuance of news, pictures, etc., by British agents in the United States and efforts by these agents to persuade American newspapers and magazines to publish them.

" '5. The assembling for publication in the United States—or with that country largely in mind—of stories of enemy action which have an atrocity angle and are designed to create the maximum hostility toward Germany.

" '6. The maintenance in the United States of official representatives of British propaganda agencies.'

"BUT IN OTHER COUNTRIES

"Inquiry by this correspondent has produced another list covering activities which are being conducted today by the Ministry of Information in neutral countries other than the United States. The list reads:

"'1. The appointment of press attachés in the capitals of neutral countries and sometimes also in other cities of those countries.

"'2. Positive efforts through the press attachés and otherwise to provide free or at a nominal charge, articles, photographs, and so forth, to the press in those countries.

"'3. Dispatch of official lecturers, chiefly through the so-called "British Council" which is not allowed to function in or in relation to the United States.

"'4. The dispatch and exhibition of posters and other pictorial matter without waiting for local requests and in some cases at British public expense.

"'5. Special radio broadcasts in the language of the country concerned and planned with its needs in mind—through British short-wave broadcasts, including those to the Empire, which can be and are picked up in the United States.

"'6. The dispatch of films, including newsreels, without waiting for requests—in some cases through other than normal commercial channels and where commercially there would be no justification for showing the films.'"

PETERSON EXPOSES SECRECY

No one can be properly versed in the story of our involvement in the World War without reading the excellent book Propaganda for War by Prof. H. C. Peterson, of the University of Oklahoma. He shows the real story. I desire to note two brief excerpts as to the secrecy of that propaganda:

"BRITISH PROPAGANDA ORGANIZATIONS

"The operations of Wellington House were kept amazingly secret from Englishmen as well as Americans. When the Prime Minister was asked about the activities of Mr. Masterman, he replied that the latter was 'continuing certain work which he was requested by the Government to undertake at the beginning of the war. The work is of a highly confidential nature, and much of its efficiency depends upon its being conducted in secret * * *.' Even many officials in the English Government did not realize that there was such a thing as British propaganda."

"STIMSON SAYS NO PROPAGANDA IN EVIDENCE

"When questioned as to the use of propaganda in the United States, Col. Henry Stimson, Secretary of War, said:

"'I have not come in contact with a single instance of propaganda.'

"Certainly the Secretary had read the papers, had some contact with the outside world. His statement must have given Lord Lothian and all other English propagandists much satisfaction. It is just what they are working for. They want to give America propaganda but do not want America to believe it to be such. It is in that group there is danger. The job, as Rogerson said, of having propaganda properly applied, must have worked with some.

"Could Secretary Stimson be in 1940 as the English officials were in 1917, that he did not recognize there was such a thing as British propaganda?"

Continuing Professor Peterson's exposé, I quote:

"Perhaps the most interesting procedure of this particular organization was its system of exploiting the friendships and business connections of leading Britishers. It obtained lists of important Americans who had dealings with people in England and sent propaganda to them. The Americans naturally thought the material was from their friends in England. The committee's report states that by 'this means very many important communities—philosophical, educational, religious, scientific, philanthropic, artistic, legal, medical, commercial, industrial, mining, agricultural, engineering, banking, athletic, etc.—have been reached.'"

"COVER UP THEIR TRACKS"

Sidney Rogerson has told us how in his book for the English series. It is interesting to note these passages:

"In the next war, as in the last, the result will probably depend upon the way in which the United States acts, and her attitude will reflect the reaction of her public to propaganda properly applied."

And he says further:

"For some time the issue as to which side the United States would take hung in the balance and if the final result was a credit to our propaganda, we were helped by the carelessness of the Germans. They continually overreached themselves and, with all their native tendency to overorganization, forgot to cover up their tracks. Their propaganda was as obvious as it was energetic."

That is the real story behind much of this protest against the statement that we are being propagandized by England. They want to be certain that they are covering up their tracks.

Later, Mr. Rogerson, in his book after discussing the "substratum of suspicion of Great Britain in the United States" and how much of this had been eliminated says:

"At the moment we have a strong section of American opinion against us, but if war were to break out tomorrow between England and Germany this mass of opinion would have to come down on one side or the other and it will be marvelous indeed if German propaganda could succeed in bringing it down on theirs.

"In general the situation in the United States is more favorable to Great Britain than in 1914, in that the obvious centers of infection have been removed, but less favorable in that we have temporarily at any rate lost caste as a 'democratic' state because of the propaganda which represents us as truckling to, or at least having truck with 'dictators.' Though we are not unfavorably placed, we shall require to do much propaganda to keep the United States benevolently neutral. To persuade her to take our part will be much more difficult, so difficult as to be unlikely to succeed. It will need a definite threat to America, a threat, moreover, which will have to be brought home by propaganda to every citizen, before the Republic will again take arms in an external quarrel. The position will naturally be considerably eased if Japan were involved, and this might and probably would bring America in without further ado. At any rate, it would be a natural and obvious object of our propagandists to achieve this, just as during the Great War they succeeded in embroiling the United States with Germany.

"Fortunately, with America our propaganda is on firm ground. We can be entirely sincere, as our main plank will be the old democratic one. We must clearly enunciate our belief in the democratic form of government and our firm resolve to adhere to it."

PARKER TELLS HOW

Sir Gilbert Parker has written how the English propaganda was given to the United States from 1914 to 1917. It is worth repeating:

"Perhaps here I may be permitted to say a few words concerning my own work, since the beginning of the war. It is in a way a story by itself, but I feel justified in writing one or two paragraphs about it. Practically since the day war broke out between England and the Central Powers I became responsible for American publicity. I need hardly say that the scope of my department was very extensive, and its activities widely ranged. Among the activities was a weekly report to the British Cabinet on the state of American opinion, and constant touch with the permanent correspondents of American newspapers in England. I also frequently arranged for important public men in England to act for us by interviews in American newspapers; and among these distinguished people were Mr. Lloyd George, the present Prime Minister, Viscount Grey, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Bonar Law, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Edward Carson, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Walter Runciman, the Lord Chancelor, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Lord Cromer, Will Crooks, Lord Curzon, Lord Gladstone, Lord Haldane, Mr. Henry James, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. Selfridge, Mr. Zangwill, Mrs. Humphry Ward, and fully a hundred others.

"Among other things, we supplied 360 newspapers in the smaller States of the United States with an English newspaper, which gives a weekly review and comment of the affairs of the war. We established connection with the man in the street through cinema pictures of the Army and Navy, as well as through interviews, articles, pamphlets, etc.; and by letters in reply to individual American critics, which were printed in the chief newspapers of the State in which they lived, and were copied in newspapers of other and neighboring States. We advised and stimulated many people to write articles; we utilized the friendly services and assistance of confidential friends; we had reports from important Americans constantly, and established association, by personal correspondence, with influential and eminent people of every profession in the United States, beginning with university and college presidents, professors, and scientific men, and running through all the ranges of the population. We asked our friends and correspondents to arrange for speeches, debates, and lectures by American citizens, but we did not encourage Britishers to go to America and preach the doctrine of entrance into the war. Besides an immense private correspondence with individuals, we had our documents and literature sent to great numbers of public libraries, Y. M. C. A. societies, universities, colleges, historical societies, clubs, and newspapers.

"It is hardly necessary to say that the work was one of extreme difficulty and delicacy, but I was fortunate in having a wide acquaintance in the United States and in knowing that a great many people had read my books and were not prejudiced against me. I believe that the American people could not be driven, preached to, or shoved into the war, and that when they did enter it would be the result of their own judgment and not the result of exhortation, eloquence, or fanatical pressure of Britishers."

THE PEOPLE SHOULD HAVE FACTS

Now, after reading it, do you not see the same methods being used in 1939 and 1940?

Sir Gilbert said in 1917 that the work was "one of extreme difficulty and delicacy." It is more so in 1940. Rogerson had stated that the great mistake of German propaganda was that they had failed "to cover up their tracks."

Lord Lothian wants to be sure that American sentiment does not become persuaded that it is being maneuvered into involvement. He is exercising all care that the people cannot trace back these propaganda attempts to England.

Why should our own people fight an investigation of all foreign propaganda in America? Why should high Government officials fight the move to give the people of our country the truth about this drive to get us into the war?

American boys who have to die in war should know the story of the attempt to involve us in the battle. They should know it now, not 20 years later as they lie in the beds of the veterans' hospitals.

Wanted: An Oregon Coast National Park

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following story written by Richard L. Neuberger in the Oregonian of July 14, 1940, entitled, "Wanted: An Oregon Coast National Park." Mr. Neuberger has detailed the reasons for creation of this new national park in Oregon, legislation for which is being sponsored by Oregon's senior Senator, the Honorable CHARLES L. MCNARY. Mr. Neuberger's story follows:

[From the Oregonian (Portland, Oreg.) of July 14, 1940]

WANTED: AN OREGON COAST NATIONAL PARK—PROPOSED PLAYGROUND TAKES IN 30,000 ACRES IN CURRY COUNTY—SENATOR CHARLES L. MCNARY HAS INTRODUCED BILL TO ESTABLISH PARK—WILDERNESS COULD BE TURNED INTO RECREATIONAL AREA SECOND TO NONE

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

White men first saw Oregon from the sea. Four centuries ago a Spanish mariner, Bartolome Ferrelo, sailed north of the forty-second parallel and from the poop deck of his frigate sighted a majestic coast line.

Capes jutted into the ocean like huge paws. Grim headlands frowned down on the water, Mediterranean-blue, where it dashed against the rocks. Breakers greeted the silent wilderness with a dull roar. Grassy swales and dark hills framed the horizon. Fir trees fringed the ridges. Here and there the verdure was pocked with broad meadows.

This spectacle that the swarthy navigator saw is still to be seen, outliving the maritime dominance of the country which discovered it. Today it is the most impressive stretch of seacoast along the western rim of the United States. Nothing between Puget Sound and the Mexican border matches it. Soon it may be the major national park in the Nation bordering exclusively on the ocean.

America has many great national parks, and practically all of them are in mountain and upland regions. They enshrine lofty peaks, deep canyons, and tumbling waterfalls. The two newest parks are also of this type—the Olympic Peninsula Park, just west of Puget Sound, and the Kings Canyon Park in the high Sierras of California.

The Oregon Coast National Park would be virtually unique. Now only two parks touch either ocean. A narrow strip of the Olympic Park has been extended to the Pacific, and the small Acadia Park in Maine encompasses some beaches which border on the Atlantic. The Oregon park would take precedence over both of these in the magnitude of its seacoast vistas.

The proposed park has been tentatively outlined to include 30,000 acres of land in Curry County, which forms the extreme southwest corner of the State. It would be approximately 21 miles long and 4 miles wide at the broadest point. It would start just south of the town of Gold Beach, and would end slightly north of the town of Brookings, which is only 6 miles from the Oregon-California interstate boundary.

This is the story of a motor-log trip to the area which may become a Federal playground for people from all over America. The motor-log, sponsored by the Oregonian and the Oregon State Motor Association, numbered as travelers Wallace Sprague, secretary of the Oregon Statesman; Ralph Gifford, photographer for the Oregon State Highway Commission; Glen O. Stevenson, landscape architect for the State department of parks, and the writer of this article.

An unofficial participant in the journey was Sam H. Boardman, the veteran State superintendent of parks, who went along as far as Gold Beach. There he met Miss Harlean James of the American Civic and Planning Association, one of the country's noted authorities on national parks, and conveyed her about the area by car. While he did this, the rest of us invaded the wilderness portions on foot. Mr. Boardman spent the evenings listening to the Republican National Convention on the radio, while we doused our creaking joints with rubbing alcohol.

The national parks of the United States are inspiring to see. The Grand Canyon and Yosemite Falls make the heart beat faster. The one criticism of these magnificent regions is that there is not sufficient recreational activity to keep the average American occupied. The contemplated Oregon Coast Park would remedy this deficiency if any park could. It would have virtually all the recreational facilities available in the outdoors.

There would be surf bathing, of course. At several places the slopes level out into enough flat land to make a golf links possible. The ocean is generally smooth and tranquil and boating would be safe. Easy trails would be suitable both for hiking and horseback riding. Beaches and grassy hillsides would make ideal spots for picnicking. Above the steep headlands are open areas where hotels, inns, tourist cabins, tennis courts, and other structures might be built.

The proposed park is ribbed with numerous creeks. Some of these splash off the capes and empty almost directly into the ocean. Several waterfalls plummet right onto the sand. A few miles north of the park the Rogue River rushes out of the highlands. This is a fisherman's Canaan. Beyond the edges of the park are dales and forests dotted with deer tracks; no hunting is allowed within the borders of national parks.

Mighty convolutions of the earth occurred when the seacoast of Curry County originally was twisted and buckled into existence. Then the ocean went to work. For countless epochs the Pacific clawed at the shore with talons of white-capped water. Breakers bit into the rocks and wore down hillsides. Trees and foliage began to mat the ridges. Where the sea had snapped most sharply, caves and natural bridges appeared.

This was the scene that awaited Ferrelo, when his ship the Victoria stood offshore in 1542. This was the scene that awaited us, on our recent pilgrimage to Curry County. And this is the scene which awaits Americans who eventually will visit the Oregon Coast National Park. The park may not be established immediately, but it is definitely next on the list of areas to be added to the country's far-flung park domain.

We reached the region easily. In the white motoring car of the motor association, we drove down the picturesque coast highway to Gold Beach. We ensconced ourselves at the Sunset Inn, ate a steak dinner and prepared to trek into the seacoast area. "You fellows better get to bed early," warned Sam Boardman with a suspicious twinkle in his blue eyes. "You may have quite a walk tomorrow." We thought he said this a little sanctimoniously, in view of the fact that his own inspection would be done in the automobile.

From the tiny hamlet of Carpenterville, 1,700 feet above the ocean, we trudged all the way down to the sea. Going down was not so bad.

The beach near Whale's Head and Cape Ferrelo on which we finally found ourselves was an ideal spot. Crags hemmed it in on both sides. Behind us the hill loomed up almost perpendicularly. Caves, natural bridges, and grotesque rock formations were legion. Wally Sprague observed that it was a perfect smugglers' cove; and so it was. One could almost imagine cutlass-wearing seafarers hauling loot out of boats concealed behind those majestic promontories.

Down to the beach a brook trickled, pausing once in a bathtub-like pool and then making the final drop to the sea. We gobbled sandwiches and drank the coffee Stevenson had concocted in a battered can, and wondered how civilization had passed by so idyllic a scene. The tortured rocks, looming in grotto formations above the tossing sea, were like the background of some painting by Maxfield Parrish. Out in the ocean, waves swirled against offshore rocks and now and then shot skyward in tall geysers.

Slowly the sun made its hegira across the heavens. The time had come for us to leave. Gifford, who had shot dozens of pictures, hoisted the heavy photographic equipment into his pack. The other knapsack was picked up by Stevenson. The tripod and camera case were carried by Wally Sprague. Your correspondent packed the extra roll of films. Thus burdened, we set out. Somehow, going back was not as easy as coming down had been. The grass on the slopes was dry and slippery and we longed for crampons.

TORTURED ROCKS FORM MANY GROTTOS NEAR SEA

Up a narrow gully we trudged, and then across a green swale. The fir-mantled hills were before us now, and we started up them. The ocean receded in the distance. The hills became steeper. Still we kept on. Had we come this far in the morning? Gifford's heavy pack was bogging him down. Your correspondent seized the roll of films more firmly and refused to let anyone share the burden. The sun touched the western horizon and we yet had not attained the summit. When at last we reached Carpenterville, we vowed that all the wilderness is not in the mountains and that plenty of it is along the seacoast.

After buying all the soda pop in the community and reluctantly permitting Sprague to purchase a pound of goat's milk cheese, we returned to Gold Beach. Your correspondent, with ruined trousers, aching joints, stiff muscles, dirty face, and tousled hair, was dragged through the lobby of the Sunset Inn and up to his room. Several children, frightened at the apparition, were soothed by the placid Mr. Boardman, who sat calmly in a wicker rocking chair, not in the least fatigued from his long automobile ride.

After wrapping ourselves around double T-bones, supplemented with hot biscuits and blackberry pie, we took stock of the situation and decided that not only would the Oregon coast area make an excellent national park, but that it has an excellent chance to become a national park. Occasionally national park controversies drag on for years. The Grand Canyon National Park, for example, was first proposed in 1887, yet did not develop into a reality until 1910.

More favorable circumstances confront the Oregon coast park. A bill providing for a national park along the coast of Curry County, not to exceed 30,000 acres in size, has been introduced by Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, Oregon's distinguished senior Senator. His measure has been approved by Secretary Harold L. Ickes and other officials of the Department of the Interior, according to A. E. Demaray, Acting Director of the National Park Service. "In my opinion," adds Demaray, "it is altogether fitting to give the Nation another national park in the magnificent region under consideration."

Violent bickering has shaken recent efforts to establish new parks. The Washington State Planning Council claimed the new Olympic park would fortify too much timber. The California Legislature protested that the Kings Canyon park would lock up valuable mineral and water resources. Ranchers in Idaho and eastern Oregon are afraid that a park at Hell's Canyon would starve the grazing industry by taking the high pastures out of use. Settlers on the Hoh and Queets Rivers are now claiming that extension of the Olympic park will root them out of their homes.

SMALL IN COMPARISON TO OTHER PARKS

The Oregon Coast Park, however, is menaced by none of this grumbling. The park would encompass comparatively little land of economic importance. And it would be only 30,000 acres in extent, as contrasted with the 452,000 acres of Kings Canyon and 898,000 acres of the Olympic. There is scarcely any local objection to the idea. Governor Charles A. Sprague favors the proposal. Nor is the scheme confused by the long-standing and extremely bitter dispute between the National Park Service and the United States Forest Service.

This dispute has intruded into nearly every attempt to create new parks. This is because the bulk of the new parks have been areas taken from the jurisdiction of the Forest Service and placed under the sovereignty of the Park Service. Rivalry has been intense. The Oregon coast area, although only a short distance west of the Siskiyou National Forest, is not within the forest proper. Thus the controversy between the two Government Bureaus is escaped.

STRATEGIC REGION MIDWAY BETWEEN COLUMBIA, GOLDEN GATE

Sam Boardman estimates it would cost in the neighborhood of $500,000 to buy out the private land holdings in the park area. This includes the upper slopes and the meadows above the capes. The tidal lands along the ocean, thanks to precautions taken many years ago by Oswald West when he was governor, belong to the State of Oregon. For half a million dollars, Boardman believes the National Government can acquire a playground of matchless grandeur.

The region is strategically located. It is midway between the Columbia River and the Golden Gate on the coast highway. The speedometer on the motorlog car showed 315 miles from Portland to Gold Beach. It is approximately that distance from Gold Beach to San Francisco. The new bridges on the coast highway, spanning bays and inlets formerly navigated by ferry boats, have made the road one of the main thoroughfares along the Pacific slope. Certainly it is the most picturesque thoroughfare, now clinging to massive headlands, now winding through dense forests. Its beauty is varied and eternal.

The climate is mild. The Acadia Park on the Maine seacoast is ice-locked in winter. Snow is an oddity in Curry County, at least along the ocean. Rainfall is about 60 inches annually. This is less than half the colossal 126 inches of rainfall which drench the western slopes and ridges of the Olympic National Park. Not a drop of rain disturbed our 4 days in the park area. On only one of those days was the ocean shrouded in fog. The rest of the time the weather was clear and sharp, outlining the cliffs and ridges in sharp relief.

The new park in the Sierras is called the John Muir-Kings Canyon Park, and perhaps the name of Sam Boardman should be linked with the Oregon coast park. It is his idea. Sam, who looks something like the late F. A. Silcox, beloved Chief of the Forest Service, is white-haired and easy-going. As are all men who love the woods and open spaces, he is a zealot. Setting aside wilderness areas and scenic plots in State and Federal parks is a crusade with him. He believes the $500,000 put up for the coast park would be an investment in the future, the establishing of a heritage for the people of succeeding generations.

WRITER HAS GOOD WORD FOR THE PROJECT

A requirement of any complete national park is that part of it be adaptable to preservation in its original untouched condition. The Curry County seacoast meets this prerequisite. Glen Stevenson says that the coves and beaches which we visited might remain as a primeval area, while the gentler slopes on both sides could be penetrated by roads and wide trails. The core of the coast park could be a patch of frontier. This, in turn, would be surrounded by areas developed for scenic and recreational purposes.

Harlean James, author of The Romance of the National Parks and numerous other books, is one of the main forces in the American conservation movement. She was the principal lobbyist for the vast park on the Olympic peninsula. Evidently Sam Boardman's tour of the Curry County seacoast convinced her that the Oregon park requires her attention, too.

"Oregon has been wise," Miss James wired the Oregonian last week, "in securing for public use a greater proportion of its ocean frontage than any other State. The southern Oregon coast of high headlands, virgin forests, and sandy beaches should offer a fine opportunity for a national seashore park." Incidentally, the national park would be directly adjacent to the small but picturesque State park on the rocky crest of Cape Sebastian.

The journey ended, we headed toward home. Our car twisted around the shore line near the mouth of the Rogue and we looked back. In row on row, capes forked out to sea. They resembled the prows of monstrous dreadnoughts. In the soft light of the late afternoon ocean and hillsides blended. The headlands Ferrelo had seen in 1542 and Drake had seen three decades later were tall and stern. Guardians of the Oregon country, they lifted their tree-cloaked summits toward the sky. Perhaps this scene, we thought, may soon be a landmark familiar to the multitude of our countrymen who each year pilgrimage to the national parks of the far West.

Democratic National Convention

OF
HON. SAM RAYBURN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, OF ALABAMA

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the gentleman from Alabama, Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, as temporary chairman, Democratic National Convention, Chicago, Ill., July 15, 1940:

Mr. Chairman and fellow Democrats, I am, of course, very deeply and profoundly grateful for the honor and privilege of being named as temporary chairman of this great convention. It is a great personal gratification to be introduced by the man who has been of such inestimable value and service to the Democratic Party for two terms as our national chairman, and who likewise has served with great success, ability, and distinction as Postmaster General of the United States—your friend and mine, the Honorable James A. Farley.

It is a heartening and inspiring spectacle to look out upon this vast assemblage of the representatives of the Democratic Party of our Nation, as well as the thousands of loyal guests who will be so deeply interested in our actions and deliberations. We are justified in our loyalty and devotion to a great political party, which, over a period of years almost as great as the life of our Republic itself, in victory or defeat, in power or removed from power, has, during all the decades of its existence, proclaimed its allegiance to that fundamental political maxim announced by Thomas Jefferson, "equal rights to all men and special privileges to none." That means, in essence, that our party in the ancient days as well as on this night, believes in and fights for the basic and irreducible human rights of the American citizen. We are here assembled to pledge renewed allegiance to that cherished creed, and to send forth to the people the assurance that if continued in power we shall not depart from the faith of our fathers.

Under our system of government, it is just and equitable for the electorate to judge, and to reward or punish a national party, not upon the basis of its platform promises alone, but strictly upon the record of its performance and accomplishments as an instrumentality of public service. It is my purpose to make that principle the straightedge and yardstick of this address.

If we do not gravely misapprehend the present temper and disposition of the American people, they are now in no mood to be moved or influenced by petty and vindictive exaggerations of issues or events that are of no vital concern to the safety and security of the United States of America as possibly the last surviving outpost of democracy upon the face of the earth. The minds of the American people are now so deeply engrossed in matters of grave and profound concern with reference to the preservation of our established order of life and institutions, that they will have no tolerance for the superficial banalities of politics. An election must be held, but aside from legitimate discussions of the records of the two parties and their candidates and platforms, the major objective of both parties must be unity and solidarity of purpose in preserving inviolate the structure of our Government and the perpetual freedom of its people.

We all recognize that ours is a government by political parties and that, as instrumentalities of government, they are entitled to the largest possible measure of freedom in carrying legitimately disputed issues to the people. But such issues should be fairly presented. They should be clothed in the garments of truth and tolerance and reason. Neither our party nor the opposition can, in terrible times like these, profit by a departure from this principle.

THE RECORD OF ROOSEVELT'S ADMINISTRATION

The Democratic Party has now been in absolute control of the Government for 7½ years. In order to get back to the postulate of party responsibility to the people and in order that the people might have a fair basis of appraisal as to whether or not we have done, on the whole, a good or an evil job under that responsibility, it is just and even necessary to look back to the conditions which prevailed in our social and economic status when, under the overwhelming mandate of the American people, a Democratic administration took charge of the Government on March 4, 1933. I think it is proper that it be said, in all candor, that none of us who have had part in formulating and administering the policies that have been enacted into law under this administration can justly claim that no mistakes have been made. Temporary errors in policy and in the administration of policies were inevitable in undertaking to cure and correct a situation that had attained the phase of national disaster and social and economic chaos. It is too much to hope that there will ever be infallibility in the arena of political action and the American people fully understand the fairness and justice of that statement.

No other administration in peacetimes since the establishment of the Republic had ever confronted such a desperate situation as that which we inherited on March 4, 1933, nor one which called for the instant exercise of greater genius of leadership and courage. It was without precedent in its forebodings of disaster to our democratic institutions. The American people have not forgotten that period of total collapse and desperation in all branches of human endeavor.

A decent respect for your indulgence will not permit me to attempt a detailed synopsis of the outstanding legislation that the Democratic Party has enacted into law to meet the staggering social and economic conditions which we had inherited. The people themselves are now familiar with the operations and purposes of that program.

The first heroic remedy adopted was to declare a national bank holiday which involved the temporary closing of our National and State banks which, until more adequate security for them could be obtained, was a most effective remedy against the total collapse of the entire banking system of our people, although, unfortunately, many thousands of them had already closed their doors, bringing heartbreak and immeasurable distress to millions of the American people.

Steps were then taken to provide for the reopening of the yet solvent banking institutions, and many hundreds of them and their depositors were saved. This administration enacted what, in my opinion, will forever be regarded as one of the major outstanding legislative achievements in our history, and that is the passage of the law guaranteeing the absolute safety of deposits up to $5,000 in all national banks and State banks which were affiliated with the Federal system and that constitutes 98 percent of all deposits. And, now, instead of the American people having constant and daily apprehension as to the safety of their savings and deposits, they can always be assured that if any of such banks, either through bad business management or corruption, closes its doors, that every single dime of their money will be paid to them across the teller's cage within 48 hours.

Recognizing the terrible truth that millions of our people had been robbed and defrauded out of their investments by an unbridled and unregulated system of corporate manipulation which permitted crooked promoters, stock jobbers, and holding-company tycoons, we passed the Securities and Exchange Commission Act under the operation of which those robbers of the people's investments are now checked, restrained, and regulated. We broke up for all time the ruthless and unconscionable holding companies allowed to flourish in all their ugly and wanton plundering of decent citizens under former Republican administrations. I wonder if any of you people in this section of the country recall the collapse of the billion Insull utility empire, and the devastation is brought to thousands of your hopes and homes?

We provided for the organization and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps, one of the most popular and successful instruments of government ever devised. It has acted not only as a medium of relief for the destitute families of millions of American youth but at the same time has been of inestimable value in conserving the natural resources of the country and of giving to these young men a fine system of moral and physical discipline which they would not otherwise ever have achieved.

When this administration took over the reins of power there were from twelve to fifteen million men and women of employable age without any opportunity whatsoever to secure jobs that would enable them to support themselves and their hungry and naked families. It would have been a heartless and cruel omission of duty to have been indifferent to their necessities. It would have shown a wanton and reckless indifference to the fundamental duties of a great democracy had we not taken adequate steps to feed and clothe and shelter these men, women, and children, our own people, who, without their fault, had been made the victims of the national catastrophe.

The Democratic administration has met that duty without fear and without wavering and, in addition thereto, contributed immeasurably to the permanent wealth of the Nation by the improvements and benefits that have resulted from its operation. Every single community in America has been prospered and benefited by this program and the expenditure of the Federal funds required to effectuate it. These are not fugitive and evanescent benefits, but they are tangible and enduring for future generations, who will praise our foresight in establishing them.

This administration conceived and set up for all time a humane and necessary program for the softening of the hardships of the aged and infirm of the rigors of illness and the despair of unemployment and for the support of widows and dependent children and the blind.

We established, financed, and set up on a firm and enduring foundation the great Tennessee Valley Authority which, for all time, will furnish a great vehicle for the development and conservation of the commerce and resources of that great geographical area which it serves which will be a potential factor in flood control and navigation and which offers now ready assistance in our preparedness program for the manufacture of many of the essential ingredients of national defense.

As a yardstick for the control of excessive power and light rates, it has been largely instrumental in forcing the reduction of charges to consumers in the United States of $500,000,000 since its construction. We have taken the position that the waters in our rivers are the God-given heritage of the people and that private utility companies have no vested right to monopolize their exploitation.

We established and made actively effective, through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the possibility of saving hundreds of thousands of our most deserving citizens from the agony and ignominy of being evicted from their rooftrees and firesides. We have constructed innumerable slum-clearance projects, especially in the great cities, to provide decent homesteads for the poor and underprivileged, white and colored alike, and through the Federal Housing Administration have afforded credit and facilities to hundreds of thousands of our citizens to finance and build their own homes.

We have guaranteed for the first time in our history by law the basic principle of giving to labor in this country the right to organize and bargain with employers for the betterment of their wages and working conditions, and through the wage and hour law have assured to every man and woman who toils in the industries of the country a decent wage scale and fair hours of labor, and I predict here and now that the great masses of labor in this country, organized and unorganized, will, when they go to the polls next November, not forget that the Democratic Party has been their friend and not their oppressor.

Upon that partial record of social and economic legislative action, we propose to wage the coming battle without any spirit of timeserving or apology, but, upon the contrary, with an agressive justification of the record of this Democratic administration.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM

We have now had opportunity to examine the Republican platform adopted at Philadelphia, which is supposed to represent the deliberate judgment of the best minds in the Republican Party. If that be the case, it reminds me of an incident that occurred in a southern border State during the 1896 Presidential campaign, when, as you remember, the vital issue was free silver versus the gold standard. A certain shrewd old politician was running for reelection. He was to make a speech in a community where he was very doubtful as to the sentiment of the people on that issue. During the course of his speech, he was pressed many times by a bewhiskered spectator in the crowd to define his views on the money question, and finally, seeing that he was driven to make an answer, he replied: "My friend has asked me to state my position on the money question, and I will do it with entire frankness and without equivocation whatever and here it is. I believe in the gold standard. I believe in the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. I believe in a large circulation of greenback money, and a right smart little sprinkling of counterfeit." The Frank committee and their platform committee were in labor a long long time, and they finally brought forth a weasel.

It is a document filled with equivocation and political subterfuge, but the most remarkable significance of that platform is the fact that despite their clamorous and bitter denunciation of the legislative program of this administration, they did not have the confidence or courage to demand the repeal or abolition of any single one of the major laws we have passed for liberal government and a better state of life for the masses of the American people. No greater compliment could be paid to the wisdom and soundness of the legislative and executive program of this administration. How can the Republican Party go before the electorate in November, urging the removal from power of that party whose wisdom and progressive policies they were compelled, even if by indirection, to endorse.

In national conventions heretofore there has been a vast amount of pointing with pride and viewing with alarm, but at Philadelphia, while there was much viewing with alarm, there was no pointing with pride, for the obvious reason that they could remember nothing at which to point. That platform is a perfect example of the aphorism that "language was invented to conceal thoughts."

FARM PROGRAM

It is contended by Republican leaders that the farmers of the country will not support our party in November on the basis of the record of this administration. I refute that assertion. I do it because those farmers are men of intelligence and with a high capacity for the appraisal of legislative action as it affects their personal and community welfare. At the end of a Hoover administration, the farmers of America had on their hands an unprecedented panic and the Hoover Farm Board. The effects of the panic were immeasurable and the results of such Farm Board activities were worse, as our farmers will remember.

They also well remember the prices they were receiving for their products in that fateful hour. Since we came into power we have progressively enacted for their benefit the soil and water conservation program; the lowest farm interest rates in our entire history; the benefits of rural electrification of their homes; marketing agreements; commodity loans; research into new uses and new markets; the stamp plan for distribution of surplus commodities; the long-range farm-tenant program whereby such tenants may acquire, under reasonable terms, and on long payments, the benefits of owning their own homes; and the immeasurable benefits to them of the policy of parity payments. I particularly call to the attention of the farmers of this country the attitude of the Republicans in Congress with reference to the parity-payment program, and remember that this was a direct and vital issue as to whether or not the Government should undertake by this means to equalize, at least in part, the prices which the farmers secured for their products as compared to the cost of their production, or the things they had to buy in the open market.

On March 28, 1939, the House of Representatives, on a vote to appropriate $250,000,000 to provide for such parity payments, the Democrats voted for the proposition, 168, and Republicans voted for, 20, and against, 135. On May 9 of this year the vote on the proposal for $212,000,000 for parity payments to farmers was for, Democrats 183, Republicans for, 22, and against, 131. You there have a concrete example of the deep and abiding interest which the Republican membership of the House took upon this most vital question for the benefit of agriculture. By their votes shall ye know them.

DEMOCRATIC WORLD PEACE PROGRAM

One of the most remarkable, as well as discreditable, efforts ever made by a political party to fabricate out of the whole cloth and without a shred of evidence to support it is the charge of some Republican leaders that the Democratic Party and administration are attempting slyly and covertly to lead the United States into the shambles of a foreign war.

I here and now denounce that calumny, and assert that not only is this Administration opposed absolutely to a participation in any European war, but, upon the contrary, both the President and our able Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, and a Democratic Congress have done everything possible within the bounds of reason not only to preserve peace in Europe and in the entire world, but to so conduct our foreign relations that every precaution would be taken to keep us out of involvement in a foreign war. He has especially and consistently addressed his activities to the consolidation of that policy in this hemisphere, and especially with our sister republics in Latin America.

When the President signed the first neutrality resolution on August 31, 1935, he did so with this statement:

"I have approved this joint resolution because it was intended as an expression of the fixed desire of the Government and the people of the United States to avoid any action which might involve us in war. The policy of the Government is definitely committed to the maintenance of peace and the avoidance of any entanglements which would lead us into conflict."

The only so-called meddling in European affairs by the Executive has been based entirely upon an appeal for the preservation of peace against the spread of war, and in behalf of humanity and adherence to treaty obligations and international law. As the head of a great peace-loving Republic, and as a great humanitarian, he could have done no less. Just a few days ago, on Wednesday of last week, he sent a memorable message to the Congress in which he specifically and definitely gave this assurance of policy to the American people, and I quote his language:

"That we are opposed to war is known not only to every American, but to every government in the world. We will not use our arms in the way of aggression; we will not send our men to take part in European wars."

In addition to all this, he called a special session of Congress last year after the war broke out in Europe, recommended, and the Democratic Party passed, amendments to the existing neutrality law which prohibited the shipment in American vessels of cargoes into the waters of the belligerent nations, which, if it had not been done, would doubtless long before this have inevitably drawn us into the conflict for the same reasons which induced America to go to war against the Central Powers in 1917. On the vote in the House of Representatives on this most vital proposal for keeping out of the European war, on the final roll call on the conference report of the neutrality bill, there were, yeas, Democrats 223, Republicans 18; nays, Democrats 29, Republicans 141.

SHADOW OF HITLER

My fellow countrymen, we are assembled at the most fateful moment in the history of mankind. The sinister shadow of a cruel, savage, and ruthless despotism hangs like a pall of doom over the homes and the lives of every citizen of democratic and liberty-loving peoples. Already this juggernaut of physical force and brutal power has laid its blighting hand upon the freedom and sovereignty of eight small and defenseless nations, and now France also lies in the agony and ashes of the totalitarian destruction, and only Great Britain alone stands against the hurricane of the "blitzkrieg." And now Hitler and Mussolini have sworn her total annihilation. They have furthermore sworn eternal enmity against all so-called decadent democracries, and that includes us.

I do not know what attitude this convention may take on that subject, but I know that it is the attitude of the American people that we will resist to the death any compromise of our democratic principles with those malignant disturbers of the peace of the world; that we do not propose to appease those aggressors whose doctrines wage war upon every sacred principle of liberty for a free people that our Declaration of Independence proclaimed and our Federal Constitution preserved.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

I now propose to expose another flagrant piece of Republican propaganda by which they are endeavoring during this campaign, as they have already done, to make the American people believe that this administration has been indifferent to and neglectful of the necessary steps to prepare and make instantly available an adequate system of national defense at sea, on land, and in the air. National defense is a sacred trust. When a matter involving the safety of our beloved country is at stake we should all be united, both Democrats and Republicans, because we are all Americans. In critical times such as these we should be thinking less of the political differences that divide us and more of the national interests that unite us. Until the invasion just 2 months ago of Norway, Belgium, Denmark, and the Netherlands, how many of us realized the full portent of events overseas? Prior to that invasion, I heard no Republicans urging a national-defense program such as we have now launched. During the 12 years of Republican administration the national-defense record was one of continual retrogression. During the 11-year period between 1922, the year of the Washington Arms Conference, and 1934, the year following Democratic charge of Government, they laid down a total of only 35 combatant ships. During the last 3 years of the Hoover administration not one single vessel of war was laid down by our Government. During this administration there has been laid down, up to June 1940, 8 new battleships, 12 new cruisers, 2 new aircraft carriers, 65 new destroyers, and 36 new submarines, a grand total of 153 new units in 7 years, as contrasted with 35 new units under the 12-year Republican regime.

This Congress has, in addition, authorized 267 ships of war to give us a two-ocean Navy, a sea force of such magnitude and power, including its air force, as will make reasonably certain our continued dominance of this hemisphere and the perpetuation of our cherished institutions.

When we came into power the authorized strength of our standing army had been reduced to 118,000 men. During this administration it has been constantly increased until the present authorized enlisted strength of the Army is 375,000 men and the National Guard 251,000. Our air force has been increased in like proportion, with the ultimate objective, if necessary, of 50,000 planes, manned by the most efficient flyers on the face of the earth. That, my friends, is the cold record. Let the opposition make the most of it.

THE ENEMY WITHIN

There has been presented a summary of our program for a tremendous increase in our defense against an enemy from overseas. But such danger is not the only menace to our national security. There is abundant proof that lurking within the shadows of our Government's edifice, laying their mischievous plans at the opportune time to sap and mine it, or to put the red torch of revolution and disunion against our democratic form of government, are those forces of evil, now commonly called the "fifth column." No one knows how great are their numbers, but evidence already produced shows that they run into tens of thousands, all of them sworn enemies of our form of government. However great or small may be their number, there is no place in the United States for a single one of them to abide in freedom. Congressional legislation has already been enacted and approved by the President providing every possible restraint upon and punishment of these enemies of our institutions that could be devised within the limits of our Constitution.

* * * * * * *

At the conclusion of his speech to the recent Republican Convention at Philadelphia former President Hoover posed this question: "Republicans, are you ready to fight?" No such question will be propounded to the Democrats of this convention or those of the country. We began to fight in the election of 1932; we carried on the battle in 1936 to a magnificent victory, and we are already enlisted for the duration of the coming conflict to preserve to the people the advances we have made in liberal government for the benefit and protection of the average man. Fighting by our side will again be millions of Republicans and independent voters who have forever forsworn allegiance to the forces of reaction.

SPIRITUAL REDEDICATION

Sentiments and emotions and alarms of profound significance are stirring the minds and hearts of the American people as a result of the welter and destruction of the foreign wars, and they are in deep apprehension of the dangers to our own processes of liberty. We can all somehow sense and feel a new consecration to the priceless patrimony bequeathed to us by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, and their associates in a time remote. It is an indefinable patriotic incursion that is touching the souls of men here in our country. While this is no time or place for one to invoke the prerogatives of an ecclesiastic, I venture far enough to assert that there is no armament so potent and enduring as that of the observance of moral, spiritual, and religious obligations of a great people. Without that sanctuary, there can be no perpetuation of the decencies and securities of any type of civilization. With that Great Comforter as shield and buckler, our wealth, our power, our preparedness, our love of liberty will forever make America unconquered and unconquerable.

Power Plank in 1940 Democratic Platform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Republican Party, in their national convention, after solemn and deliberate consideration, named for their standard bearer Wendell L. Willkie, a utility executive. This is what might have been expected of the economic royalists who dominate the Republican Party and who stand for reactionary policies and ultra-conservative and monopolistic theories. The Republican nominee peculiarly and fittingly epitomizes concentrated wealth, selfish interests, corporation and utility control, and interests uniformly antagonistic to the public welfare. In this connection I wish to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD the plank in the Democratic platform on the subject of electric power. This declaration succinctly shows the long-established and the present illicit connection between the power monopoly and the Republican Party, and the firm and continuing purpose of the Democratic Party to use nationally owned water power for the benefit of all the people.

There being no objection, the plank was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELECTRIC POWER

During the past 7 years the Democratic Party has won the first major victories for the people of the Nation in their generation-old contest with the power monopoly.

These victories have resulted in the recognition of certain self-evident principles and the realization of vast benefits by the people. These principles, long opposed by the Republican Party, are:

That the power of falling water is a gift from God, and consequently belongs not to a privileged few but to all the people, who are entitled to enjoy its benefits;

That the people have the right through their Government to develop their own power sites and bring low-cost electricity to their homes, farms, and factories;

That public-utility holding companies must not be permitted to serve as the means by which a few men can pyramid stocks upon stocks for the sole purpose of controlling vast power empires.

We have condemned the Republican policies which permitted the victimizing of investors in the securities of private power corporations and the exploitation of the people by unnecessarily high utility costs.

We have condemned the opposition of utility power interests which delayed for years the development of national-defense projects in the Tennessee Valley, and which obstructed river-basin improvements and other public projects bringing low-cost electric power to the people.

The successful power developments in the Tennessee and Columbia River basins show the wisdom of the Democratic Party in establishing Government owned and operated hydroelectric plants in the interests of power and light consumers.

Through these Democratic victories whole regions have been revived and restored to prosperous habitation. Production costs have been reduced. Industries have been reestablished which employ men and capital. Cheaper electricity has brought vast economic benefits to thousands of homes and communities.

These victories of the people must be safeguarded. They will be turned to defeat if the Republican Party should be returned to power. We pledge our party militantly to oppose every effort to encroach upon the inherent right of our people to be provided with this primary essential of life at the lowest possible cost.

The nomination of a utility executive by the Republican Party as its Presidential candidate raises squarely the issue whether the Nation's water power shall be used for all the people or for the selfish interests of a few. We accept that issue.

National Agricultural Progress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ARTICLE FROM DEMOCRATIC DIGEST

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from The Democratic Digest for June–July 1940 entitled "National Agricultural Progress."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Democratic Digest of June–July 1940]

NATIONAL AGRICULTURAL PROGRESS

One of the very first problems attacked by the Roosevelt administration was the farm problem. Because the President knew that farm prosperity was vital to recovery, he called in agricultural leaders even before he reopened the banks. In two months' time, farm legislation was enacted and the farm program began to take shape.

Throughout the 7 years since, the farm program has continued to grow and develop. It has had striking results. There has been increased income to the farmers and higher price levels for their products. Their increased purchasing power has been a tremendous aid to business and employment in the cities. Millions of farmers have cooperated for the conservation of soil, water, and trees.

The program provides measures for the protection of foreign markets and the expansion of domestic markets. It provides assistance for unfortunate farm families needing opportunity to get a new start. It is building a permanent, more prosperous agriculture with long-range benefits not only for those on the land, but for the entire Nation.

FARM INCOME HIGHER

In New Deal years, cash farm income has increased about 65 percent, rising from $4,682,000,000 in 1932 to $7,711,000,000 in 1939. Including farm-benefit payments, the total was $8,518,000,000 in 1939. Cash income of the Nation's wheat producers at the end of 1939 had increased by 98 percent; cash income of cotton producers by 32 percent; tobacco growers by more than 100 percent; dairy farmers by 37 percent; and growers of meat animals by 95 percent.

PURCHASING POWER INCREASED

Farm prices as a whole increased 43 percent between 1932 and 1939, rising from 65 percent of the pre-World War level to 93 percent. Other prices also increased, but farm prices increased more proportionately, practically doubling the farmer's purchasing power.

In 1932, just before the New Deal took over, farmers were able to purchase only about 58 percent as much of city goods as they had in 1929. By 1939, their purchasing power had increased to 99 percent of the 1929 level.

REAL-ESTATE VALUES HIGHER

By 1938, the renewed earning power of farms, as measured by increased agricultural income, was reflected in a substantial increase in farm real-estate values. Total value of farm lands and buildings had increased by $5,000,000,000, $30,500,000,000 to $35,500,000,000.

Forced sales of farms declined 69 percent; voluntary sales increased 68 percent. Since 1930, the Nation's total farm-mortgage debt has been reduced by more than $2,000,000,000. Since 1933, the number of farm bankruptcies has decreased 76 percent.

CONSERVATION ADVANCED

Under the New Deal, conservation has made the greatest advance in the Nation's history, on cropland and in forest. This means not only conservation of soil, but of water essential for growth, and timber essential for protection.

Soil-conserving agreements cover about 82 percent of the Nation's cropland. Farmers cooperating with the Federal farm program all employ farming practices which build up rather than deplete their acres.

Soil Conservation Service operations are in progress on 6,000,000 acres of private land and 54,000,000 acres of public land. This is an intensive demonstration program to show farmers the most progressive methods of land use.

Forest conservation is one of the New Deal's proudest records. National forest-land area has increased two and one-half times as much as in the preceding 22 years. Forest Service nurseries have provided 125,000,000 trees for planting on 131,000 acres of national forest land. Eleven thousand miles of planting in the shelterbelt provide badly needed protection for 3,000,000 acres of land, a great success, although ridiculed at its outset. Fifty-five million trees were distributed for farm plantings from Federal-State cooperative nurseries.

The C. C. C. boys made a great permanent contribution to the wealth of the Nation's resources. Outstanding accomplishments include the planting of 2,000,000,000 trees, forestry improvement on 3,000,000 acres, erosion-control work on more than a million acres of farm land.

FARM PRODUCTION STABILIZED

Bridging the gap between surpluses and scarcity has been the outstanding aim of the New Deal farm program. All farmers have been encouraged to reduce acreage on crops on which the Nation had been producing an oversupply, and increase production of crops for which there was a greater need. Production on the whole has remained at approximately the 1924–29 average.

Stabilization has gone forward on many fronts:

The ever-normal granary provides for storage of reserves in good years for use in years of crop failure. It operates through (1) commodity storage loans and (2) crop insurance for wheat. In 1938, the wheat crop was unusually large, and about 80,000,000 bushels were stored under loans. Of the 1938 corn crop, 227,000,000 bushels were stored on farms under loans.

The Surplus Marketing program buys up the farm surpluses of perishable and semiperishable foods and uses them for distribution to needy city families. Since October 1933 this program has been responsible for the purchase and distribution of five and one-half billion pounds of surplus farm products. Part of this surplus went to the school-lunch program, providing free lunches daily to two and one-half million undernourished children. The recently introduced food-stamp plan routes the surplus food through commercial channels, making it possible for low-income families to obtain this food at its corner grocery. A low-cost milk program is also under way.

Surpluses other than foods, such as W. P. A. made cotton clothing, and the home-made mattress program, also help to bridge the gap between surplus and need.

The export-subsidy program protects United States producers' share of the world market by buying wheat, cotton, and corn at domestic prices and selling it to exporters at a price which enables them to sell on the world market.

Agricultural credit services: One of the essential elements necessary to agricultural stability and security is adequate credit at reasonable rates. This the New Deal has provided through the Farm Credit Administration. Since 1933, individual farmers and farm cooperatives have obtained almost $6,000,000,000 in loans and discounts from institutions under F. C. A. supervision.

FARM POVERTY ATTACKED

The extreme farm poverty of the depression had brought special problems to the dust and drought areas of the Midwest, the migratory workers' areas of the far West, and the sharecropper sections of the South. Farm poverty in general and these particular problems were attacked along the following lines:

Rehabilitation loans have been made to 600,000 farmers who were on relief or near relief status to assist them to again become self-supporting. These families have repaid nearly a third of the money loaned to them.

Debt adjustment has been made between more than 100,000 farmers and their creditors, scaling down debts totaling more than $300,000,000. This has enabled farmers to pay more than $4,500,000 in back taxes.

Homestead projects, now numbering 159, furnish homes to 14,000 low-income farm families.

Migratory camps will accommodate 13,000 families annually when the present program is completed.

The farm-tenancy program has provided loans for more than 13,000 tenant families to become owners. Written leases replacing vague oral agreements have been arranged for more than 130,000 tenant farmers.

Low cost medical care has been made available to more than 65,000 families in 26 States.

Community-service loans fostered almost 12,000 small cooperatives.

ELECTRICITY BROUGHT TO FARMS

Since the New Deal rural-electrification program began in 1935, 5,000,000 people on American farms have electric service newly at their command. Before R. E. A., 1 farm in 10 was served. Now 1 farm in 4 has electricity.

FARMERS ENDORSE NEW DEAL

The farm program has been attacked in the courts, in the press, and on the air. The enemies of the program have looked upon it as a good political target and attacked it for the sake of a political advantage. But try as they might, they were never able to turn the farmers against it, and farm support grew stronger. A recent poll showed 66 percent of the farmers in favor of the New Deal farm program.

Participation in the farm program increased from three million in 1934 to nearly six million in 1939. That's the farmers' answer to these attacks.

Farmers are still short of their goal of economic equality with other groups, but they now have, in the national farm program, the means for continued progress toward that goal.

Ireland's Neutrality

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM IRISH WORLD

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, in the great world war now raging in Europe there remains within the radius of the conflict one small democratic nation which is seeking to maintain its neutrality and preserve its peace. That nation is Ireland, concerning which much propaganda is now being spread in an attempt to justify an invasion by the British on the assumption that such strategy is necessary in order to protect England from a back-door invasion by Hitler through Ireland. Articles are appearing every day in this country seeking to misrepresent the facts and support the notion that a violation of Ireland's neutrality is essential for the protection of England.

A very able editorial appeared in the Irish World of Saturday, July 27, 1940, discussing this problem. This editorial demonstrates that there can be no justification for a violation of Ireland's neutrality by any of the belligerent powers in the present conflict. If such invasion occurs it will immediately result in dangerous political repercussions in this country.

I ask unanimous consent to have this editorial printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the information of the people of this country.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Irish World of July 27, 1940]

IRELAND'S NEUTRALITY

Of late, hardly a day passes without some newspaper reference to the possibility of Ireland's neutrality in the war between England and Germany being ended under pressure from one or the other or both.

The position is rendered more difficult by the fact that in the northeastern counties Irish territory is held to be part of the possession of one of the parties to the war, and so not neutral. That part of Ireland is held to be Irish, and to be defended as part of Ireland, if invaded. But it is held to be part of England in another sense, and the condition is made that help rendered by the rest of Ireland must be in the form of avowed support of England, which would mean the abandonment of neutrality. The alternative that England withdraw from northern Ireland, leaving Ireland to shoulder its own responsibilities as a unit, has been rejected.

The dangers resulting from this situation are three: The north of Ireland, as enemy country, might be invaded by the Germans. The Germans might invade neutral Ireland with a view to securing an advantage in its war on England. England might invade neutral Ireland from her own island or from the north of Ireland to secure advantages in the war against Germany.

Meantime, the prayer that comes in letters from Ireland is: "God send that the peace of this island may still be preserved."

It is evident that the rights of neutrals are not a safeguard to nations which occupy parts of the field of battle. Germany, as it happens, broke through neutral countries to get around and behind the defenses of France. War being what it is, no surprise would have been excited if the attack had been in the opposite direction, through the neutral countries to take the French and English Armies around and behind the German defenses. The mining of neutral Norwegian waters demonstrated that the will to overcome objection by a neutral was not lacking. What was lacking in the Norwegian instance was the power to give effect to the purpose. The power was not lacking when it came from the other direction through Holland and Belgium. The test of power is the only one accepted in war conditions.

Under that test, none of these countries could be certain of their neutrality, or the peace contingent on neutrality, being respected by both belligerents, between whom they stood. If one or other did not, peace must be at an end.

The question for Ireland, which only events can answer, is whether she stands in the way of the combatants to an extent that each has a war object in keeping the other out, and a consequent motive for getting in first. The entry of one would mean an end of that peace that goes with neutrality. The entry of the other, to contest the occupation, as happened in Norway, would bring even greater losses.

The feeling in England, a feeling shared by some in this country who are greatly concerned about England, and who have very little, if any, concern about what may happen to Ireland except as it may adversely affect England, is that Ireland ought to abandon its neutrality and enter the war on the side of England. Not much attention is paid to the thought that this would be to invite invasion by Germany, something that Ireland has good reason to avoid, if she can.

There is, however, more to it than that. This is the first time Ireland has been able to stay out of England's wars, and as she looks back on her history she is acutely aware that none of England's many wars have brought her any good. On the contrary, every one of them has brought harm to her. Her whole "distressful" history is identified with them. Ireland was repesented in the wars against Scotland, and when Bruce defeated the English there he sent his brother to conquer Ireland. They did not succeed, but the conflict on Irish soil brought ruin to Ireland. There were Irish troops at Crecy and at Agincourt, and the reward was the Poynings law, designed to destroy their nationality. When York and Lancashire fought for the throne, Ireland took the side of York and paid heavily when the Lancastrians won—so heavily that all leadership in Ireland was struck down. Irish troops went with Henry VIII to war in France, and when it was over he subdued their chiefs and proscribed their religion. Elizabeth, when she went to war with Spain, started by giving Sir Humphrey Gilbert a monopoly of commerce in the adjacent seas that destroyed Ireland's shipping; and when this provoked resentment and the Irish looked to Spain for help, Ireland's population was all but exterminated by England. When Ireland aided King Charles I, against the Parliament, Cromwell came to massacre, destroy, and confiscate. When she stood by another English king, James II, what it brought her was the migration of the flower of her men and a century and more under the infamous penal laws. Ireland's sympathy was with the American Colonies in the War of the Revolution, for which action England massacred the Irish in the north of Ireland, which at that time was the stronghold of nationalist leadership, as well as in the south. Irish troops were the backbone of Wellington's armies in another war with France and, after that war was over, England destroyed what were left of Ireland's industries and reduced her people to beggary.

The revolutionary period of 1848, which extended to all Europe, brought to Ireland the expulsion of her people from the land, to make way for the flocks and herds needed to feed Englishmen, and with it the transportation as felons of all her leaders to what are now known as the British Commonwealth of Nations. When the last war started, reservists flocked to France from every Irish town, the English Prime Minister called Ireland the "one bright spot," and a few years later the Black and Tans and pound-a-day cadets were hunting down those Irishmen who wore medals for their bravery. And yet it is held to be natural to ask the very men who survived the Maxwell blood purge in 1916, and who drove English garrisons and English armed constabulary out of 26 counties afterward, to take Ireland into war for England again, even though England insists on keeping her garrisons in the other 6 counties, and wants to return her garrisons to the other 26.

If ever a country had reason to declare her neutrality in the hope of preserving her peace and the prospect of going on with the orderly development of her resources, Ireland in the present circumstances is that country in respect of the demands made upon her by her nearest neighbor.

Equally is this true of her desire to be free of invasion by England's enemy. Her experience with England's enemies has not been happy. Spain, for her own purposes, landed armies in Ireland, which Ireland welcomed. France, for her own purposes, landed armies in Ireland, which Ireland welcomed. Both forgot Ireland when their wars with England ended, but England did not forget, and Ireland paid in loss of life and lands and inalienable human rights.

Ireland wants no enemy of England on her shores, either on her own account or because England's possession of a part of Ireland is an invitation to such enemy, or because England's enemy of the present, as with England's enemies in the past, might plan to attack England from Ireland.

She wants to be free of the devil she knows and equally of the devil she doesn't know, and to be free of both she has to take the risk of what may happen by maintaining her neutrality in a war that was not in any way of her making, for whose outbreak she has not the most remote responsibility, and into which only through the conflict of others can she be drawn against her will.

Her statesmen hold to their purpose even though threat comes from both sides. In that she should have the sympathy of the United States, which at this time is adjusting her present and future to the possible approach of enemies from two sides. There are those among us in whose eyes England bulks so large that Ireland can scarcely be seen at all. But there are those also in whose hearts there is echo of the prayer of Ireland: "God send that the peace of this island may still be preserved."

To these comes the realization that, in the times in which we live, if the understanding and sympathy essential to Ireland in her time of trial are not found in the United States they will be found nowhere else in the wide world. Nowhere, if not through the Government and the Congress of the United States, can effective expression be given to that understanding in terms that will be comprehended by those who may be tempted to drag Ireland into this war. It may be that this influence can be helpfully exerted while the war continues. It can be hoped that the same influence for good can be made available when the war ends. But it does seem that the chances of such helpful assistance to the preservation of Ireland's peace, now and in the future, must depend to some extent upon the measure in which that assistance is invoked by those of us here who now join in Ireland's prayer and who treasure the hope of seeing her united and free. The Congress may be excused if it waits until it is asked. If the asking is to be in sufficient volume to be heeded while the clamor of others is loud in the ears of Senators and Congressmen, considerable effort must be made. The demand for justice and peace for Ireland speaks now in Washington in but a still, small voice. It should be amplified. If the storm were to break on Ireland it would be. All hope of preventing that is bound up in making known the depth of our sentiments now, without a day's loss of time.

Republican National Convention

OF

HON. CHARLES L. McNARY

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

GOVERNOR STASSEN'S KEYNOTE ADDRESS AND SPEECH BY REPRESENTATIVE MARTIN AS PERMANENT CHAIRMAN OF THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL CONVENTION OF 1940

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of Governor Stassen's keynote address to the Republican National Convention, as well as the speech by Representative MARTIN of Massachusetts, the permanent chairman of the Republican National Convention of 1940.

I am advised that the speech made by former President Hoover has already been placed in the RECORD by a Member of the House of Representatives. Therefore I do not ask that former President Hoover's speech be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the address referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF GOVERNOR STASSEN'S KEYNOTE ADDRESS TO REPUBLICAN NATIONAL CONVENTION

Our forefathers erected here a great lighthouse of liberty.

They showed a new way for men to live. At last men and women could stand erect. They were free—free to think for themselves, to speak and to work and to worship for themselves. Free to use their hands and their brains to build homes for themselves. And free to choose from among themselves their own rulers.

When those founders of our Nation met in this historic city a century and a half ago, the dark shadow of despotic government covered most of the earth. The wealth, the traditions, and the power of the Old World all were arrayed against them.

Yet they succeeded. The framework for a government of free men which they drafted here became a beacon of liberty and progress for the entire world. The people of 13 struggling States adopted their work, and made of it the living Constitution of these United States. The people took from their number a great leader and made of him, George Washington, their first President.

Their task was well done. Let us strive to do as well in this our time of crisis.

COUNTRY PUT ABOVE PARTY

For once again the black shadow of despotism falls over the world. Fellow Republican delegates, even as we meet lights are going out in Europe. Black-outs of dictators take the place of lighthouses of free men. It is our grave responsibility to keep burning brightly the light of liberty.

If we meet that responsibility well, the people of this great Nation of 48 States will make the program and principles that we here set forth their program and their principles next November.

If we meet the challenge before us, we will here nominate a man the people of these United States will make their President next November.

The challenge of the hour clearly calls for our Republican Party to rise above narrow partisanship. Ours is the high duty to place the future of this Nation above all other considerations, including our own desire to win.

Let us face with calm courage the task that is before us.

REALISTIC INVENTORY ASKED

The press and the radio on this very day have brought to us added news of the horrors and tragedies of the war across the sea as ruthless rulers crush free men. Our Army Chief of Staff reports a tragic lack of preparedness for our own defense.

All about us moves the discouraged evidence that we still have 10,000,000 unemployed men and women. A heavy blanket of forty-five billions of indebtedness weighs down over all of our people. Back on the farms millions of rural families face their burdens with shrunken incomes.

This would indeed be a dark picture if we did not also see the great potentialities of a free people, talented sons and daughters of every nation in the world, having in their possession natural resources unequaled by any other nation.

Let us announce here and now that we have faith in the future of this Nation and its way of life.

It is for us realistically to take inventory, to draw heavily from the lessons of the past, and resolutely to turn our eyes to the future. Our first task is to cut through the clouds of confusion and of petty superficial political issues and present to the people, crystal clear, the great underlying problems and principles upon which our real future progress must be made.

We must brush aside the brambles of prejudice, bitterness, and hatred and lead through to national unity based upon understanding, tolerance, and confidence.

TWO RESPONSIBILITIES FACED

Every citizen of this Nation, regardless of his station in life, his political party, his nationality background, his creed, or his race, faces two great responsibilities during these next months.

First, he faces the responsibility of supporting his Government, as now constituted, in every measure for the public good.

So long as the now President of these United States is in the White House, so long as the now Senators and Representatives are in the Capitol, they are our President and our Congress, and when they together take action of vital public concern they are entitled to have, and they will have, the support of all men and women, including in full measure the support of the Republicans of this Nation.

But there is a second and even greater responsibility facing every man and woman of this country. That is the duty of deciding quietly and calmly who shall exercise the leadership of this Nation in the next 4 years of its existence. Then in keeping with that decision each citizen should go to his ballot box next November and cast his precious vote.

These two responsibilities are both of major importance, and each is distinct and separate. He who would confuse them and would withhold support of such action now because of the conviction that there should be a change in November is guilty of a disservice to the future of this country. And he who seeks to claim that support now must carry with it the surrender of the right to change in November, is equally guilty of a disservice to the future of this Nation.

CRITICISM IN A DEMOCRACY

It is not a pleasant task to criticize those in positions of governmental authority. Yet it is absolutely essential to the functioning of democracy.

It was not easy for the people of England to criticize their prewar government, yet how essential—in fact, how belated—was their change. It was not easy for the people of France to criticize their prewar government or their prewar generals, yet how necessary and how fatally delayed was their change.

When democracies face a crisis, their first step must be an extremely frank and fair analysis of their leadership as they prepare to meet their hours of peril.

I consider it to be the patriotic duty of my party to analyze frankly and fairly, from the facts and the records, the leadership this country now has, and that which it should have.

Let nothing that this convention may do or say be construed or distorted by the enemies of democracies as a reflection upon our form of government.

The constructive criticism in which we must indulge, the vigorous debate in which we propose to engage, the severe condemnation we intend deliberately to visit upon those who deserve it—these are not the signs that democracy is not working. They are the living evidence that here, in the last refuge of liberal government, democracy still is working.

FOUR FRONTS FOR ADVANCE

As we face the future we see plainly that if this Nation is to fulfill its high destiny, if we are to make America strong, and our way of life secure, whether the next years be years of peace or of conflict, we must advance with a decisive and determined step upon four major fronts:

The front of national preparedness.

The front of "fifth column" defense.

The front of domestic economic welfare.

The front of governmental effectiveness and integrity.

What shall be the salients of our advance? What shall be the character of our leadership? These are questions, the answer to which our Republican Party must suggest, and our people must decide.

Everyone recognizes the vital necessity for this Nation to advance rapidly and effectively upon the front of national preparedness. We need more than millions of men and women willing to spring to the defense of the country. We need the physical and mechanical means of answering the challenge of those who seek to turn the great benefits of machine development into a mechanical Frankenstein of destruction.

A PROGRAM FOR REARMING

We must develop our air force to take its place beside the Army and the Navy. We need large quantities of the most modern airplanes and antiaircraft guns, the most modern tanks and antitank guns, the most modern ships and coast defense.

We need highly mobile trained fighting units with bases for air, water, and land defense strategically located in this hemisphere. These bases must be protected as far as the ingenuity of man can do so against destruction from the air. We must be constantly alert in research and invention of the means of defense against new weapons of aggression.

To accomplish these ends we must fully utilize our mass production system, we must marshal and conserve our great credit resources, we must have executive direction and responsibility, we must cut through red tape and bureaucratic delays.

We must have a united people, with each citizen willing to make sacrifices and ready to stand shoulder to shoulder in the interests of national defense. We need that pioneering spirit that characterized the days of the covered wagon.

DEFENSE FAILURE CHARGED

And what shall be our leadership as we move forward upon this tremendous task? Shall it be that group of men who for 7 years have been in complete charge of our Government, using the Democratic label? Let us examine their record.

For 7 years they have had not only the Presidency and the Cabinet, but strong majorities in both Houses of Congress. They have had complete authority and they must take full responsibility for what has happened so far as Government is concerned during these past 7 years.

During these 7 years ruthless dictators in other lands built the diabolical machines of destruction now crushing Europe. During these 7 years cruel acts of aggression occurred in rapid succession. With full knowledge of these dangerous developments, what did our national leadership do to meet the threats?

It is a fact today, well known by the heads of every other government in the world, and belatedly coming to the knowledge of the people of this Nation, that we are tragically unprepared. We are too woefully weak to give the Allies that material assistance this Nation wants to give them. We are sadly wanting in the state of our defenses of this hemisphere.

The Army Chief of Staff and the chief of the air force have testified to this serious lack of modern equipment for our defense. They have specifically stated that we lack almost entirely the mechanical means vital to our security.

PRESIDENT'S DATA DISPUTED

As this news swept across the country the President went on the radio and in an extremely clever, but dangerously deceptive manner, lumped together the equipment that was "on hand" and "on order" in an effort to smooth over the failure to fulfill the trust that the American people placed in his administration.

The cold facts are that in many instances the totals the President gave "on hand" and "on order" were about one-fifth "on hand" and four-fifths "on order" and those orders sadly delayed in their fulfillment.

Even then he tried to give the American people the impression that they need not sacrifice, that they could move along with a shrug of the shoulders and that he would take care of things "on order."

He first placed some of the bungling members of his administration in charge of the vital problem of production.

We can be thankful today that the overwhelming demand of the people drove him, begrudgingly, to turn some portions of the task over to tried and experienced men of industry who gladly stepped forward to aid their country.

But he has still failed to put a single competent experienced man in charge of the entire job of production for defense. He insists upon maintaining an unwieldly board of seven with himself in charge. No man, fulfilling the responsibilities of the position of the Presidency, can in addition direct the diverse and highly important work of this committee.

CABINET SHIFT "A CONFESSION"

This failure to understand executive responsibility and coordination, and the primary rules of production and of getting a job done, has been one of the greatest weaknesses of this administration.

It is a terrific indictment that for many crucial months the important War Department has been disrupted by a tragic conflict of authority, with a Secretary of War and an Assistant Secretary hardly on speaking terms with each other, each conferring with the President, each playing his favorites within the Department.

And during the same crisis the Navy Department has been adrift without a real head, first headed by a man physically unable to carry on his task, and then by a Secretary who was submerged in a political campaign for the Governorship of one of our States.

By the politically timed appointment on the eve of this convention of two men of our party to these two Cabinet posts, the President made an eleventh-hour confession of failure in his national-defense administration. We are pleased that the prospect of our convention caused this sudden improvement over New Deal incompetence, and it is only regrettable that we cannot change the entire Cabinet and the man who heads it with equal abruptness.

YOUTH CAMP IDEA ASSAILED

The most dangerous example of the wrong way to prepare was the startling proposal of the President last week that all boys and girls in this country between the ages of 18 and 20 be compelled by the Government to enter Federal training camps.

That was the method of Hitler and Mussolini and Stalin. It is not the American way. We need more skilled and trained mechanics and technicians, but the American way to get them is through the vocational training system of this country, and through private industry.

The Federal Government should furnish the funds for the immediate expansion of these skilled training and apprentice programs. We should repeal the restrictions that make it almost impossible for industry to train young men. This part of our preparedness program should be coordinated under the officers of the Army and Navy and directed by a man who has had practical experience in training skilled men. It should be kept away from the impractical dreamers.

Give our young men and our young women the chance to train themselves for the opportunities and duties that are opening up and you will not have to herd them by compulsion to a Government camp.

When we need more men in our armed forces we should secure them in accordance with the program of the Army and Navy officials and we should not turn this task over to the New Deal social experimenters.

The President said these camps would teach discipline and keep these young people away from foreign isms. I would much rather trust our churches, our schools, and our homes to teach discipline and love of America than I would a compulsory Government camp.

NEGLECT AND WASTE DENOUNCED

Facing these facts, dare this Nation continue for the next four years under such leadership? For too long a time industry has been hobbled by bureaucratic interference and dreamy-eyed governmental delays at every turn while the Army and Navy plead in vain for the release of restrictions so they can speed up defense.

They seriously disrupted and retarded the entire aircraft industry by the ill-considered cancelation of the air-mail contracts, and Army pilots crashed to the earth, just when every encouragement should have been given to build up our air industry.

It is hardly believable, but it is true, that because of New Deal restrictions our aircraft manufacturers have turned to foreign financial centers speedily to secure new capital for plant expansion while idle capital and idle men are all about us.

For too long a time we have wasted millions and millions of dollars on Passamaquoddies and Florida Canals, while neglecting needed defenses.

For too long a time our leaders have strutted down the avenues of the world jauntily knocking chips off shoulders without even preparing to raise our arms in self-defense.

For too long a time we have talked boldly of quarantining aggressors in order to protect other nations, and now find we are not even prepared to protect ourselves.

For too long a time our foreign policy has been one of a big noise and a little stick, and even that little stick "on order." We need again a calm, resolute voice and a big stick.

It is one of the primary challenges to the Republican Party today to furnish the leadership for the calm, determined, rapid advance of this Nation on the front of national preparedness.

STEPS AGAINST "FIFTH COLUMN"

Our citizens also know that we must defend ourselves against the "fifth column." They have heard and read the almost unbelievable stories of boring from within, of treachery, and of treason in one nation after another.

They have seen how this "fifth column" of traitors within has joined hands with enemies from without to cause the speedy downfall and ruthless destruction of sturdy little nations. They have observed how men have taken advantage of the liberties of democracy to aid in cutting out the very heart of freedom itself.

We must prepare our defense against similar actions here, carefully and vigorously but without any ill-considered witch hunts. We should take determined steps through our democratic processes to keep these borers from within away from the pillars of our Capitol.

First and foremost, there must be the determination that no one supporting communism, nazi-ism, or fascism shall be permitted upon the public pay rolls of this Nation.

Second, we must encourage the trade-union movement, manned as it is by loyal American citizens, to divest its organizations, in its own way, of all officers and organizers who are sympathetic to either fascism, communism, or nazi-ism.

Third, we must unmask and expose those un-American organizations that are parading under false fronts.

Fourth, we must proceed vigorously to seek out and to punish by due process every violation of law committed by the "fifth columnists."

And above all, by a sound and progressive advance, fair and friendly to labor, we must open new opportunities, correct maladjustments in our social and economic structure, and take away the grounds of discontent upon which these "fifth columnists" seek to flourish.

CODDLING OF SUBVERSION ALLEGED

And to whom shall this Nation advancing upon this front look for leadership? To those now in charge of our Government? Certainly not. Under their leadership these past 7 years we have seen manifold examples of "fifth column" activities in time of peace within this Nation.

These subversive elements have incited hatred between groups of our people. They have thrown the first stone, causing outbreaks of violence in labor disputes. They have split the ranks of organized labor. They have encouraged the destruction of agricultural products. They have advocated loose fiscal policies. They have stirred up and led relief demonstrations on full stomachs. They have sabotaged and stopped in many ways our great productive organization.

Sincere leaders of labor have made many protests. The clergy of our churches have sounded many alarms. Men of industry have made many pleas for help. Public-spirited men and women of all walks of life have cried out against them. Committees of Congress have brought out clear evidence of their activities.

And yet, so far as our present national leadership has been concerned, these cries have all been of no avail. In fact, as these protests arose, the new dealers just smiled and reached over and patted the flanks of the Trojan horse.

Members of the Democratic Party itself cried out against these subversive activities only to find themselves derided and belittled from the highest places and to find directed at them a vicious purge, ruthlessly using all the peacetime weapons of a powerful administration in endeavoring to line them up against the wall for political oblivion.

No, the New Deal cannot lead our advance upon this front. It is a responsibility and a challenge to the Republican Party to furnish the leadership and the program to defend this Nation that we cherish against the borers from within.

WAY TO WIDEN EMPLOYMENT

What of our advance upon the front of domestic economic welfare? First, let us make clear the general features of this advance. No one shall suffer for want of food, shelter, or clothing. The needs of that portion of our population who have no other means of livelihood shall be met by society as a whole acting through its government.

But it must be equally clear that this is not the answer to our problem. After meeting the immediate need, the great challenge before the Nation shall be to furnish more real jobs for the unemployed in private industry.

We must recognize that, in a free economy, government in meeting the need of its people who are unemployed is not solving a problem, but is only temporarily easing the consequences of an unsolved problem.

We must recognize that the answer to all of our problems of a domestic nature is not to shrug our shoulders and say, "Let the Government do it." The role of government must be that of an aid to private enterprise, and not of a substitute for it. More and better jobs, better housing, and improved living conditions can best be secured through recognition of this principle.

INCENTIVES TO INDUSTRY

There has been talk to the Nation of a more abundant life. In a vain attempt to secure it they have gone from a greedy contest over the division of past accumulations of production to an irresponsible squandering of mortgages on the future.

Those great revenues which our Government must raise, to be financially sound, should be raised in that manner which shall to the least degree restrict and hamper the flow of idle money into the creation of new products and new jobs for idle men. Incentive taxes must take the place of punitive taxes.

We must exercise to the least possible degree the powers of government, to meet definite abuses, rather than using abuses as an excuse for the Government to reach out and grab all the power in the name of regulation. Those powers which government takes must be clearly divided as to legislative, executive, and judicial.

There is hardly any greater deterrent to private capital in its desire to develop more jobs than the morass of uncertainty which arises when great autocratic powers to be, rule maker and investigator, witness and prosecutor, judge and jury are all lodged in the same bureaucratic hands.

STABLE LABOR RELATIONS

For too long a time American enterprise has been subjected to the strafing of dive-bombing demagogs.

To advance upon the domestic field we must unite our forces. The flames of industrial warfare, of strikes and lock-outs and violence, have levied the staggering roll of 80,000,000 days of labor in the past 5 years.

The loss doubled in 1939 over 1938.

The New Deal has helped to stoke these flames of industrial warfare. The present role of government in industrial disputes must be revised. Instead of cracking down here, there, and everywhere it should exercise as little arbitrary power as possible.

Its chief aim should be to aid the working out of peaceful solutions of these difficulties around the conference table before they break out in strikes and lock-outs. Placing in the hands of any governmental agency the power to decide who was wrong after the loss has occurred is not a solution.

We should draw lessons from the Railway Labor Act, adopted in 1926, which we in Minnesota have used as a model, with its waiting periods and emphasis upon conciliation before strikes and lock-outs occur, and its protection of the basic rights of labor.

These simple principles have met with marked success wherever used. They are in keeping with the fundamental principles of the relationship of a democratic government to a free economy.

MEASURES FOR AGRICULTURE

We must recognize further on the domestic front that the farmers are the very backbone of America. We must raise their income and their buying power. The maintenance of millions of free farm families living on soil that they can call their own is one of the greatest bulwarks for future freedom.

When, as now, with extremely low agricultural prices, the natural economic processes do not permit them to maintain their status on the farm they must be aided. This should be as a reward for their production of the food supplies for the Nation and as an incentive to their conservation of the soil upon which they live.

These aids again must not be looked upon as a solution to the agricultural problem but only as a temporary expedient to ease the maladjustment that exists. We must seek real solutions in keeping with the natural economic forces that are involved in our system.

We must step by step take out of production marginal land that it is economically unsound to cultivate and that only adds to surpluses. We must increase the acreage in woodlots and timber tracts; we must aggressively market surpluses at home and abroad. Millions of European refugees should be fed with our surplus agricultural products.

Through development of more jobs and more purchasing power for our consuming public, we must expand the domestic market. We must advance in research and discovery of new uses for agricultural products. We must furnish new jobs for the excess population upon our lands so that instead of being a burden upon agriculture they become production portions of our population and new units of consumption. We must preserve as far as it is economically sound to do so our own markets for our own farmers.

"CUSHIONING" OF DEPRESSIONS

The tragic unemployment of the young men and young women of our Nation has been one of the very great losses of this depression. They have not wanted the dole. They have not wanted aimless month-by-month subsistence. They want opportunities to prepare for a life of productive activity.

The great productive processes of a free people under a system of individual enterprise have made this Nation the great power that it is. It has given to our people the highest standard of living in the world. This system has been and will be subject to its depressions and its recessions, its maladjustments and readjustments as the years roll by.

We must recognize that Government should furnish a cushion against the sharper fluctuations of this economic system, but that it cannot successfully furnish a bed upon which society can go to sleep. We must recognize that we gain together and we lose together.

We must continuously work to readjust and correct injustices and inequalities that are present and that will arise. Then we can have faith that this system will rise again and make ever greater progress in the interests of all of our people.

For the advance on this domestic front, can we entrust the leadership to those who have been in charge for the last 7 years? No. For 7 years jobs for the unemployed and parity for agriculture have been on order. And tonight, after billions of our substance have been scattered to the winds, jobs and parity are still not on hand but on order.

Here again is a challenge to the Republican Party to furnish the leadership and the program for a sound, sincere, step-by-step advance in keeping with the great basic principles of American economy.

RE-FORMING OF GOVERNMENT

What of our fourth front? Events at home and abroad bring forcefully to our attention the challenge to democracy to make itself more efficient and effective without surrendering its own basic principles.

The delays and confusion of yards and yards and yards of red tape, the waste and inefficiency of overlapping stumbling boards, bureaus, departments, divisions, and agencies, the lack of effective lines of Executive authority, the intermingling of powers that are legislative, executive, and judicial and the proper performance of none, the incessant conflict between governments on different levels, Federal, State, and local, these are the things by which lilliputians are restraining the slumbering giant of democracy and free enterprise and making him ineffective.

The inefficiency of our Government is a travesty in a land that has developed such magnificent efficiency in private endeavor.

There is a need of a sweeping, decisive reorganization of our Government. A real reorganization that streamlines our Government, simplifies our procedures, consolidates and eliminates useless and overlapping boards, bureaus, and agencies, establishes simple and effective lines of executive responsibility and separates the powers that are legislative, executive, and judicial. We need in public office servants of the people selected for their merit instead of corporals of a political army enlisted at a patronage pie counter.

Actual administrative details should be kept on as low a local level of government as possible. Relief, welfare, and farm programs should be administered locally in the counties, towns, cities, and villages. The State and Federal Governments should exercise only general powers of supervision and audit of their expenditures. Needless governmental functions must be cast off.

We must trim our sails for Government action in keeping with the tempo of the times. This will not only save millions of dollars of needless expenditures, but it will build up the respect and confidence of the people for their Government and will give us a fair chance to keep our liberty and still compete in a world of totalitarian states.

To whom shall we entrust the leadership on this front? Shall it be to those who have added almost 400,000 men and women to the public pay rolls of their political army, but have added only a few thousand to the pay rolls of our Regular Army? Or to those who tried to pack the Supreme Court of these United States? No. The Republican Party must furnish the leadership and the program to give to this great democracy of ours clear, decisive government.

As we advance upon these fronts many overshadowing problems of foreign policies will require decision. Let us frankly state to the people that we can neither fully anticipate these problems nor can we tie our hands before meeting them. As they are reached they must be faced and the people of this Nation must be made aware of what they mean so that informed public opinion may find expression in the policies of the Government.

PROTECTION FOR HEMISPHERE

It is clear that the first responsibility must be the future welfare of the people of this Nation and their way of life, but it is also clear that that future welfare cannot best be served by simply burying our heads in the sand. The world is constantly changing.

Modern inventions, developments of communication and travel, the flow of trade in a highly industrialized world, all these increase the impact of what happens in one part of the world upon the rest of the world. Let us determine and define where our interests lie.

Clearly in the first instance they lie in this hemisphere. We cannot permit an armed force, aggressive in nature, with a philosophy foreign to ours to establish itself upon this hemisphere. Neither can we allow subversive elements linked to alien aggressors to undermine government anywhere on this hemisphere. It is essential that we plan in advance and take decisive steps to establish hemisphere defense.

It is a sad commentary that in the past 7 years, which led right up to the outbreak of war, we have given the aid of our inventive genius, of our raw materials, and of our productive ability to those with philosophies foreign to ours as well as to those with philosophies similar to ours.

We have thus aided the manufacture of the implements of destruction that Russia used upon Finland, that Germany uses against the Allies, that Japan uses against China, that Italy uses against France. How belated is our now exclusive assistance to the Allies.

It is the responsibility of government in its foreign policy to endeavor in every honorable way to create and nurture a world environment in which its people can proceed along life's path in peace, expanding their material well-being and developing their way of life.

It is thus also clear that our interests lie with the encouragement of freedom and progress for all mankind and the development of order between nations based upon eternal moral and spiritual laws, rather than upon lawless force of economic strangulation.

Failing in the creation of that environment, it is the clear duty of government to make its people strong in their own defense, to so prepare them, that other portions of the world may not stamp out their way of life, and may not encroach upon their well-being.

KEEPING NATION OUT OF WAR

Measured by these guides, what can our verdict be of the foreign policies of this administration? We do not judge harshly, and yet our judgment must be that it has failed. What has this administration done to bring about a better world environment?

Was it in its recognition of Russia? Was it in its torpedoing of the London Economic Conference? Was it in its failure to advise the people of this Nation of the facts that it knew from the capitals of Europe? Was it in its announced attitude that this Nation was no longer dynamic, and was not pressing forward upon new frontiers? Was it in its continued sales of the means of warfare to those very nations who threatened to be aggressors?

No; nor was it in its appointment of wealthy playboys as foreign ministers and ambassadors.

Clearly failing in its first responsibility, neither did it meet its second duty of national preparedness. This Nation has had the shifting foreign policy of the politicians, unwilling to present hard facts to the people of the Nation.

The great need for our future foreign policy is a leadership that is frank and fair with the people. The people must have confidence that their leaders place the Nation's welfare above their own political future. The people must know that their leaders, while resolute in support of these basic policies, nevertheless have the earnest hope to keep this Nation out of war.

THIRD TERM TRADITION

Have we been too harsh in our judgment? No; in fact, we have not even referred to the strong self-indictment of the obvious effort to break down one of our bulwarks of freedom by violating the third-term tradition. The saddest chapter of the last 4 years has been that the national administration, instead of keeping its eyes, statesmanlike, upon the welfare of the people of this Nation, has turned its political gaze upon a third term. This un-American desire for a third term completely undermines their forthrightness in meeting all of our issues. It has destroyed statesmanship. Cleverly and surreptitiously they have strengthened the iron-handed control of the President over the Democratic Party. Building upon the corrupt political machines of Kelly, and Nash, and Hague, and their kind, they have erected as a superstructure, a political machine such as this country has never before seen. Democracy within the Democratic Party has been destroyed.

With this background they move on toward their convention, tossing aside the traditions of Washington and Jefferson.

"FREE CHOICE OF LEADERSHIP"

Let us fully recognize that this very situation is an added challenge to our party. With the Democratic Party's right of free choice of leadership denied to them, we must furnish the leadership for the men and women of all parties. To do so we must make our party truly representative of the people, independent of domination by any group, and fair to all.

Fellow-delegates, if we could reverse the magic of radio tonight, if we could turn the millions of radio receiving sets throughout this land into microphones and if we could turn our microphone here in this great convention hall into a receiving set we would hear an overwhelming message sweeping in upon us.

It would be a cry for a statesmanlike leadership to make America strong and our way of life secure. Shall we rise to meet this challenge? Let us proceed with our deliberations here in this historic city of Philadelphia.

Let us present to the people of this Nation a program worthy of their support. Let us nominate a man to carry out that program, a man the people will elect the next President of these United States.

Let us remember the words George Washington spoke in this very city: "If to please the people we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterwards defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hands of God."

SPEECH OF REPRESENTATIVE MARTIN, THE PERMANENT CHAIRMAN

You have bestowed upon me a great honor. I deeply appreciate it. I shall try earnestly to perform the duties of the convention chairmanship in a way to justify your confidence.

We are assembled in one of the oldest cities of our Nation. It is a city rich in precious memories and American traditions. Here, almost within the range of our voices, the American Republic was born. Here was heralded to the world a new ideal of government; a government dedicated to the proposition that the rich and the poor alike stand upon a common ground; that each shall have equal rights as well as equal opportunities; that each is entitled to the full protection of his government in the preservation of priceless rights and privileges of citizenship.

This convention will nominate a President to lead America out of the wilderness of economic confusion and spiritual chaos.

We are here to rally all patriots in a crusade for Americanism.

Our party is commanded by epochal events in the history of mankind to give vitality and power once more to the fundamental inspirations and traditions of our national life. Ours is the task to rescue our beloved America from the bog of failure and futility. We are challenged to defend and preserve the basic values of life, liberty, and human freedom in a world paralyzed and broken by the ravages of dictatorship, hatred, and war.

We echo in this great assemblage the glorious inspiration of our beginnings as a nation—"Easier were it to hurl the rooted mountain from its base than to force the yoke of slavery upon men determined to be free."

SEES PARALLEL IN MEETINGS

The founding fathers gathered in this city in a period of national crisis. So do we today assemble in Philadelphia in a period of grave national trial—indeed, a period of world crisis. The early patriots came here to form a Nation. We come here today to protect and preserve that Nation.

We have been witnessing from this side of the seas a convulsion of history. It will have an inconceivable influence upon the destiny of mankind. We have watched with anxious eyes the liberties and rights of ancient peoples vanish almost overnight.

We have seen with heavy hearts our own Nation, for 7 years, drifting toward one-man government and national bankruptcy. These twin evils were greatly feared by the founding fathers. They sought in every possible way, in their deliberations in this very city, to guard against them.

All that is precious to us, all that makes life attractive or promising—personal liberty, equal rights, equal justice, constitutional government—these are in danger of being extinguished. There is a steady drift toward governmental absolutism, both at home and abroad. This drift must be checked. It must be checked this year. Generations of free men endured hardships and shed their blood so that our lives might be freer, fuller, richer, and more devoted to the cause of liberty and enlightenment. Our generation must not fail.

The spirit, the character, the courage, the faith which in that day threw off the galling yoke of tyranny and carved this great, rich, enlightened Nation out of the primeval wilderness still live in the men and women of today. That spirit, character, courage, and faith alone can preserve this Nation and the world from a return to the chaos, cruelty, ignorance, superstition, and brutality of the Dark Ages.

FINDS "PRICELESS PRIVILEGE"

It is at once the real responsibility and the priceless privilege of the Republican Party to lead the way; to reawaken, revitalize, and rally that spirit, that character, that courage, and that faith which are America's defense against danger of assault from without or within.

In this great convention the Republican Party will rise above partisanship and narrow political expediency. It will respond to that responsibility. It will avail itself of that privilege. We will not fail our country in her hour of need.

The eyes of the Nation are upon us. The hopes of the Nation are in us. This convention must point the way toward security for our beloved country; toward the preservation of our essential liberties while preparing our defense; toward maintaining our constitutional Republic.

My countrymen, we can, if we will, achieve concerted, effective effort just as efficiently as any subject peoples can. We can do it without surrendering the Bill of Rights.

Eyes that are clear, hearts that are fearless, minds that are free must maintain our ideals of liberty in the midst of world chaos and confusion.

We must see to it that our national reason is not warped and befuddled by political propaganda, pleas for power, bureaucratic blundering, or selfishness of section or class. This is no time to be stampeded into hasty decisions.

"FIFTH COLUMNS" HIT

We must preserve our country from the schemes and treachery of those unsympathetic to our constitutional Republic and who would destroy it. Destruction of our Constitution, our Government, and our freedom can be brought about, unless we are vigilant, by economic betrayal just as readily as by military betrayal. All "fifth columnists" must be rooted out and thrown out. "Trojan horses" must be barred from our Government. We must not permit political liberty to be used as a mask for plotters against the American system. The Constitution must not be misused to destroy the Constitution.

Our people may well thank God there is in this Nation one party which refuses to coddle or foster the enemies of free government.

The Republican Party stands today, as it has throughout its long and splendid history, a stalwart champion of national defense. We stand four-square in our determination to have an army, a navy, an air force amply able to protect our shores, to defend our people and our ideals from any foe who might challenge our determination to work out our destiny peacefully in the American way.

We want an America at peace with the world; an America untainted by hatreds and fears.

Following the paths of party tradition, the Republicans in Congress have consistently supported proposals to make the military and economic defenses of the Nation adequate.

As long ago as April 1939 we appointed a special committee of House Republicans to study our national defense. The proposals of that committee were ignored by the administration.

CALLS HEAVY TAX UNNECESSARY

To provide an adequate defense at this time enormous sums of money must be spent. It will mean taxes which will reach painfully into every household in this land. Many of those taxes should not be necessary now. They would not be if the administration had not in the last few years failed in its responsibility to protect the savings and the substance of the American people.

We have refused, and will continue to refuse, to permit either the military or economic defense of our country to be made a partisan issue.

The necessity for quickly building an adequate national defense must not be made the excuse to abandon economy and efficiency. After our national defense is achieved the Nation must continue to live. Our defense must not be defeated by an intolerable debt which will bring ruin through repudiation, inflation, or national bankruptcy. Rigid economy must be practiced in government if we are to obtain the money necessary for defense without reducing the people to poverty through unbearable tax burdens. In this hour of national peril many desirable comforts must be deferred so the Nation may live. There will be need for all to make personal sacrifices. Nevertheless, it is not a time for pessimism. We can achieve an adequate national defense; we can repair our internal economic structure; we can solve our foreign and domestic problems without either a ruinous war or a ruinous debt. If there is a will, there will be a way.

We have had 7 years of blundering and cotradictory policies. We have had a nightmare of experimentation and spending. We have had national planning without a plan. We have had managed economy with neither management nor economy. Vast sums of money—sums too vast to be comprehended by the human mind—have been scattered about with reckless abandon. Under the cloak of emergency and distress the American people have been ruinously exploited. Today the administration is bewildered by the effects of its own irresponsible conduct.

PAST PROMISES CITED

The Roosevelt administration has spent all the savings a thrifty people could hope to accumulate for many generations to come. It has enjoyed unlimited power. It has had every possible opportunity to make good its pledges. The American people were promised that the money changers would be driven out of the temple; the costs of government would be reduced 25 percent; bureaucracy would be checked; a more abundant life would come to all our people; there would be jobs for the unemployed; prosperity for the farmer. "Happy days were here again," so we were told.

The American people believed in their President.

Now what do we find after 7 years of spending and promising? The depression continues. The demands for relief are greater than ever. Millions are still without jobs. If it were not for the war, business would be in the midst of a panic more severe than anything we ever had before. The Public Treasury is empty. The debt limit of forty-five billions will soon be passed. Enormous taxes are in the offing.

The record is a somber story of failure and futility and broken promises. And there is much reason to believe we may yet wake up to find we have been pushed into war. That is the record of the New Deal. That record will never be approved by the American people. They will repudiate it next November. America wants to get back to sanity, progress, and peace—peace at home; peace abroad.

We agree that much money had to be appropriated for necessary relief and other worthy objectives. With those expenditures the citizens have no quarrel. The American people have never hesitated to pay for any worthy humanitarian cause. They do not hesitate now. But they do object—and they should object—to being victimized by false appeals and dishonest motives.

For 7 anxious years we have seen this march toward one-man government.

We have seen national, sectional, and class hatreds encouraged and fanned into the flames now consuming the lives, the liberties, the happiness, the security, and the material possessions of men.

We have seen the renunciation of all the ancient truths and traditions of Americanism; of individual worth and freedom; of personal liberties; of peace on earth toward men; of good will; of faith, courage, thrift, and self-reliance.

Every ideal of Americanism has been imperiled by those who would make our Government and our Nation tools to be manipulated by one man at the head of a great and unelected political bureaucracy. The time has come to end all this if we are to continue to live as a free people.

In the confusion caused by these efforts to change the character and traditions of the American people, in the midst of these great world upheavals, the Republican Party will courageously meet the issues.

This is not the time for discouragement. It is not the hour for either complacency or despondency. Our Nation is in danger. Clear and loud above the roar of war abroad, and chaos and confusion at home, comes the call to patriotic Americans. It is an appeal and a challenge to all who love America; to all, regardless of past party affiliations, who are true to the faith of the founders of this Republic.

CRUSADE CALLED FOR

This great patriotic call is worthy of a crusade. With the courage and fortitude born of a just cause we will press forward. With a high faith in the goodness and wisdom of the God of our fathers, we will carry on.

In this hour of national need, this hour of crisis and decision, the devotion of the consecrated spiritual forces of America alone can answer the compelling challenge which confronts us. We must preserve free America for the generations yet to come, cost us what it may.

Today I bring you the challenge of a new and deeper devotion—a challenge which came to me from the fields of Valley Forge—a challenge from that most sacred shrine of liberty and freedom.

In this hour of decision, I bring you the message of consecration before which I bowed but a day ago at that scene of supreme devotion:

"And here in this place of sacrifice, in this vale of humiliation, in this valley of the shadow of that death out of which the life of America rose regenerate and free, let us believe with an abiding faith that to them union will seem as dear, and liberty as sweet, and progress as glorious as they were to our fathers, and are to you and me, and that the institutions which have made us happy, preserved by the virtue of our children, shall bless the remotest generation of the time to come."

TELEGRAM FROM HON. EDWARD R. BURKE OF NEBRASKA TO WENDELL L. WILLKIE

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a telegram sent by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] to Wendell L. Willkie, on July 18, 1940.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 18, 1940.

Hon. WENDELL L. WILLKIE,
Colorado Springs, Colo.:

As one who feels deeply that in the light of present world conditions it is essential for our country to maintain the two-term limitation on the tenure of office of President, I shall work for your victory at the polls in November. Thus only may we make certain that never again will any party or any individual be tempted to try to overturn the wise precedent established by Washington, strengthened by Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson, and cherished by all Americans who prize their freedom.

I am certain that a host of citizens nurtured in the Democratic faith, as you and I have been, will rally to the defense of the vital principle that under our form of government a limitation on the tenure of office of an all-powerful Executive is essential. We share the firm conviction of the patron saint of the Democratic Party, Thomas Jefferson, that should a President ever consent to be a candidate for a third term he will be rejected on this demonstration of ambitious views. We believe with another Democratic President, Buchanan, that the principle that no President should be more than once reelected is as sacred as if it were written in the Constitution.

Andrew Jackson, honored by all real Democrats, steadfastly maintained that our liberties would possess an added safeguard if our Presidents were limited to a single term, and his view became party doctrine by action of the Democratic National Convention in 1912. Grover Cleveland saw the most serious danger to America resulting from the zeal born of benefits received and the hope of favors yet to come with which a horde of officeholders would seek to retain a President in office.

I disclaim the leadership of those of my party who but a few years ago put themselves on record that any departure from the two-term tradition would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions and who today take the very action they then denounced. A fitting rebuke to their apostasy will be administered by an aroused people. In that program of education I volunteer my services for the duration of the campaign.

Tribute to the Negro

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

EXCERPT FROM ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN, OF MISSOURI

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a tribute to the Negro by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN]. This tribute is part of an address delivered by the junior Senator from Missouri at Sedalia, Mo., on June 15, 1940.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR TRUMAN'S TRIBUTE TO THE NEGRO

History is but one long record of the gigantic struggle labor has waged for its true vindication and right reward. But a new wave of feeling, saturated with the spirit of the Declaration of Independence, which looks upon the poor with sympathetic eyes, is passing over our country. A hightened conception of the worth and dignity of human life is taking irresistible hold upon all sections of society. Man is no longer a breathing robot, but a living spirit endowed with the highest and holiest of powers, capable of touching the heavens in inspiration and desire.

And when we speak of man and his labor, at least in this country and, more particularly, in this locality, we must consider the problem of our Negro population and bend our every effort that, at least under law, they may claim their heritage of our Bill of Rights to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Their social life, will, naturally, remain their own, but as freemen they must have their equality before law.

The relation of colored and white people in this community and this State is one that should be given our interest and attention. We all desire to see proper and helpful relations exist between all classes of people. Certainly there should be no injustice, no contemptuous or unfair treatment allotted by any class to any other class. Most of all, the stronger group should not impose upon the weaker obnoxious conditions or situations. In all matters of progress and welfare, of economic opportunity and equal rights before law, Negroes deserve every aid and protection.

I believe in the brotherhood of man; not merely the brotherhood of white men, but the brotherhood of all men before law. I believe in the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. In giving to the Negroes the rights that are theirs, we are only acting in accord with our ideals of a true democracy. If any class or race can be permanently set apart from, or pushed down below, the rest in political and civil rights, so may any other class or race when it shall incur the displeasure of its more powerful associates, and we may say farewell to the principles on which we count our safety.

During the World War the need of men for an Army and for war industries brought more and more of the Negroes from rural areas to the cities. In the years past, lynching and mob violence, lack of schools, and countless other equally unfair conditions, hastened the progress of the Negro from the country to the city. In these centers the Negroes have never had much choice in regard to work or anything else. By and large, they work mainly as unskilled laborers and domestic servants. They have been forced to live in segregated slums, neglected by the authorities. Negroes have been preyed upon by all types of exploiters, from the installment salesman of clothing, pianos, and furniture to the vendors of vice. The majority of our Negro people find but cold comfort in shanties and tenements. Surely, as freemen, they are entitled to something better than this.

Fortunately, with somewhat better chances for education, the Negro is gradually progressing. It is our duty to see that the Negroes in our locality have increased opportunity to exercise their privilege as freemen. When the details for working out this problem arise for decision, they become rather complex; but we can and must meet the situation. Above all else, education for the Negro is of vital importance.

It is safe to say that just to the degree that the Negro attains a proper educational level will he be able to compete on more nearly equal terms with the educated whites among whom he dwells. But he must have the opportunity to be educated. Since education is fundamental to a democratic form of government, our Government will be broad, free, and secure just in proportion as the education of the people composing it is universal and thorough. This means the Negro as much as anyone else. The condition of our Negro must be bettered.

I will quote you a few lines from a speech which I recently had placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Even these brief lines show beyond all doubt just what is being done for the Negro by the Roosevelt administration.

"It has given us $2,000,000 for improvements at Howard University and Freedmen's Hospital; $262,000 to Virginia State College; $87,000 for Lincoln University in Missouri; $500,000 for the Wendell Phillips High School at Chicago; $40,000 for West Virginia State College; paid $100 per month to 114 colored school teachers in Chicago engaged in reducing adult illiteracy, and has extended this benevolent aid in other directions.

"According to the 1930 census Negro youth represented 11 percent of the total youth population between the ages of 16 to 24. It is estimated that in January 1940 approximately 82,800 Negro youths were employed on N. Y. A. programs. This was 11.1 percent of the total employment on these programs, or almost exactly the same proportion which Negro youth of the age bears to the total youth population.

"It (that is, the Roosevelt administration) has done more than any other administration to eliminate the slum districts of our great cities through its public-works programs, and that work has but begun."

Ladies and gentlemen, this record excels that of any previous administration, Democratic or Republican. The work of this administration must not be stopped.

May Alaskans Work in Alaska Fisheries?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, the subject which I am about to discuss today is of wide concern to the people of Alaska, and it may well be of definite interest to many Members of this body, because it involves questions of decentralization of population, of the employment of local residents in the industries of local communities, and of national defense.

If there is anything in what I shall presently say that may be deemed critical, I hope it will be understood that it is constructive criticism and not censure; the criticism of one who is seeking to promote the welfare not only of his own constituents but of the people of the United States as a whole. The purpose of making this statement is to give information to Congress and to the people of Alaska, to present the facts as known to me, and then, to the best of my ability, to draw reasonable deductions from those facts.

It is now recognized that one of the most regrettable tendencies of our modern social and economic development has been the concentration of people in the great centers of population, where in times of industrial depression or distress they are all but entirely helpless, so that, unless relief comes to them in liberal measure, they are literally faced with starvation. Economists have recognized the high advisability of reversing this process and of having the population of the country more equitably distributed over its surface, thus avoiding great concentrations of people in large communities. The welfare of the Nation is unquestionably promoted by having the people actually living on the land rather than by having them collected in the larger and more thickly settled communities without any attachment to the soil.

Mr. Speaker, as most of the Members of this House know, Alaska is a country vast in area and relatively sparsely populated. The preliminary returns of the 1940 census indicate that there are approximately 72,000 people in the Territory, of whom about 31,000 are descendants of the aboriginal Eskimo, Aleut, and Indian races of the whole or part blood, and the remainder are nearly all of the Caucasian race, with a few Filipinos, Japanese, and others. Since the area of Alaska is nearly 590,000 square miles, it would appear that at the present time there is one inhabitant in the Territory to each 8 square miles of area.

For a number of years past, and especially within the last 12 months, it has become increasingly evident that a much larger population in Alaska would be of definite benefit to the Nation as a whole, particularly with respect to problems of national defense.

As I have said to this House on several occasions, and as many of the Members are aware from their own individual study of the subject, Alaska lies on the short line and on the direct line, both by air and by sea, between the United States on the one side of the Pacific Ocean and the Empire of Japan and Soviet Russia on the other side. Alaska fronts for more than 2,500 miles on the north Pacific Ocean and has an abundance of land-locked harbors free of ice the year round. At its western extremity Alaska reaches to within 260 miles of the nearest Soviet territory at Bering Island, where a large military and naval air base has lately been constructed with the advice and aid of a considerable number of German technicians, and within approximately 700 miles of the northerly islands of Japan, on one of which is located a great naval base of that nation. At the other and eastern extremity, Alaska extends to within 700 miles of the main body of the United States, a really insignificant distance for modern aircraft. Obviously it would be in the interest of the Nation as a whole to have a substantial population in Alaska and to have Alaska developed to the point where it would be largely self-sustaining at least for ordinary articles of food and many of the necessary articles of winter clothing.

HOW THE DISCRIMINATION AROSE

The settlement and development of Alaska have been delayed not only by absentee ownership, or nonresident ownership, of its principal industries and industrial plants, but also even to a larger extent by the practice which has existed from the early days of bringing workmen into Alaska from the States for such seasonal operations as fishing, and placer mining, and road building, and construction work of all kinds, and then returning them to the States at the end of their respective working season, leaving Alaska and the residents of the Territory with little benefit from such operations. In cases without number, and continuously over a period of years until the present time, residents of the Territory have been denied employment in the industries of the Territory because of this influx of workers from the States, who in one fashion or another, in conjunction with the employers, would control the employment, and see that most, if not all, of the jobs were given to nonresidents rather than to residents of Alaska. In the early days of the American history of Alaska, of course, it was necessary to bring workmen into the Territory from the States to perform all types of labor in Alaska because few of the native inhabitants were accustomed to industrial work, and most of them did not care to undertake it, having a native economy of their own which at that time was sufficient for them.

As the years passed, however, and additional people settled in Alaska, the problem of being able to live in the Territory became more acute to the settlers unless they could find some remunerative employment in Alaska. And then as the Territory was more largely explored and overrun by men from the States, the resources of fish, fur, and game, providing food and clothing, which the natives had enjoyed from time immemorial, came more and more under the domination of the new settlers, or visitors, to the exclusion of the natives. Moreover, under the civilizing influences of the missions and the schools, the natives themselves changed their modes of life, and they, too, came to need opportunities to earn money by employment in the industries of the Territory if they were to survive and maintain any semblance of civilized existence.

Despite this increase in the number of permanent residents of Alaska who were not only willing but anxious to secure industrial employment, many of the industries continued to import workmen from the States to perform most of the available jobs, thus excluding residents of Alaska, both natives and whites, therefrom.

The condition became a serious one, particularly in the fisheries of Alaska. Each year has seen, and now sees, thousands of workers imported from the United States into Alaska who remain in Alaska only for the fishing season, and then return to the States with little, if any, benefit to the Territory or its permanent residents. Each attempt on the part of a resident of Alaska to secure a job in the fisheries has been met, first, with refusal, then, with difficulty, and, lastly, on many occasions, with a sort of second-rate opportunity to secure employment in the fishing industry. Residence in Alaska has long been, and is now in places, considered a positive disqualification for a man who sought employment in the work or industries of the Territory, and, particularly, in that of fishing.

Unfortunately that discrimination has not been confined to the fishing industry. For many years contractors building roads in the national forest areas of Alaska declined to employ any substantial number of residents of the Territory, and brought nearly all of their workmen from the States. This unhappy condition has now been remedied by a requirement of the Bureau of Public Roads that Alaskans be given priority in employment in road contracts where residents of the Territory are available for the work.

Still more recently—in fact, last year—the contractors now engaged in building naval air bases at Sitka and at Kodiak,

Alaska, under authorizations and appropriations made by Congress drew their contract with labor unions in Seattle for the employment of skilled workmen in such form that, while pretending to give preference to residents of Alaska, those residents were really discriminated against. In this particular case no blame can be attached to the Seattle labor unions, because they at all times expressed willingness that residents of the Territory should be given priority and that the machinery of employment should be so set up that such priority could be enjoyed by Alaska residents. The Navy Department was likewise quite willing that reasonable facilities should be established for the employment of residents of Alaska in this work, and yet it was only after much argument and strong representations that Alaskans were accorded a fair chance to get the available jobs.

With respect to the fishing industry, the discrimination against employment of the residents of Alaska has existed since the industry was set up. It is the fact that when salmon packing was first undertaken in Alaska there were few residents in the Territory available to work in the industry, and as a consequence the operators brought practically all, and in some cases all, of their employees from the States. Those who resided in Alaska and who wished employment in the industry were ordinarily refused because the operators had already brought from the States full crews for every operation, and so it was well-nigh impossible for an Alaskan to get a job either in fishing or in cannery work.

With the passing of the years and with the increase in population in Alaska conditions have become somewhat better, particularly as to fishing, and there are some areas in Alaska where few other than residents of Alaska are employed in fishing. I have in mind particularly some areas in southeastern Alaska and in Prince William Sound where local resident fishermen are in the vast majority, and, in some cases, no nonresidents are employed.

BRISTOL BAY

In the Bristol Bay area, however, the situation has never been satisfactory and is gravely objectionable at the present time. A statement of the conditions there existing was made to the subcommittee of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries during the hearings held by that subcommittee in Alaska during the summer of 1939 by Hon. Edward D. Coffey, a member of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, who has fished in the Bristol Bay waters for a number of years. Mr. Coffey's statement appears in part I of the hearings, commencing on page 24, and is deserving of careful consideration, for he has first-hand knowledge of the subject, and the accuracy of his statement cannot be questioned by anyone. From the very beginning of the operations in Bristol Bay the operators and the nonresident fishermen were equally averse to having any residents of Alaska employed in that particular fishery, and hence the difficulties encountered by residents of Alaska in securing the right to fish in Bristol Bay go back for many years. And for a number of years past Alaskans have struggled desperately to secure a share of that employment, for without it many of them could not obtain remunerative employment in Alaska at all.

Their struggles came to a head in 1936 when the Alaska fishermen formed a union, called United Fishermen of Alaska, taking in practically all of the residents of Alaska engaged in fishing who resided in Seward, Cook Inlet, and Kodiak, and another union called Snag Point Fishermen's Union, embracing the fishermen residing in the Bristol Bay area. During that year a number of residents of Alaska fished in Bristol Bay, but the Alaska Fishermen's Union, composed almost exclusively of nonresidents, with headquarters in San Francisco, Calif., devised an ingenious scheme to make it unprofitable, and perhaps impossible, for Alaskans to be employed in fishing in that region. That scheme was to require the operators to pay to the members of the Alaska Fishermen's Union, as a kind of a gratuity or bonus, a sum equal to one-third of all money paid to residents of Alaska for the fish which those residents caught in Bristol Bay waters.

Let me explain a bit further. The price paid for fish that year by the operators to the Bristol Bay fishermen was 12½ cents per fish. This price was paid to all, residents and nonresidents, for the fish they caught. But the contract signed by the operators and the Alaska Fishermen's Union further provided that not only should the price per fish be 12½ cents but that at the end of the season the operators must pay to the nonresident fishermen, that is to say, the members of the Alaska Fishermen's Union, a sum equal to one-third of the total paid to the residents of Alaska for the fish taken by them. So, as a matter of fact, the operators paid 12½ cents for the fish caught by nonresidents of Alaska, but they were obliged to pay 16⅔ cents for the fish caught by residents of Alaska, 12½ cents to Alaska residents, and an additional 4⅙ cents to the nonresidents and thus the packers were penalized 4⅙ cents per fish for permitting any resident to catch any salmon at all. Now, it will be claimed, Mr. Speaker, that the nonresidents were entitled to that 4⅙ cents, because the residents of Alaska did not perform certain other work at and around the cannery in connection with the loading of the fish, but that claim is fiction. If the Alaskans did not do this extra work, it was because they did not have a chance to do it and because the nonresidents insisted upon having a monopoly of such work.

The device of the nonresident fishermen, the Alaska Fishermen's Union, which they put in the contract with the packers for 1936 and which, for all I know, was in the contract for other years, was intended to prevent the employment of any substantial number of residents of Alaska in the Bristol Bay fishery and the continuous monopolization of the same by nonresidents of the Territory. During the winter of 1936–37 the members of the United Fishermen of Alaska and of the Snag Point Fishermen's Union were compelled to join, and did join under such compulsion, and because they were threatened with complete exclusion from the Bristol Bay fishery otherwise, the Alaska Fishermen's Union, and branches of that union were established in Bristol Bay and in Anchorage. The Alaska resident fishermen at that time were in a desperate position and they were compelled by major force to comply with the demands, no matter how unreasonable, of the nonresident fishermen.

By the year 1939 approximately 50 percent of the fishermen in Bristol Bay were residents of Alaska and the other 50 percent were nonresidents. Hon. Edward D. Coffey, in his statement to the subcommittee of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which I adverted a moment ago, claimed that despite this equality in numbers, the nonresident fishermen still demanded and claimed and enjoyed the advantage, because a part of their "gentlemen's agreement" with the operators was that the nonresidents should man the first six boats for every line of packing machinery operated in Bristol Bay, and thus by reserving to themselves the first six boats they were assured of employment, while the residents were just permitted to fill in, to catch any salmon that might be required to carry on the packing operations over and above that which might be supplied by the nonresidents' six boats.

In spite of denials, Mr. Coffey insists that this provision whereby the nonresident fishermen have given themselves a monopolistic first call on all salmon caught in Bristol Bay up to the capacities of the first six boats to the line of machinery operated is still in force and effect. Perhaps that is the condition that is referred to in the letter dated January 9, 1940, from Mr. George Lane, a representative of the International Fishermen and Allied Workers' of America, made a part of the record in the hearings held before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in which Mr. Lane says:

> I recognize that when the hearings are reopened the packers will have their innings on southeastern and southwestern Alaska, but I would also like to point out that if the Alaska Fishermen's Union is expected to permit Alaska residents to usurp the just proportion of jobs from the men from the States, we will refuse to permit any fishing in the area.

The "just proportion" of the jobs to which Mr. Lane refers is undoubtedly the privilege of manning the first six boats employed per line in the Bristol Bay fisheries.

Mr. Speaker, naturally the Legislature of Alaska has been much concerned to prevent the outright and, as it may be justly designated, the outrageous discrimination against residents of Alaska with respect to employment in the fisheries of Alaska. And so, at the last session of the Legislature of Alaska held between January and March 1939, a bill, Senate bill No. 67, was introduced by Senator Henry Roden and considered at length and thoroughly by the legislature. It passed the Senate by unanimous vote and was defeated in the House by a majority of one vote only. Section 2 of the bill provides as follows:

SEC. 2. In the employment of mechanics or laborers in the canning, salting, or other processing of salmon, herring, or other aquatic products, preference shall be given to residents of Alaska, as hereinafter defined and not less than 50 percent of all persons so employed shall be bona fide residents of this Territory and shall have been such for not less than 1 year immediately prior to entering such employment.

I shall not read the entire bill because the rest of it is all written around section 2, which I have just read.

While the bill did not pass both houses, it is significant that it passed the Senate unanimously and was defeated in the House by a majority of one. That action by the several members of the legislature shows a strong interest of the people of Alaska in any proposal which seeks to prevent discrimination against residents of Alaska for employment in the fisheries.

At the close of the year 1939, it was announced by the Bureau of Fisheries that curtailment of fishing in Bristol Bay in 1940 would be necessary to permit an adequate number of salmon to escape to the spawning grounds, as seed, to maintain the run on that particular 5-year cycle. It should be explained here for the benefit of the Members not conversant with the life habits of the salmon, that the salmon are always spawned and hatched in the inland rivers or lakes, go down to the sea at an early age and remain in the sea for several years, inevitably returning to the particular rivers or lakes in which they were spawned and hatched. That fact is so well established by observation that there is no disputing it. The salmon that run in the Bristol Bay area are, as to most of them, salmon that return to the spawning grounds 5 years after they were hatched. The Bureau of Fisheries knew from past records that the runs of salmon in Bristol Bay in 1935, and in 1930, and in 1925 were comparatively light; and so it was evident that a larger escapement than usual should be permitted for 1940; and so the requirements of conservation demanded that there be real curtailment of fishing in Bristol Bay in 1940.

Having in view such curtailment, and knowing the monopolistic device set up and enforced by the nonresident fishermen, it became evident that unless some change were made in that system, few resident Alaska fishermen would be employed in Bristol Bay in 1940. The Alaska fishermen who customarily fish in the Bristol Bay area have no other means of earning a living, whereas the fishermen who reside in the States do have, many of them, opportunities for other employment. As a consequence, the Bristol Bay fishermen sought some way to protect themselves with respect to fishing in Bristol Bay in 1940, and two of their number, Mr Vernon Hilliker and Mr. Ed Dodd, of Anchorage, Alaska, were selected to come to the States to try to secure an agreement with the nonresident fishermen or, that failing, to proceed to Washington in order to obtain aid, if possible, from the Government of the United States in protecting them and their means of livelihood.

The nonresidents having refused to make the desired concessions, Mr. Hilliker and Mr. Dodd came to Washington and asked for the assistance of Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior. They talked with Secretary Ickes and, as Messrs. Hilliker and Dodd later stated to me, the Secretary proffered aid.

In order to avoid any mistake which might arise from failure of my own recollection of what they told me on the subject, I have had Mr. Hilliker relate to me, by telegram dated May 15, the substance of their interview with Secretary Ickes. That telegram is as follows:

Reurtel, cannot quote exact words of Secretary Ickes; but when, during our meeting with him, it was pointed out that there was at present no legal authority to enforce priority for Alaskans. He advised Dodd and myself to go to you and Representative BLAND and try and get your cooperation to cite to you the need of the Alaskans for priority rights in the fisheries of Alaska, so that you might draw up and introduce in this session of Congress measures which give the Alaskans such priority. Advised that his office would support such legislation. Also remarked that legislation would be of great benefit in increasing the permanent resident population of the Territory. Acting Commissioner Jackson and Under Secretary Burlew were also present at this meeting and were apparently in hearty accord with the opinion of Secretary Ickes that the Alaskans merit priority of consideration and that some legal means should be provided which would grant priority this year and in all future years to come. Secretary Ickes asked Commissioner Jackson if the Alaskans could go to the State of Washington or to the State of California and fish, and Jackson advised that the Alaskans could not fish in Washington, as there was a State law which would prevent anyone but residents of the State to fish there. Alaskans could possibly go to California and fish, but it would be very doubtful if they would be granted the opportunity. Ickes then said that he could see no reason why fishermen from the States should be permitted to fish in Alaska, thereby taking the jobs that rightfully belong to residents of the Territory. He said that he believed in organized labor, but he did not believe that any organization in the States which would oppose priority for Alaskans was following the true policy of organized labor.

In accord with his statements to Messrs. Hilliker and Dodd, when the fisheries regulations for 1940 were signed by the Secretary of the Interior and promulgated, the Secretary at the same time under date of January 6, 1940, gave a press release as to the regulations containing the following significant language:

Of outstanding importance is the restriction of commercial salmon fishing in the Bristol Bay area to approximately 50 percent of normal operations. This curtailment for the season of 1940 is necessary in order to rebuild the weak run of the 5-year cycle of red salmon which occurs in the years divisible by 5 in this area. The proposed regulations contemplate that 780 fishing boats will be used in the Bristol Bay area, employing 1,560 fishermen. The Bureau's records show that in years of normal operations approximately 1,200 residents of the Territory have engaged in fishing in Bristol Bay.

It is the belief of the Department that these residents merit priority of consideration in connection with fishing operations.

It is admitted that under present law the Secretary of the Interior has no authority to compel priority for employment of anyone, either resident or nonresident, in any of the fisheries of Alaska, and, therefore, the only thing the Secretary could do, and the only thing that he attempted to do, was to request all concerned in the fishing industry in the Bristol Bay area to give priority of employment to residents of Alaska in that area. This was followed by a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Alvin J. Wirtz, dated January 24, 1940, addressed to each individual cannery concern operating in Bristol Bay containing the following paragraph:

Records show that year by year there has been an increase in the number of Alaska residents fishing in Bristol Bay, the aggregate now being about 1,200 persons. Secretary Ickes has declared that these residents merit priority of consideration in connection with fishing operations. The primary purpose of this letter is to acquaint the industry with the Department's attitude concerning the employment of Alaska residents in the fisheries of that Territory. It is earnestly hoped that the industry will bear this in mind in planning operations this year.

The support given to the cause of Alaskans by the Secretary of the Interior, as first stated to Mr. Hilliker and Mr. Dodd, and which found later expression in the paragraph of the 1940 regulations and in the letter written by Under Secretary Wirtz, which I have quoted, was received in Alaska with satisfaction and sincerely grateful appreciation. It was felt that, at last, Alaska residents had a powerful champion who would do everything possible within the law to help them.

It should be noted here that the 1940 fisheries regulations as approved and promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior were, in the judgment of Alaskans, the best and most favorable fisheries regulations that had been prescribed for Alaska for many, many years. For example, the 1940 regulations forbade the taking of herring in southeastern Alaska waters for reduction into oil, meal, or fertilizer. Those regulations also required the closing of 20 salmon traps, many of which had been particularly harmful to Alaska fishermen.

Since, under the present law, the Secretary of the Interior really has no authority to compel compliance with any request which would prevent discrimination against residents of Alaska for employment in the fisheries, or give them priority as to such employment, I introduced in the House of Representatives three bills which I shall briefly describe:

H. R. 7987, introduced on January 17, 1940, seeks to provide desired priority to residents of Alaska for employment in the fisheries of the Territory by authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior, as a part of the annual fisheries regulations, to make suitable provisions for such priority to residents of Alaska.

H. R. 7988, introduced on the same date, is an attempt to provide for such priority to Alaska residents by requiring that over a period of 5 years the number of Alaskans employed in the fisheries shall be gradually increased so that in the year 1946, and each successive year thereafter, all persons employed in the Alaska fisheries must be residents of the Territory.

H. R. 8115, introduced on January 24, 1940, which has reference to only one year, 1940, and to one fishing district of Alaska, namely, Bristol Bay, and would require that all persons engaged in fishing in the Bristol Bay area in 1940 be residents of the Territory. This bill is, of course, in absolute harmony with the statement of the Secretary of the Interior made simultaneously with the signing and promulgation of the current fishing regulations for the year 1940, requesting that residents of Alaska be given priority in fishing in Bristol Bay during the present year.

While H. R. 7987 and H. R. 7988 covered the same field, my purpose in introducing both of them was to meet any possible objection that might be made as to the methods by which discrimination against residents of Alaska could be prevented, and priority given to those residents, in the fishing industry of the Territory.

At my request, hearings were had on the three bills, jointly, before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, on March 12 and 14, 1940. I made a statement before the committee urging their enactment and advancing the supporting reasons substantially as stated here. The proposed legislation, in principle at least, also had the approval of Hon. Ernest Gruening, Governor of Alaska, and of Mr. Don Carlos Brownell, then mayor of Seward, Alaska, each of whom appeared before the committee and testified personally. I offered to the committee, and received permission to incorporate in the record of the hearings, a number of letters and telegrams from residents of Alaska, Alaska labor union representatives, officials of American Legion posts in Alaska, and private citizens, urging passage of the legislation.

Just before the hearings closed I received from Mr. Hilbert Andersen, agent of the Alaska Fishermen's Union, Bristol Bay branch, who was then in San Francisco, Calif., a letter opposing the legislation, but it appeared from the accompanying copy of telegram that his opposition was, at least in part, based upon the meeting of 23 members of that organization, held in Bristol Bay. Since the organization represented by Mr. Andersen has more than 1,000 members, a majority vote of 17 to 6, at a meeting attended by only 23 members of the Union, did not seem to me to be particularly convincing.

Mr. J. F. Jurich, secretary-treasurer of the International Fishermen and Allied Workers of America, Seattle, Wash., with which the Alaska Fishermen's Union is affiliated, appeared at the hearings, read a brief and testified in opposition to this and other proposed Alaska fisheries legislation.

It is evident, Mr. Speaker, from what I have heretofore said that in presenting this legislation to Congress, that I expected and had reason to expect, powerful support of the Department of the Interior for legislation of the type thus proposed; and it must be further evident that in drafting the several bills mentioned, I endeavored to so phrase them as to meet any possible objection that might be offered to a particular form of draft. H. R. 8115 is almost literally in the language of the Secretary's press release with respect to the Bristol Bay fisheries, and H. R. 7987 is in complete harmony with his statement to Mr. Hilliker and Mr. Dodd when they talked with him on the subject and he suggested legislation by Congress.

At the time of the hearings on the bills, no department reports thereon had been received from the Secretary of the Interior. Later, and on or about May 3, 1940, such reports in the form of letters addressed to the gentleman from Virginia, Hon. S. O. BLAND, chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and signed by Hon. Elbert K. Burlew, Acting Secretary of the Interior, were received by the gentleman from Virginia, Chairman BLAND, who promptly furnished copies thereof to me. Each and all of the reports are adverse, and recommend that the several bills be not enacted. Not only that, but no suggestion is made of any amendment or any substitute legislation for correction of the evils aimed at in the proposed legislation. The three letters are similar, but I quote here the one relating particularly to Bristol Bay, since that is the area in which Messrs. Hilliker and Dodd were principally interested. It is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 2, 1940.

Hon. S. O. BLAND,
Chairman, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLAND: Reference is made to your request for a report on H. R. 8115, introduced by Delegate DIMOND on January 24, 1940, entitled "A bill making provision for employment of residents of Alaska only in the salmon fishery of the Bristol Bay area, Alaska, during the year 1940."

I recommend that the bill be not enacted.

Section 1 of the bill is in the nature of a preamble, stating "that it is in the national interest to increase the permanent resident population of the Territory of Alaska, and to that end it is necessary that residents of the Territory be aided in securing priority of employment in the industries thereof."

Section 2 provides specifically that "during the year 1940, no fishermen shall be employed, either directly or indirectly, in the commercial fishing for or taking of salmon in the Bristol Bay fishing area of Alaska unless such person is a bona fide resident of Alaska and has been such resident continuously for the period of 1 year prior to June 1, 1940."

The Department's regulations for the protection of the fisheries of Alaska in 1940 contemplate that commercial salmon fishing in Bristol Bay will be curtailed to 50 percent of a normal operation. There has been a progressive decline in the abundance of salmon in the Bristol Bay runs in every fifth year since 1915. This decline in the years in question is most striking, because it is unparalleled in the Bristol Bay runs for any other cyclical period. The regulations now in effect will provide for a breeding reserve of sufficient size to partially correct this situation, and it is expected that in the succeeding cycles in 1945 and 1950 this weak run will be fully restored.

The current regulations applicable in Bristol Bay contemplate the operation of 780 fishing boats, or one-fourth less than the number of boats operated in a normal year. As there are 2 fishermen to each boat, it is expected that 1,560 fishermen will be required in the Bristol Bay salmon fishery in the 1940 season. In 1939 about 1,200 of the Bristol Bay fishermen were residents of the Territory; the balance were from the Pacific Coast States. While in a year of limited operations such as 1940 the Territory of Alaska could probably provide all the fishermen required in the Bristol Bay area, the Department is of the opinion that to restrict the fishing for or taking of salmon in the Bristol Bay fishing area to bona fide residents of Alaska, as contemplated by section 2 of the bill, would establish an unwise precedent.

The Department is entirely in agreement with the assumption of the proposed bill that it is in the national interest to increase the permanent resident population of the Territory of Alaska. However, the proposed bill would defeat rather than aid this purpose since it would discourage immigration to Alaska by depriving new settlers of equal opportunities to secure employment. The Department, of course, has the responsibility of administering the fisheries of Alaska, and providing for their conservation. The restrictions contemplated by the bill, however, are not necessary to enable this Department to discharge its responsibilities.

I am informed by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the presentation of this report to the committee.

Sincerely yours,

E. K. BURLEW,
Acting Secretary of the Interior.

In the Acting Secretary's letter reporting upon H. R. 7987, which is similar to the letter relating to H. R. 7988, the following additional reasons are given for opposing the proposed legislation:

The Department is very anxious to develop a stable and permanent population for Alaska. The administrative difficulties, however, in meeting the objectives sought by the bill would be very great and would require, in effect, that an annual census be made of all bona fide residents of Alaska.

Even if actual bona fide residents of Alaska were given priority of employment only with respect to fishing, a considerable number of persons from the States would have to be employed. For example, the records show that in 1938, the latest year for which complete statistics are available, 11,007 fishermen were employed in Alaska. This is apart from 17,077 other persons engaged in connection with the fishery operations in Alaska in that year. In certain important sections of Alaska the population is so sparse that it would be impossible to carry on commercial fishery operations on the present established scale with residents of the Territory only.

The salmon and other fisheries of Alaska are seasonal in character, and during the winter months there is almost complete cessation of fishery activities. In 1938, of the 3,051 fishermen credited to western Alaska, approximately 1,200, or considerably less than one-half, were residents of the Territory, and many of these were from other sections who migrated temporarily to Bristol Bay to engage in the fishery for red salmon.

Not only would the proposed legislation militate against the increase of the permanent population of the Territory, but it would establish a precedent which, if applied by the various States of the Union against Alaskans who may seek temporary employment in the States, would do a good deal of harm to the present population of Alaska.

Apart from the foregoing considerations of policy it should be added that the constitutionality of the proposed discrimination, particularly insofar as it affects employees in processing industries, is questionable.

JUSTIFICATION FOR THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION

It may be said, Mr. Speaker, that the proposed legislation is unique although it is not really so because there is precedent for it in the legislation of several States, notably the States of Virginia and Washington. But whatever may be said of the legislation, conditions in Alaska are unique. I have mentioned the vast area of land and its sparse population. It is obviously in the public interest and in the interest of the Nation as a whole that Alaska should have a much larger resident population. After all, if the Territory is to be of the greatest possible value to the United States and not merely remain a vacant land of forests and meadows and lakes and rivers and reindeer pasture and the abode of wild animals, reasonable encouragement must be given to people who take up their residence in Alaska so that they can really make their homes in the Territory. From comparison of climate and resources and other physical conditions made with respect to Alaska on the one hand, and the Scandinavian countries, including Finland on the other, we have the reasonable assurance that Alaska can easily support a population of several millions.

It is not necessary to say to you, Mr. Speaker, nor to the members of the subcommittee who visited Alaska last summer, that the fishing industry, and particularly the salmon-packing industry, is of outstanding importance to the Territory. It supplies nearly 50 percent of the Territorial revenues. It furnishes a large part of the gainful employment to be had in Alaska. If Alaskans are measurably shut off from that employment, they cannot continue to reside in the Territory unless they may receive, and are willing to accept, some form of relief from the Federal Government. The Territory alone is not able to take care of them if they are unemployed.

Therefore, every consideration of sound national policy demands that we do what we can within reason and under the law to aid in giving employment to the residents of the Territory in the industries of the Territory, including the highly important industry of fishing and fish packing and processing. The opposite policy which contemplates the moving of thousands of workmen from California, or Washington, or Oregon, or some other place in the several States, to Alaska each summer and removing them from Alaska in the fall of each year leaving the Territory vacant and leaving little in the way of permanent structure and no continuous human life therein surely cannot be in harmony with the aims and objectives of the National Government.

What is attempted by the proposed legislation is supported by tradition coming down through the centuries for at least a thousand years of which history has a record. From the earliest times it has been considered that the inhabitants of the upland have the first claim to the fisheries in the marginal sea as against those who come from a distance. Frequently that has been a matter of necessity because if the residents of the shore were prevented from taking the fish of the adjoining sea, they often would have been unable to gain subsistence at all and thereby would have been forced to migrate to another region or else endure the slow ravages of malnutrition or outright starvation.

Historically, of course, the conflict between the inhabitants of the shore, and those who come from a distance, for the fisheries of the seas adjoining the shore has been frequently a conflict between different nationalities. But the principle is the same even if they all belong to the same race and give allegiance to the same flag. The principle, and I think it can be justly called a principle, is that those who reside on the shores of any sea have the first call, or the first claim, or a prior right, whatever it may be denominated, to the fisheries of the adjoining sea as against those who reside in the more remote places.

In Norway, the principle to which I have just adverted has been stated forcefully, and the Norwegians have constantly contended that the inhabitants of the coast who pursued the hard and laborious calling of fishermen should be protected from the intrusion of foreign vessels which may be better equipped and with more capital at their disposal; that a large proportion of the coastal population derive their livelihood from the sea, and that it would be an offense against justice and good morals to have that source of livelihood taken away from them. The subject has found treatment in the works of the law writers who have dealt with the question of jurisdiction in the marginal sea, but I shall now refer to one only, the truly learned and eminent Thomas W. Fulton and to his work, The Sovereignty of the Sea, published in 1911, in which he refers in turn to the writings of Wellwood, Selden, and others.

It is true that the main point discussed by all of these writers is the conflict between different nationals as to jurisdiction over the seas immediately adjoining the shores, but the principle itself is of universal application, and fully sustains and supports such legislation as is here proposed.

There is, then, nothing against natural justice in the suggested legislation, and it has the support of sound concepts of public welfare and highest national interests.

LABOR UNIONS—RESIDENT AND NONRESIDENT

It is claimed that compensation, wages, and conditions of work of fishermen and cannery workers in Alaska have been greatly improved through the operation of the nonresident fishermen's and cannery workers' unions, and to that claim there is much merit. The nonresident workers claim all the credit for improvement of conditions in Alaska in connection with fishing and cannery work, but such an extensive claim is not supported by the known facts. Other unions, comprised mostly of residents of Alaska, have contributed equally to the improvement of conditions, and the present relatively good conditions will be readily maintained and improvements therein made if the nonresident unions should not send a single worker to Alaska.

It is true that the price paid to fishermen in Bristol Bay has increased over the years from 6 cents to 14 cents per salmon, or more, but the price paid to fishermen for the same type of red salmon in southeastern Alaska, a place where the Alaska Fishermen's Union has little if any connection, has increased much more, so that during the past season the fishermen in southeastern Alaska, and in Prince William Sound, received from 20 cents to 30 cents for each red salmon. I cite that fact to show that the residents of Alaska are amply able to take care of themselves through their own unions, and, in fact, they are just as devoted to labor-union principles as are the nonresidents, and perhaps more so.

It is not only in Bristol Bay, Mr. Speaker, that we have discrimination against residents of Alaska in employment in the fisheries. The record of the recent hearings held in Alaska will show other testimony indicating that the residents must maintain a continuous fight to secure employment, and frequently are not employed at all, through the demands of the nonresident workers, or are employed on much less favorable terms than nonresident workers.

Many of the operators now claim that they would prefer to employ residents of Alaska in fishing and in cannery work, but are prevented by the threat of strike, or the declaration of "hot cargo," by the nonresident unions. I am not able to say how much of such declaration is truth and how much is mere pretense. My doubt is based upon the fact that from the earliest days the operators, at practically all times and under practically all circumstances, declined to hire a resident of Alaska in any capacity in the fisheries if a nonresident worker were available. Ordinarily they hired residents only when they could not get nonresidents to do the work, and so now when they say they would like to hire residents if they were permitted to do so, I am still skeptical.

It will be claimed, indeed, it has been claimed, that this is an attempt on the part of Alaskans to break down labor unions and labor unionism, and that the cannery operators are really responsible for the proposed legislation. Any such claim, Mr. Speaker, is completely untrue. There is no vestige of fact or of truth in it.

The discrimination against residents of the Territory, which has continued to be practiced over a period of years and which is now being practiced, is alien to true labor-union principles, just as it is alien to the public welfare. If the leaders of nonresident unions were loyal to the essential principles of unionism, it would not require any legislation or any recommendation even to persuade them to lay down as a policy that the residents of Alaska, who are immediately dependent upon the fishery of the adjoining waters for support, should be given a preference in that fishery; and it does not matter whether that number of residents of the upland should continue to increase over the years as the land is populated. As good citizens and good union men they should welcome the development of the Territory and they, too, should join with the rest of us in an attempt to make it possible for people to live in Alaska by making available to them such employment as there is in Alaskan industry. If the opposite course, and the course now urged by the opponents of giving jobs in Alaska to Alaskans, is carried to its logical conclusion, Alaska will be left a wilderness and few people will ever live there, and we shall have the sad spectacle of thousands of men being transported each year from some place in the States to employment in the Territory and then after a brief period of such employment, returned to their homes in the States leaving nothing behind them for the benefit of the land whose natural wealth they are utilizing, and a further concentration of population in the large cities.

Mr. Speaker, I am such an ardent believer in labor unions that I have often said, and I earnestly believe, that if labor unions did not exist, we would be compelled to invent them as a necessary part of our highly industrialized social organization, to prevent the degradation of human beings by savage commercial competition, to promote the welfare of society, and to insure the perpetuation of free government. I actively supported the collective-bargaining provision of section 7 of the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, the first great modern charter guaranteeing the rights of labor unions, and upheld with like conviction the National Labor Relations Act, approved July 5, 1935, with all of its manifold safeguards for labor unions and labor-union principles. My advocacy of these measures was not merely passive, for as early as the fall of 1933, in a statement broadcast in Alaska, I advised the Alaska fishermen and cannery workers to form a Territory-wide union for the maintenance of their just and lawful rights.

These things were all done long before the people who are now denouncing my efforts for endeavoring to secure jobs for Alaskans had ever established a labor union in Alaska, or for Alaska, which was worth its salt. Therefore, it comes with singularly ill grace from them, whose only interest is to get as much out of Alaska as they can and leave nothing in the Territory for those of us who actually live there, to presume to tell us Alaskans that they are the only ones entitled to speak for labor unions or for labor unionism in Alaska, and boast that they have force enough to compel us to comply with their wishes and that if we do not so comply we will be ruined.

Our people in Alaska must have these jobs if they are to live in Alaska. That is not to the same extent true of those who come into Alaska from the States. In fact, I am reliably informed that many members of the Alaska Fishermen's Union in San Francisco who fish in Alaska have other regular jobs in San Francisco which they quit in order to come to Alaska to fish because the fishing is more profitable than the other jobs. Alaskans are denied this opportunity; generally they have no other jobs and so they must fish or work in the fisheries if they are to live in the Territory.

INVESTMENT OF CAPITAL AND RESIDENCE

It has been urged that if legislation is considered which would give priority to residents of Alaska in the fishing industry of the Territory or would limit work in that industry to residents of Alaska only, a similar restriction should be made as to the investment of money in the Territory by nonresidents of the Territory and as to the operation of industries or plants which are built through such investment. Such a proposal ignores the basic purpose which underlies the legislation now presented, designed to give priority to residents of Alaska in the Alaskan fishing industry. That basic purpose is to promote the settlement and development of the Territory and to aid in maintaining a permanent population in the Territory attached to the land by having gainful employment in Alaska, and that purpose is promoted by the investment in Alaska of capital that is earned elsewhere. Such investments also tend to the development of the Territory and tend, when residents of Alaska are employed, to build up and maintain the population of the Territory. The two go hand in hand. Money brought from the United States and invested in Alaska is ordinarily used, at least in part, in clearing and grading land or in purchase of land, or both, and in the construction of buildings which become a part and parcel of the land itself subject to taxation in the Territory. And thus such investment not only gives employment to the people resident in the Territory, unless they are forbidden such employment at the dictates of those who do not reside in the Territory, but also furnishes a possible source of income to the Territory itself, which works to the benefit and advantage of all of the economic, social, and cultural elements of the people of the Territory.

It must be obvious to anyone that in the beginning of an unpeopled country, particularly a country like Alaska in climate, soil, and topography, the investments of large amounts of capital are necessary in order to have any substantial number of people live or be employed in the Territory. To say that a man shall not invest a dollar in the fisheries, in the mines, or in the other industries of Alaska unless he lives there permanently himself would, of course, make the peopling of Alaska a matter of thousands of years instead of the few years or few tens of years as it should be.

Therefore the proposal that if nonresidents are given second place in the employment in the fishing industry of Alaska in favor of residents, the people of the United States should also be forbidden to invest their money in Alaska unless they live in Alaska themselves, is little better than silly.

THE SETTLEMENT OF ALASKA AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. Speaker, I have already adverted to the position of Alaska with respect to national defense. Its importance is so well recognized that our Government now has under construction two naval air bases, one located at Sitka and the other located near Kodiak, Alaska, and an Army Air Corps experimental station near Fairbanks, Alaska. An Army air base of substantial size and a military post have been authorized for Anchorage, Alaska, and another naval air base for Unalaska; and the money for the constructon of those bases has been appropriated at the present session of Congress. Surely national defense will be promoted by having Alaska populated, by having a native citizenry in Alaska who can participate in that defense. It is hardly necessary to argue that point. A million people in the Territory, or even a few hundred thousand, would immensely promote the safety of the people of the United States. Therefore it is all the more vital that every reasonable effort should be made to increase the population of Alaska and, in any event, to see that the Territory is not depopulated by the enforcement of the mandates of nonresidents of the Territory who insist that they shall have all of the best jobs in Alaska connected with its most-important industry—the fisheries—and that none, or at most few, of those jobs can be enjoyed by residents of the Territory. In advocating what I am urging here I am not only endeavoring to promote the welfare of the people of Alaska but am also trying to advance the welfare and the safety of the people of the United States.

THE LAW

At the outset of our consideration of the proposed legislation, we are confronted with the question as to whether the legislation here before us is in harmony with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

So far as I am aware, no person can answer that question with complete assurance. It appears that the State of Washington some years ago enacted a law limiting fishing to residents of the State. Others have told me that the law is not now enforced. So far as I know, that law has never been challenged in court.

Without entering into an extended discussion of the constitutional features of the proposed legislation, it may be in order to make a brief statement with respect thereto.

Article IV, section 2, of the Constitution provides:

> The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities as citizens in the several States.

And in the fourteenth amendment we find the following:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Obviously the provisions of the fourteenth amendment have no application to the present case, except by remote inference. For the fourteenth amendment is a limitation upon the powers of the States and not a limitation upon the powers of the National Government.

The inquiry may now be made whether any citizen, by the legislation suggested, is being deprived of any right or privilege or immunity under that part of article IV, section 2 of the Constitution above quoted. It is evident that this provision, too, was intended to prevent adverse legislation by a State as to the privileges or immunities of a citizen of another State, rather than by similar adverse legislation by the Congress of the United States. There is no authoritative decision that I know of on the exact point involved.

There are, however, several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which throw some light on the subject and which, to my mind, tend to indicate that the legislation now being sought does not run counter to any provision of the Constitution.

In the Slaughter House cases (18 Wall. 75, 83 U. S. 36), the Court passed upon the validity of an act of the Legislature of Louisiana whereby there was granted to a Louisiana corporation the exclusive right for 25 years to have and maintain slaughterhouses, landings for cattle, and yards for enclosing cattle intended for sale or slaughter within the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and St. Bernard in that State. The enactment was challenged upon the ground that it was in violation of article IV, section 2, and of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. But the Court upheld the law.

In the case of McReady v. Virginia (94 U. S. 391), the Supreme Court of the United States sustained an act of the Legislature of the State of Virginia reading as follows:

> If any person other than a citizen of this State shall take or catch oysters or any shellfish in any manner, or plant oysters in the waters thereof or in the Rivers Potomac or Pocomoke, he shall forfeit $500 and the vessel, tackle, and appurtenances.

The argument was made that the statute of Virginia in question was destructive of the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the Constitution to the citizens of the several States, that is to say, the citizens of other States. However, in an opinion by Chief Justice Waite, the Court sustained the act, holding that, subject to the paramount right of navigation, each State owns the beds of all tidewaters within its jurisdiction and may appropriate them to be used by its citizens as a common for the taking and cultivating of fish; that the citizens of the State thus acquire a property right in the tidelands and to any crops which may be grown therein or thereon; and that the citizens of other States could not justly claim injury by being excluded from fishing in such tidelands.

The authority of McReady against Virginia would appear to be conclusive were Alaska a State instead of a Territory and if the State legislature should enact such legislation as I have proposed. Can it be reasonably argued that with respect to Territories, where Congress may lawfully exercise all the governmental power that exists under the Constitution, Congress is still denied the authority to enact legislation that may be validly enacted by a State? To ask that question would seem to answer it.

If the State of Virginia, under its police power, or any other power which it may exercise within the confines of the Constitution, may limit fishing or employment in the fisheries of the State to residents of the State, then I suggest that Congress, under the exercise of Government authority, which must of fundamental necessity be as broad and as comprehensive as the legislative authority of a State, and particularly exerting its power as a local legislature, fortified and enlarged by its general power over the public domain, may validly pass legislation that will similarly restrict fishing or employment in the fisheries of Alaska to residents of Alaska or will give those residents priority in such work.

The power of the State was again sustained in the case of LaTourette v. McMaster (reported in 248 U. S. 465). In this case a statute of the State of South Carolina was involved, providing that only such persons should be licensed to act as brokers to represent citizens for the placing of insurance with insurers in that State or elsewhere as were residents of the State and had been licensed agents of the State for at least 2 years. This is clearly a case where in the exercise of police power the State has restricted to its residents the performance of certain functions of private business. The act was sustained by the Supreme Court in an opinion rendered by Justice McKenna, holding the legislation to be a valid exercise of the police power of the State. The following is quoted from the opinion:

> "But we need not cast about for reasons for the legislative judgment. We are not required to be sure for the precise reasons for its exercise or be convinced of the wisdom of its exercise." It is enough if the legislation be passed in the exercise of a power of government and has relation to that power. Bast v. Van Deman & Lewis Co. (240 U. S. 342, 365, 366), and cases cited; also Bunting v. Oregon (243 U. S. 426, 437). * * *
> The court (referring to the opinion given in the case by the State supreme court) thus distinguishes between citizens and residents and decides that it is the purpose of the statute to do so, and by doing so it avoids discrimination. In other words, it is the effect of the statute that its requirement applies as well to citizens of the State of South Carolina as to citizens of other States, residence and citizenship being different things.

I invite the attention of the Members to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Haavik v. The Alaska Packers Association (263 U. S. 510). The case concerns an act of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska imposing an annual license tax of $5 upon every nonresident fisherman. The validity of the legislation was contested as being in contravention of the privileges and immunities clause of article IV, section 2, of the Constitution. The Court, in an opinion given by Mr. Justice McReynolds, sustained the law, and in so doing made, with respect to the privileges and immunities clause of section 2, the following observation:

> We are not here concerned with taxation by a State. The license tax cannot be said to conflict with section 2, article IV, of the Constitution—"the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." It applies only to nonresident fishermen; citizens of every State are treated alike. Only residents of the Territory are preferred. This is not wholly arbitrary or unreasonable, and we find nothing in the Constitution which prohibits Congress from favoring those who have acquired a local residence and upon whose efforts the future development of the Territory must largely depend. See Alaska Pacific Fisheries v. United States, supra, and Alaska Fish Co. v. Smith (255 U. S. 44, 47, 48).

In legislating for Alaska in a matter of this kind, I suppose it is reasonably plain that Congress not only acts in its national capacity but also as a local legislature. Congress, in legislating for the Territory, has all of the legislative power of the National Government and all of the legislative power which might be exercised by a local legislature. Congress has general authority and sovereignty and jurisdiction over Alaska, subject, of course, to the provisions of the Constitution. And Congress has the right to exercise as to Alaska the full scope of the police power of the United States without any limitation which might possibly be imposed upon that power in the several States under our dual system of government, wherein we have a "sovereign Nation of sovereign States." In Alaska we are not dealing with a sovereign State, and there we have only the sovereign Nation; and, therefore, in legislating for Alaska, the police power of Congress, subject to the Constitution, is unbounded.

Having in mind the considerations of national welfare and of national defense, which make it advisable that the settlement of Alaska be encouraged, and having in mind the inescapable conclusion that Alaska never will be settled and, in fact, may lose a substantial part of its present sparse population unless Alaskans have a fair opportunity to find employment in the industries of the Territory—the industries of the Territory which are actually carried on in the Territory—I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that under the police power and for the promotion of the general welfare, Congress has a right to take this step to aid in the maintenance of the present population and an increase in the number of the people of Alaska.

Without being frivolous, or being disrespectful toward a coordinate branch of our National Government, it may be well for us to remember that in truth "the Constitution is what the judges say it is." If more than 50 lawyers, among them some of the more eminent members of the bar, could be mistaken before the event as to the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States on the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Act—and, I may parenthetically say, a mistake which was joined in by thousands of other lawyers in the country in reliance upon prior decisions of that high tribunal—then, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we are well justified in not refusing to consider legislation on constitutional grounds, because it may run counter to what some people think is the true import of the United States Constitution, in view of the construction heretofore placed thereon by one or more of the courts. The Supreme Court, by a 6 to 3 majority, in the case of United States of America v. William M. Butler, et al (297 U. S. 1), held the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933 to be in contravention of certain provisions of the Constitution of the United States. But I suppose there is not a single person in our country, lawyer or layman, who believes, or even suspects, that the same act, if now coming before that Court for the first time would be so held invalid. Lately the Supreme Court has sustained local sales taxes and use taxes, which 30 years ago almost every lawyer in the land would have said were clearly unconstitutional. One thing is certain, and that is that the Constitution is a living instrument and that no one should be frightened or deterred from attempting to do a good and useful thing by reason of some past construction placed upon that instrument by even so great a body as the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the hearings had on the bills extensive argument based principally upon law was offered on behalf of the Alaska Fishermen's Union, the nonresident Alaska organization, members of which fish in Bristol Bay, and other affiliated societies. That testimony was presented by Mr. J. F. Jurich, secretary-treasurer of the International Fishermen and Allied Workers' of America, an organization which embraces the Alaska Fishermen's Union.

The law argument presented was in some respects singular indeed. To my surprise, Mr. Jurich, who is a nonresident labor-union representative, cited to the committee as sound law the case of Truax against Corrigan reported in Two Hundred and Fifty-seventh United States, page 312. This case seems to be one of the bulwarks of their argument that the bills in question run counter to the Constitution and particularly are opposed to the privileges and immunities clause of article IV, section 2 thereof, and to the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment.

The case of Truax against Corrigan is probably the one which most strongly holds in favor of the contention of those who oppose the proposed legislation, and we may assume that it is the one most confidently relied upon to support their position. Yet an examination of the opinion of the Court and of the dissenting opinion, and a consideration of present circumstances and conditions and of the later opinions of the same Court, will convince anyone, I think, that Truax against Corrigan is no longer authority and no longer deserving of serious consideration by lawyers or laymen.

At the outset it should be noted that the opinion was given by a Court divided 5 to 4, and that Justices Holmes, Pitney, Clarke, and Brandeis dissented.

The suit arose over the construction of certain provisions of an act of the Legislature of the State of Arizona forbidding the courts to grant injunctions in disputes arising between employers and employees concerning conditions of employment unless injunction was deemed necessary to protect property from injury through violence. It is indisputable, I think, that the main purpose of the law was to prohibit the Court from enjoining peaceful picketing and the boycott, and the precise question for decision was whether the statute transgressed the limitations imposed upon the powers of States by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Without repeating the argument, it is sufficient to say that the majority of the Court, speaking through Chief Justice Taft, held it beyond the power of the Arizona Legislature to enact any such law and held that the legislature had no right, under the due process and equal protection of the law clauses of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, to forbid the courts to enjoin peaceful picketing. The four justices of the minority held that the legislature possessed the power which had been expressed in the statute.

Anyone who is familiar with the recent decisions of the Supreme Court, and particularly the decisions rendered on April 22, 1940, in the cases of Thornhill against State of Alabama, No. 514, and Carlson against People of the State of California, No. 667, must be convinced that the views expressed by the minority and circumstantially presented in the dissenting opinion of Justice Brandeis, in the case of Truax against Corrigan are now the views of the majority of the Supreme Court of the United States as at present constituted, and so the law of the land.

It is singular indeed that representatives of labor unions would run for support to the majority decision in the case of Truax against Corrigan, a decision against the right of peaceful picketing and boycott in labor disputes. Is one to conclude that the gentlemen who rely so confidently on that doctrine must desire to have it extended to all labor disputes at the present time, where it is to their advantage?

PRIORITY FOR NONRESIDENTS DESIGNED TO BE PERPETUAL

That it is the intention of the nonresident fishermen of Alaska to make their iron grip on the Bristol Bay fisheries perpetual is indicated in the testimony somewhat reluctantly extracted from Mr. Jurich. The Alaska Fishermen's Union has said times without number that their books for admission to the Union were closed and that no one else could be admitted. Of course, this closing of the books even if true might be only a temporary expedient and certainly there is nothing in their constitution or by-laws which would forbid them from opening the books whenever a majority of the members, or perhaps whenever a majority of the responsible officers, saw fit to do so. In view of this oft-repeated statement we naturally thought we could rely upon it and that for the present at least the books were really closed to the admission of more members from the States. Such a program if established and adhered to, with the passage of years, would solve our problem of securing employment for the residents of Alaska even though the nonresidents might have the controlling influence for some time to come.

Well, it now appears from the testimony given by Mr. Jurich at the hearings that this claim of having the books of the Alaska Fishermen's Union in San Francisco closed is subject to exceptions. In order to show how far from fact it is, I here quote testimony given by Mr. Jurich before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries during the course of hearings on the bills mentioned:

The CHAIRMAN. Is it your purpose to keep your books closed, so far as the States are concerned?

Mr. JURICH. That is our policy; that is what has been done in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand they have been closed now for a number of years.

Mr. JURICH. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any threatened change of policy in that respect?

Mr. JURICH. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Those people on your books now in the States are people who have formerly fished in Alaska?

Mr. JURICH. Yes; people who have fished in Alaska or members of some affiliate of the International who are experienced fishermen.

The CHAIRMAN. All of them have formerly fished in Alaska?

Mr. JURICH. Not all of them. I want to point out this, Mr. Chairman, that the last year or two when the nets came into existence in Bristol Bay they applied to one of the districts that had experienced gill-net fishermen. The Columbia River area is an example. I do not remember the number exactly, but probably 60 or 70 were transferred from that union into the Alaska Fishermen's Union to fish in that district.

The CHAIRMAN. You are, then, taking on new men from the States to fish in Alaskan waters, are you?

Mr. JURICH. No, sir; we do not tell the employers who they should employ.

The CHAIRMAN. But I mean your books are open to them.

Mr. JURICH. No; not to new people. No new people can go into the union primarily for the purpose of just fishing in Alaska. We have sent, in emergencies, substitute fishermen from other districts to fill in.

That is what Mr. Jurich says. Now it is perfectly plain from that this claim of having the books closed in the States to new members is just plain bunkum. The books of the Alaska Fishermen's Union are really open to all the affiliates. Members of the affiliates can be transferred, and have been transferred, from other unions to the Alaska Fishermen's Union, and then they are sent to fish in Alaska.

In his testimony given in opposition to the bill—pages 47 to 49 of the hearings—Mr. Jurich has given us a list of the affiliates from whom, as from an almost exhaustless reservoir, nonresident fishermen can be drawn for fishing in Alaska, to the exclusion of those who reside in the Territory. The affiliates include:

Columbia River Fishermen's Protective Union, with at least 17 locals.

The Pacific Coast Fishermen's Union, with at least the same number of locals.

United Fishermen's Union of Pacific, with offices and agents in San Pedro, Monterey, Newport, and San Francisco, Calif.; and in Seattle, Poulsbo, Tacoma, Everett, Anacortes, Bellingham, and Gig Harbor, Wash.

The United Fishermen's Union Cannery and Reduction Workers' locals at Everett, Wash.; Monterey, Calif.; Friday Harbor, Wash.; Pittsburg and San Francisco, Calif.

Northern California Fishermen's Union, with offices at Eureka, Fort Bragg, and Crescent City, Calif., as well as a number of directly affiliated cannery and reduction workers' locals.

With this incomplete list, Alaskans may know with what they are faced as to numbers in the affiliates who are eligible, under the present rules and regulations of the Alaska Fishermen's Union, to join that union and thus be given priority for fishing in Alaska.

Now, we would not object to that so much if they took their chances with residents of Alaska, but that they refuse. They insist upon having the first jobs in Alaska. Some of them are men who never fished in Alaska before. They have been or may be transferred from an affiliated union. That shows how much regard some of these men in the States have for their own union members in Alaska. They are willing to displace Alaskans in order to take care of some affiliates who live in the States.

In other words, when they haven't enough men to fill these jobs for which they claim preference in Alaska, they will take in emergency men from other districts to fish in Alaska and thus deprive Alaskans of any chance to get the jobs, because they say, as I quoted from Mr. Lane's letter, that if they can't get the jobs they demand there won't be any fishing in Alaska. There it is. I suggest to you that legislation by Congress or the Alaska Territorial Legislature for the protection of residents of Alaska is amply justified, and that some provision should be made to prevent this outright discrimination against residents of Alaska, just because they reside in the Territory.

A JUST CAUSE

In view of the opposition of the Secretary of the Interior to the enactment of any legislation on the subject, such as suggested by the three bills mentioned, the prospects of enactment of the measures at the current session are much dimmed. Bristol Bay, at least, ought to be protected by permanent legislation, rather than by such requests as may be made by the Secretary of the Interior, requests that he lacks legal power to enforce. The requests are likely to be largely ineffective unless authority is lodged by law in the Secretary of the Interior to make his requests mean something.

However, Mr. Speaker, in spite of this temporary setback, the cause of protecting residents of Alaska against discrimination in employment in the Territories' industries is so eminently just and fair, and that cause is so strongly supported by considerations of national interest and national safety, that, in my judgment, the end that we seek will be obtained if we in Alaska only continue unitedly in support of it. It is a tragedy that anyone residing in Alaska can be opposed to such a cause because the other alternative which involves the bringing into Alaska of thousands and thousands of workmen for some of its best opportunities for industrial employment, carries comparatively little of good to those who are brought in, and, if followed to its ultimate consequence, would result in the extraction of whatever wealth Alaska possesses and then leaving it a barren wilderness.

The other alternative, the one which is advocated by Alaskans, if followed, will inevitably result in bringing about a continuous and increasing settlement of the Territory by citizens of the United States who are willing to live their lives and make their homes there, and thus the welfare of the Territory and of the Nation will be promoted.

Logic and common sense and fair play and sound principles of union organization and administration are on our side, and, therefore, I am confident of the final outcome.

EDITORIALS FROM ASBURY PARK SUNDAY PRESS

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the Asbury Park Sunday Press of July 7, 1940:

[From the Asbury Park (N. J.) Sunday Press of July 7, 1940]

DR. JUDD ASSAILS OUR HELP TO JAPAN

Before expressing too much consternation over the blindness with which France and Great Britain played into Hitler's hands before hostilities began in Europe we should read the speech delivered before the Asbury Park Rotary Club, Wednesday, by Dr. Walter H. Judd. Printed in full in these pages, the address reveals how we are, through economic cooperation, strengthening Japan in Asia and building her up as a direct threat against the United States. Just as the Allies helped Hitler construct his tremendous war machine, so are we supplying Japan with the materials for her conquest of China and a possible assault on American interests. Even should such an assault never materialize, the concern that we feel in contemplating it and our consequent need for a two-ocean Navy may be attributed to our inconsistent economic cooperation with a land in whose peaceful intentions we have no confidence.

Dr. Judd points out that this country supplied Japan with more than one-half of its war materials during the 3 years that it has spent in destroying China and that during the 10 months since hostilities began in Europe we have been furnishing 80 percent of Japan's military needs. Thus we are in the ironical position of sympathizing with China as she vainly tries to stave off Japanese domination while we serve as the arsenal supplying Japan's advancing armies.

There are two factors in this situation that must be removed if we are not to find ourselves in the position of the Allies being devoured by a Frankenstein of our own creation. American shippers must be impressed with the need for sacrificing the war market in Japan and American consumers must be convinced of the need for foregoing cheap Japanese products through the sale of which Japan establishes the credits to purchase war supplies from this country.

Dr. Judd's address should awaken this country from the slumber that permitted certain elements in France and Britain to assist Hitler in building up the war machine that he subsequently directed at them. So long as we recognize Japan as a menace to peace in the Far East and as a potential threat to this country simple patriotism demands that we cease supplying her with war materials that might be turned upon us and against which we are already spending millions in defense.

JAPANESE INVASION

Japan's invasion of Indochina is the result of no new plan. For 45 years the Japanese have been making successive moves toward domination of eastern Asia.

Until recent years they have been driven back by the strength of the western powers. But for the present, at least, western opposition has faded in effectiveness.

After the war between China and Japan 45 years ago the western powers forced Japan to renounce most of her gains. Again, after the World War, Japanese ambitions in Asia were curbed. But in 1931 Japanese troops marched into Manchuria and 3 years later the Peiping incident started the war with China which has not yet ended.

Many believe Japan could have been stopped in 1931 had England been willing to cooperate with the United States. But England refused to act with this country and appeasement began.

Now the war in Europe, Allied disasters, and the divided problems of the United States have made Japan more bold than ever.

Many things are at stage in Japan's newest move. The war with China for one. Chiang-Kai-Shek has been obtaining supplies from French Indochina and British Burma. Japan hopes to cut off both routes.

At stake also are the European concessions in Chinese cities and the colonies of the western nations. Indochina, a French protectorate, is larger than France itself and is rich in zinc, tin, and coal. Hong Kong, British-owned island south of Canton, is a center of British trade in South China. The Netherland Indies produces oil, tin, rubber, rice, tea, coffee, and sugar and are among the richest prizes of the east.

Relief for Flooded Areas in Louisiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NEWT V. MILLS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and telegrams:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT REPORTS,
Washington, D. C., July 22, 1940.

Hon. NEWT V. MILLS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MILLS: In reply to your telephone conversations regarding possible assistance of Federal agencies to farmers in northern Louisiana who have suffered serious losses because of excessive rains, I am glad to submit the following information:

We have discussed with officials of the Farm Security Administration, the Farm Credit Administration, and the Work Projects Administration, the assistance they can and will be able to render to meet the present emergency.

Reports that have been received by these agencies indicate that while the present situation is serious, it is expected that the real needs will be more acute during the fall and winter months. The Farm Security Administration has notified their regional office to make loans for seed, for livestock feed crops, seed potatoes, seed for gardens, and for any purpose that will enable farmers to plant crops which will mature before the winter months. Families who are unable to obtain assistance for immediate needs will be given emergency grants provided they meet the usual requirements for rehabilitation aid.

The Work Projects Administration will increase the Louisiana quota, if and when it is determined that the Farm Security Administration cannot adequately cope with the situation. Officials of that agency believe, however, it will not be necessary to substantially increase their present operation at this time.

The Farm Credit Administration will not be able to be of any material assistance, as they make loans only for production and harvesting of crops. As it will be too late to plant a cash crop this year, the agency will not be in a position to assist until next spring. Officials of this agency in Louisiana have been instructed to adopt a very liberal collection policy. In other words, they are not to press for collection, any outstanding loans to the Farm Credit Administration where the borrower has suffered from the excessive rains during the past few weeks.

As soon as the agricultural report for July is available for study, other conferences will be held between the interested agencies, and further plans will then be made depending upon the results of the study.

We have had our State director for Arkansas make a number of reports on the situation. The information furnished by him has been turned over to other agencies to assist them in developing their program for farmers in Louisiana.

If there is any further assistance this office can render, please feel free to call on us.

Sincerely yours,

ADDISON G. FOSTER,
Executive Officer.

Hundreds of people northeast Louisiana have petitioned my office for relief due to rains. Personally studied the farming condition of my section last week and found the condition destitute. Please have study made of people's needs. Thanks.

NEWT V. MILLS, M. C.

Mr. Speaker, throughout northeast Louisiana we have received more rain recently than in any other similar period of time since 1900 or probably 1905.

The condition among the people is of such nature that thousands of farmers have been practically forced to abandon their crops due to rain. Naturally my people are very much grieved over the fact that we have been forced to call upon the Federal Government for aid, but the circumstances being unavoidable, we have appealed to several Federal agencies for assistance, and our petition has been met with favor for which we are very thankful.

I submit as part of these remarks a letter I received from the Executive Office of the President, Office of Government Reports, as to the type of aid that will be given my people; however, in addition I was advised that the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation will furnish to needy families commodities, but it will be necessary for such persons in need to make known their interest to the various public welfare offices.

Further, as part of these remarks I submit copies of telegrams I have forwarded to the various Federal and State agencies of Louisiana asking that immediate study be made as to the needs of the people, and also copy of telegram I wired various papers of Louisiana and Gov. Sam H. Jones.

William Jennings Bryan Memorial Breakfast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPHUS DANIELS, AMBASSADOR TO MEXICO

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege on Wednesday morning, July 17, in the city of Chicago, during the Democratic National Convention, to attend a memorial breakfast for William Jennings Bryan, at which approximately 250 persons were present. In the honor guest list were Gov. Roy Cochran, of Nebraska, and former Gov. John Moorhead of the same State; Congressman Robert Doughton, of North Carolina; James A. Marsh, Democratic National Committeeman from Colorado, and Mrs. Mary Bryan Allen, sister of William Jennings Bryan.

The memory of that occasion will continue with me through the years, not alone for the spirit in which the friends of the former Great Commoner met, but also because of the unusually effective address delivered by the Honorable Josephus Daniels, Ambassador from this country to Mexico.

Among the speakers were Senators Johnson of Colorado and Lee of Oklahoma; Hon. Edward Keating, former Member of the House of Representatives and manager and editor of Labor; William Allen White, noted journalist, of Emporia, Kans.; Congressman A. J. Sabath, of Illinois; William Hutchison; H. H. Hanks, and others. All of these gentlemen paid eloquent tribute to the memory of one of the truly great and good men of America.

During my brief remarks, I suggested that the principal address by Ambassador Daniels was of such real quality and fine content that it should be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I insert it at this point, believing that those who read will gain both inspiration and knowledge from its contents:

"I think if you will be quiet I can make myself heard" was the first sentence audible to the packed galleries in the Democratic convention in Chicago 44 years ago when the young Lochinvar out of the West won the leadership of the Democratic Party. "I was leaving the hall, tired because none of the speakers could make themselves heard above the confusion, when that sentence with flute-like resonance fell upon my ears," Dr. Franklin Martin told me years after. It was the first time Bryan's voice had been raised in a national convention. The ablest statesmen in the party, Hill and Russell and Daniels, in the packed, superheated hall had vainly tried to speak above the din. But "the heaven-sent Bryan," as Vachel Lindsey called the Nebraskan, without any apparent effort, reached the ear and thrilled every listener in the remotest gallery. You could feel that they literally hung upon his words, charmed by the music of the timbre of his voice as well as by the logic of his argument. He closed with the famous sentence that electrified his listeners. As the climax of the most remarkable speech in the annals of American political oratory, Bryan declared with the seriousness of a prophet of old and with the beauty of the purest rhetoric "You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns; you shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold." That gem of eloquence comes back today to all of us privileged to have been present with all its cadence as it lifted hypnotized men to a new and holy consecration, and as it moved hardened convention-goers into an enthusiastic demonstration without precedent.

BRYAN LIVES IN MEMORY

Two score and 4 years have passed since Bryan captivated that great gathering. In the same environment as in 1896, I seem to hear again that voice of mingled sweetness and challenge and feel again the thrill that comes but once in a lifetime. Many thought and said an unknown man had captured the convention by one speech. Not so; Bryan did not suddenly reach that pinnacle. Behind that memorable hour was a brilliant record of achievement in the Halls of Congress and on the hustings. He had won two elections to the National House in rock-ribbed Republican districts in Nebraska. He had charmed "listening Senates" in a noble argument for tariff reform. In the battle between giants in the epoch of silver discussions the pebble in the sling of the young David from Nebraska had compassed the political death of more than one political Goliath.

Bryan's voice—the voice of a John the Baptist crying "make straight the path"—was raised in every part of the Republic in the succeeding days. The people crowded to hear the advocate who felt the ills under which they suffered. From East to West the forgotten and burdened welcomed him as their spokesman as he plead their cause which had lacked a leader. Those living on incomes derived from monopoly and enjoying the fat of the land raged in jittery fear lest he would win. Political and clerical Brahmins exhausted their vocabulary of hard names. Never in history has a sincere man spoken bravely in behalf of the oppressed without inciting the hate and opprobriums of those enjoying unearned possessions. The greater his sincerity the more their vindictiveness. Jefferson was a Jacobin, Jackson a demagogue. It is the price a great soul must pay to ring true against caste, privilege, and exploitation.

Bryan scared half of the plutocrats out of their wits, so that they opened their purses to buy the election in an orgy of corruption and coercion which had never before disgraced the Republic. Bryan's blaze-of-glory campaign not only enthused his followers, it also attracted many who came to scoff and remained to pray. It extorted a remarkably appreciative pen picture of the campaign from the wife of the most scholarly leader of reaction. In a letter written after the election to Cecil Spring-Rice, long-time British Ambassador to the United States, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge gave her British friend this illuminating comment upon a campaign waged against all for which her husband stood:

"The great fight is won. It was a fight conducted by trained and experienced and organized forces, with both hands full of money, with the full powers of the press—and of prestige—on the one side; on the other, a disorganized mob at first, out of which burst into sight, hearing, and force—one man, but such a man! Alone, penniless, without backing, without money, with scarce a paper, without speakers, that man fought such a fight that even those in the East can call him a crusader, an inspired fanatic—a prophet! It has been marvelous. * * * His speeches spoke to the intelligence and hearts of the people with a capital P. He almost won."

Mrs. Lodge might truly have added "Bryan did win, but he shares with Tilden the distinction of being denied the fruits of victory." However, that would have been an indictment of her husband's party not to be expected.

BRYAN KEPT FIGHTING

Sixteen years after he had captured the convention in Chicago I sat again in the Baltimore convention under the spell of Bryan's power to move men. In Chicago, he won for himself the nomination for the Presidency. In 1912, gone was the lute tone that at Chicago had been as pleasing as the strains of a Mendelssohn composition by the master of a great instrument. Gone was the suppleness and the grace that made him an Apollo. But in its place had come out of long contests against privilege, the strength and courage of a noble crusader. He had buried ambition for political honors. Only devotion to a cause dominated his actions. He had come to believe, rather slowly, that Wilson incarnated the liberalism to which he had consecrated his life. Just as at Chicago Bryan's mastery of a convention won him the victory, so at Baltimore, in a historic conflict, Bryan made possible the selection of Woodrow Wilson as President of the United States. If there had been no fighting Bryan at Baltimore, it is my deliberate judgment, based upon my participation in the organization to nominate Wilson, America and the world would have been denied the statesmanship of Wilson in the high office in the great days when in peace and in war Wilson was recognized as the foremost chieftain of the world. If his own countrymen and others had followed Wilson in 1919, the present holocaust would have been averted.

Among permanent achievements of Bryan's public career, to name only a few, are the writing and compelling the insertion in the Wilson-Gorman Tariff Act of the graduated income and inheritance taxes. When by a mysterious change of one vote, the Supreme Court declared the levy of an income tax unconstitutional, it was Bryan who began and led the long campaign which resulted in the submission and ratification of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution. If the name of the man chiefly responsible for a constitutional amendment was attached to it that amendment would bear the inscription "Made by William Jennings Bryan." The same inscription would go on the sixteenth amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by the people; and the amendments for woman suffrage and national prohibition. No man since the reconstruction days has left his impress upon the Constitution to such an extent as Bryan. Likewise much reform legislation owed its inception to his advocacy, including the law forbidding contributions by corporations to campaign funds and requiring the publication of all contributions to political campaigns. It was Bryan's championship of the Federal Reserve System in a crucial time that contributed to ending an antiquated system.

A MAN OF PEACE

The perspective of time alone can properly appraise the place of Bryan among the distinguished men who have served as Secretary of State. In Bryan's incumbency of that office he was Secretary of Peace. His policies, exemplified in his 30 peace treaties foreshadowed the spirit of the League of Nations, the Kellogg-Briand treaties for the outlawry of war, and all the attempts to substitute arbitration for force. When asked by the Japanese Ambassador in an acute situation, "Is this the last word?" Bryan gave the answer, "There is no last word between friends." That inspirational sentiment ought to be engraved in letters of gold over the door of every chancelry in the world.

Bryan's principle of consistent opposition to dollar diplomacy and the use of the "big stick" in dealing with small nations has grown into the doctrine of "the good neighbor" and the hope of Western Hemisphere solidarity against penetration.

Controversy continues over the wisdom of Bryan's resignation from the Wilson Cabinet because he felt the policy adopted would carry our country into war, as it did. I have always believed he should have remained with the ship. Whatever may be the final verdict of Bryan's course in those troubled days, his Government has now approved his insistence that it was wiser for Americans not to assert the right of traveling on ships voyaging through the zone of war. Bryan is vindicated, whereas in 1916–18 he was derided.

When passion has subsided, the historian will write Bryan's name high among the great men who followed Jefferson in the high office of Secretary of State and as an illustrious patriot who never sold the truth to serve the hour. In confidence in that verdict we gather to do honor today to William Jennings Bryan and pray that others called to leadership will be as steadfast in devotion to the common weal as the sincere and eloquent Commoner.

Another Demonstration of Overwhelming Public Sentiment for the Ludlow War Referendum

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, every time there is a test of public opinion on my proposal to amend the Constitution so as to give the people a right to vote on proposals to participate in overseas warfare public sentiment rallies amazingly and overwhelmingly to its support.

Time after time tests have been made and the result is always and invariably the same. Five Gallup polls showed by large and decisive majorities that the people want this amendment written into the Constitution. The latest test was under a system of balloting conducted by the American Forum. In an announcement giving the results of the balloting the American Forum says:

A further indication of the pick-up in peace sentiment in this country since the surrender of France is the readers' vote on the latest issue submitted by Theodore Granik's American Forum.

On July 6 the American Forum presented a debate in the News on the question, "Should war be declared only by popular vote?" between Representative LOUIS LUDLOW, sponsor of the war-referendum bill, and Assistant Secretary of War Louis Johnson. Representative LUDLOW received 67.8 percent of all ballots and letters sent in by readers and Mr. Johnson 32.2 percent.

This closely parallels the vote of the previous week on compulsory military training. Additional returns from Massachusetts on this debate give Senator NYE, who opposed the idea, a national total of 65.4 percent against James H. R. Cromwell.

In the Ludlow-Johnson debate, Representative LUDLOW carried all States represented except Texas and Kentucky, where a close vote slightly favored Mr. Johnson, and New York, which split 50-50. The Ludlow margins varied from a bare majority in Massachusetts to a 4-to-1 vote in Pennsylvania.

Regional differences did not figure. States from which ballots and letters were received included Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, the District, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, and Texas.

NOBODY FOR IT BUT THE PEOPLE

It has been truthfully said that nobody is for my proposition but the people of America. Just the people—that is all. The plain, common people, who when war comes have to suffer and if need be to die, and to bear the unspeakable burdens and costs and griefs of war. The people are weary over war hysteria, and they long to see peace stabilized in America.

I do not claim to be a prophet, but I predict that the time will come when the people, growing sick of being made the victims in the grim and tragic game of war, and losing faith in the weasel words of politicians, will arise in their might and will see to it that this great democratic principle, a referendum on overseas wars, is added to the Bill of Rights in the Constitution of the United States.

American People Are Face to Face With Grave Decision

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the American people are face to face with a grave decision. They must make a choice next November between fundamental Americanism—the Bill of Rights—constitutional government—and a government by men instead of by laws.

The convention at Chicago, controlled and bossed completely by President Roosevelt and his New Deal henchmen, including the unsavory Boss Hague, of New Jersey, Mayor Ed Kelly, of Chicago, Jake Arvey, and other fellow travelers of the underworld gangsters, made this choice inescapable.

The effort now on the part of the new dealers will be to argue that after all an American tradition is not sacred and that in these strange times tradition cannot be allowed to stand in the way of efficiently meeting threats and menaces from abroad.

The great and dangerous flaw which the American people must reject is that no threat or menace from the outside is as grave or as dangerous as this open, bold, and insolent threat to free government and the Bill of Rights emanating from the White House in the Nation's Capital.

The American tradition against a third term was born out of the certain knowledge of the American people that any argument or excuse for a third term is an equally valid argument or excuse for a fourth and a fifth and a sixth term, and for a life tenure. If Franklin D. Roosevelt by reason of his ability and experience is the only man in America capable of being an efficient President now, he will be all the more indispensable after serving a third and a fourth term. There is not one single reason, there is not one single argument, for a third term which cannot be used for a life tenure of office for Franklin D. Roosevelt. The American people are convinced, and have been convinced all these years, that successive terms or life tenure in the office of the Presidency would inevitably lead to a political, or if not, a family dynasty, and would result in such a President being succeeded if not by an heir apparent, certainly by someone whom he would choose.

Of course, it is to be expected that an administration that has had 65 "crises" and "emergencies" in 7 years, and that has made and broken 57 major promises in 7 years, would not hesitate, and will not hesitate, to have another "emergency" and to make more promises in order to lure the people into acceptance of a violation of the third-term rule.

The manner in which the nomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt for a third term was brought about in Chicago, and the exhibition of cold ruthlessness in Mr. Roosevelt's method of shoving Henry A. Wallace down the convention's throat as the Vice Presidential nominee, are the most accurate, striking, and outstanding evidences of Mr. Roosevelt's desire to dictate, of his intention to dictate, and the way in which he will dictate to a political party or a nation over which he has gained control.

With the sordid picture of the Chicago convention in mind, the people should recall another picture—that of Mr. Roosevelt down in Georgia in the dead of night with his nightshirt flapping about his limbs, calling the press representatives from their slumbers to declare to the country that he had no desire to be a dictator. No one can take those two pictures and put them together without realizing how far the New Deal administration has driven this Nation down the road to one-man government.

It is perhaps a good thing that the issue is clearly drawn, because we might just as well find out in 1940 whether a majority of the American people believe in the continuance of fundamental Americanism—and there is not the slightest doubt that they do.

The American people ought not to forget, and they will not forget, the insult offered their intelligence when Mr. Roosevelt sat in the White House and seriously—or apparently seriously—stated to the Nation that all of his friends who knew him well had known for a long time he did not desire a third term and was yearning to retire to private life. If any of Mr. Roosevelt's friends knew any such thing, they have certainly set a world's record for keeping a secret. Of course, nobody believes any such thing—least of all probably Mr. Roosevelt himself.

Anyway, inasmuch as the whole emphasis now will be laid by the new dealers on the great sacrifice that Mr. Roosevelt will undergo to serve his Nation a third term, the gratitude of the Nation, it is to be hoped, will be such, and its desire to spare him further trials and tribulations will be such, that in spite of his willingness to submit himself to the rigors of further public service, the people will retire him to that peace and privacy for which he says he so yearns.

Fort Howard, Baltimore County, Md., Site for New Veterans' Administration Facility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. COLE, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, Fort Howard, which is located in my home county of Baltimore, is to be abandoned as an Army post. The history of this beautifully located garrison is of such interest that any attempted abandonment of it would be protested but for the fact it is to be used for other highly desirable governmental purposes. It is a great relief to me, interested as I have been for a number of years in trying to bring about the location of a veterans' facility in Baltimore and vicinity, to find that this wonderful site at Fort Howard, abandoned by the War Department, is to be transferred to the Veterans' Administration for use in accordance with such plans as the Bureau will develop in the future.

For the information of the many residents of Maryland interested in both the future of Fort Howard and the establishment of a veterans' facility in the State, I publish herewith a portion of a letter which I just received from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 23, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM P. COLE, JR.,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. COLE: The President has recently approved a plan for an increase in the number of troops stationed in the vicinity of the National Capital, and in accordance therewith I desire to inform you in advance of publicity that the War Department has decided to discontinue the use of Fort Howard, Md., as an active post, and transfer the present garrison to the Arlington Farm site, Fort Myer, Va.

The above action will not only unite all components of the Twelfth Infantry in one location but will permit the larger units to operate as a team. The War Department considers it essential that, wherever practicable, the larger tactical units of the various arms must act as a team in combat should be so associated and trained in peace. The separation of tactical groupings in small isolated posts, such as Fort Howard, tends to adversely affect their readiness for instant service.

Fort Howard has been made available for transfer to the Veterans' Bureau, which is now making plans for its development.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

Commenting on the abandonment of Fort Howard, the Baltimore morning Sun, edition of Wednesday, July 24, had a most interesting statement of its history. The news article to which I refer is, in part, as follows:

The fort, established in 1896 as a coast-artillery defense station for Baltimore, will be transferred from the United States Army to the Veterans' Administration.

MOVE STARTED BY LEGION

The fort is at North Point, which juts out between the Patapsco River and the Chesapeake Bay approximately 14 miles southeast of Baltimore, and the Point's history goes back to 1662.

"North Point was first taken up," says the fort record, "by Messrs. William Batten and Thomas Thomas in 1662. In 1664 Mr. Thomas Todd, son of Capt. Thomas Todd, came from Virginia and bought the land."

NAMED AFTER GENERAL HOWARD

In 1896 the Government purchased 145 acres on the point from the Elizabeth Gunther estate. The first mortar battery was placed and a 900-foot wharf was constructed the following year. Battery E, Fourth Artillery, arrived to garrison the fort on June 27, 1899.

By various condemnation proceedings, begun in 1896, the fort was enlarged to 245 acres. The post was named Howard after Gen. John Eager Howard, one of Maryland's officers in the Revolutionary Army.

The fort also is the site of the famous stand made by the Stricker Battery at the Battle of North Point in 1814.

BRITISH REPULSED

After the British had marched on Washington, Wellington's Invincibles and Nelson's marines landed at North Point under the command of General Ross as part of their general campaign to capture Baltimore, and were repulsed by the Americans, most of whom were Baltimoreans.

The Twelfth United States Infantry, which celebrated its one hundred and forty-second anniversary on July 3, was organized July 1, 1798. It was reorganized in 1812 to participate in the defense of Fort McHenry, the Battle of Lundy's Lane, and operations of the Niagara frontier.

SERVED IN CIVIL WAR

It was one of the first contingents which entered Mexico City in 1848 and had a part in the Battles of Gettysburg, Manassas, Antietam, Petersburg, and Chancellorsville in the Civil War.

The regiment also participated in suppressing two Philippine insurrections.

Several times the regiment has been disbanded and reorganized. It has been in constant service since 1861. During the World War it was stationed at Norfolk.

At present there are approximately 300 men at the fort. The normal complement of 600 will be reached in 9 days when 300 return from special duty at other posts.

ONCE SOUGHT AS A PARK

The selection of the Fort Howard site was made by the Federal Hospitalization Board. Since the ground is Government-owned, the $100,000 included in President Roosevelt's deficiency bill for the purchase of a site will be saved.

Fort Howard is located in Baltimore County, which is my home county. Naturally I am more than delighted with a decision of all those in authority and especially the Veterans' Administration and the President of the United States, who agreed with the petition of the veterans and their friends in Maryland, and finally brought into accomplishment that which all of us have looked forward to for so many years.

It is easy for me to prophesy that shortly after the transfer of Fort Howard to the Veterans' Facility by rehabilitating some of the old buildings and in erecting new and modern structures for hospital use, that the entire completed project will present one of the most attractive and best located Veterans' Facilities in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the members of the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans, Spanish War Veterans, Jewish War Veterans, Veterans Association of All Wars and their various auxiliaries, upon the determination, persistent, and convincing fight they have made for this improvement and for the tremendous help they have been to the Maryland delegation in the Senate and House in Washington whose duty it was to sponsor the necessary legislation which we did successfully, and which could only have been done with such support as referred to being back of it. I am sure all the veterans, their dependents, and friends join with me in thanking the Veterans' Administration and especially our fellow Marylander, Col. George Ijams, for the wisdom they have displayed in advancing Maryland's claim and in supporting the very fine solution to our problem which has just been announced. Many thought last year, when the actual appropriation for the hospital was put aside at the request of the President because of national-defense needs, that our fight was lost, but it now appears that in our decision the President was most wise and has resulted to much better advantage and far more acreage and greater advantages for the hospital than would have possibly been obtained under the appropriation which was at the time anticipated.

Mercy Ships for Refugee Children

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, July 22, I offered an amendment to the Neutrality Act, in order to permit American ships to transport English and other refugee children from the war zone. These ships will fly the American flag in a prominent position and shall be plainly marked as to their mission, to enable them to make these errands of rescue of humanity. Nazi bombers from above, or submarines, would not dare bomb ships of this character, when so plainly identified as American ships carrying refugee children.

Such vessels unmistakably marked as Red Cross ships are now marked, would lead to no danger or casualties. They could plainly be painted with the American flag and high letters could identify them as rescue ships. Electric lights at night could be used to mark them as mercy ships. The Nazis would not dare fire upon them. There is no danger, therefore, of war involvement. There is no British war propaganda connected with my bill. The saving from slaughter is not limited to British children. Infants of all nationals—Belgian, French, Dutch, German—may be saved from the coming holocaust on the fortress island of Great Britain. Prime Minister Churchill in his recent statement does not bar the rescue of children. He does not prohibit children from leaving. He simply called attention to difference of opinion in England as to the advisability of sending children to America because of dangers of transportation. He specifically said that the evacuation program was postponed, not abandoned.

Thousands of homes in America are now available for these unfortunate children. Scores of committees and organizations will supply all necessary funds. Let us start the ships on "errands of mercy" at once. There will be no distinction as to wealth, creed, color, or nationality.

There are a number of ships of the United States Lines, now idle, which could readily be used, including the Washington and the Manhattan. Both these ships contemplate tours along our coastal regions. They could easily be diverted in this humanitarian cause. I have just received an invitation to voyage from Virginia to New York on the new United States liner America. This is one of our best, fastest, and most luxurious liners built in the United States. This ship likewise, could enter such rescue service.

The ruthless slaughter of English children must be averted. The State Department has removed the last vestige of formality in order to have English, as well as any Belgian, Dutch, or other child refugees now in England, brought to this country, in order to save them from the widely advertised Nazi reign of terror. These children may not enter as immigrants or as visitors.

Furthermore, the administration, with a deep sense of the humanities involved, has made it unnecessary to require, in each individual instance, an affidavit of support from a relative or a friend of each child. The corporate form of affidavit has now been approved, so that a responsible charitable organization, such as the United States Committee for the Care of European Children, may now guarantee the support of as many children as their funds permit. Therefore, children without friends or relatives in this country shall be assured of support while they remain here.

The Nazi Stukas will not discriminate, and children will be struck down by the thousands. Such a holocaust is unthinkable. We have a paramount duty to evacuate these English children, as well as any Belgian, Dutch, or other child refugees now in England. This should be done as quickly as possible. Thousands of Americans have offered their homes, and over 500 institutions have signified their willingness to care for these unfortunates.

However, England cannot supply ships to transport these children. She needs all her ships and convoys for home defense. We can readily supply these "mercy" ships. The Neutrality Act stands in the way, however. Sending our ships into belligerent waters would be a violation of the act, despite the fact that such voyages were to rescue children. This act must be amended to permit American ships on such an errand to enter the war zone just as American Red Cross ships, carrying food and medical supplies, are exempt from the act.

My bill specifically provides that the ships must have "safe conduct." That means, under the terms of the Neutrality Act, safe conduct must be guaranteed by the nation blockaded or subject to attack, as well as the nation attempting the blockade or attacking the first nation. This means that we would have to first get the consent of England and France in order to send these ships to North Ireland where the children could embark. Should these ships proceed to England or Ireland without such "safe conduct," there would be danger of a German bomber sinking the ships. This would create such hysteria and excitement in this country as to probably result in war involvement, as was the case with the sinking of the Lusitania during the World War.

Furthermore, only organizations certified by the State Department could charter such rescue ships. Otherwise, any organization could send out a ship. This would create chaos. The State Department would only recognize such organizations as were controlled by able persons and who were well financed.

Only children under 12 years of age would be eligible for rescue. They would not come in as immigrants; they would come in as visitors. If children over 12 were admissible, they might be induced to take jobs. This would impinge upon the rights of American labor.

I set forth herewith a copy of the bill under discussion.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4, as amended, of the Neutrality Act of 1939 is amended by inserting "(a)" after "Sec. 4," and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) the provisions of section 2 (a) and the provisions of section 3 shall not prohibit the transportation by vessels of United States registry in ballast, unarmed, and not under convoy, of refugee children, not over the age of 12 years, fleeing from war zones, together with such officials and adult personnel in charge as are members or employees of suitable and well-recognized organizations approved and certified by the Secretary of State, if such vessel is proceeding under safe conduct granted by all of the states named in the proclamations issued under the authority of section 1 (a), and if such vessel has painted prominently, distinctly, and unmistakably on each side thereof an American flag and a statement that such vessel is a refugee child rescue ship of the United States or under United States registry, so that night or day there can be no mistake as to the identity of such vessels."

United States Junior Chamber of Commerce Annual Meeting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN J. MAAS

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ADDRESS OF PHILIP D. REED

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Mr. Philip D. Reed before the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce:

I am told that the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce comprises approximately 100,000 young business and professional men between the ages of 21 and 35 and that you come from every State in the Union, as well as Hawaii and Alaska. May I say that the very existence of the junior chamber as an active, vital agency for the exchange of views and the development of leadership is a most heartening and reassuring thing in these dark days.

I venture to say that every one of you in this room feels deeply and personally the responsibility shared today with older men, but which in the course of a few short years will be transferred almost wholly to your generation—the responsibility of guiding, directing, and administering the destiny of the United States of America. What that task will comprise, what new conditions will then exist, no one can accurately foretell. But it requires no clairvoyance to see that the next 5 years will in all likelihood be the most vitally important ones in the history of our Nation. The things to be done during that period, the legislation to be adopted, the leadership to be developed, the reaction and response of the American people to the events which lie ahead in the struggle between dictatorship and democracy will, in my judgment, irrevocably fashion the pattern of life to which we younger men, our children, and our children's children will of necessity conform.

The interests, therefore, of the generation you represent are greater in terms of the years ahead than those of any other part of our adult population. It follows that your generation must not only make its influence felt during these formative years, but that it must base its judgments and its action upon a real understanding of the issues, the trends, and the problems with which we as a nation are confronted.

Today we are in the first throes of organizing an enormous program of national defense. No one, I think, will doubt this country's need of greatly enlarged military, naval, and air defenses. To accomplish this herculean task quickly, efficiently, and well there must be the closest kind of cooperation and teamwork between government, industrial management, and labor. It is inconceivable that there should be a lack of it from any quarter, for the ultimate purpose and objective of this program is the preservation of our homes, our institutions, and our way of life. Patience and understanding will be needed. Delays and disappointments will occur. Sacrifices and concessions will be required. But as Americans all—and always—with the vitality and resourcefulness and organizational ability that have enabled us to create the greatest and most efficient production machine in history, we will do this job, and we will do it well.

One month from now our two great political parties will have selected their candidates for high office and the campaigns will be getting under way. The responsibility that falls upon the delegates charged with the duty of selecting the presidential and vice-presidential candidates in this period of world crisis is exceeded only by that which must rest upon the shoulders of the men selected.

The great issues today are not those we are accustomed to associate with party politics. They are cosmic questions, affecting on the one hand our relationships and ability to live with the other peoples of the world, and on the other hand the review and redetermination of our own doctrines of self-government. As normal human beings we all want to find the right answer to these vitally important questions. There can be no doubt of the sincerity and loyalty of our political, industrial, and labor leaders. But they and all of us must recognize before it is too late that the problems before us are far larger than the individual interests of any party, section, or group.

Large portions of the world's population have in recent years surrendered democratic freedom for dictatorship. The state has replaced the individual. These changes abroad have evidenced themselves in this country in many small ways. Each step is comparatively insignificant when taken by itself, but in the aggregate they constitute a definite and unmistakable trend toward centralization and enlargement of government powers and toward government by men rather than by laws.

We have been through 10 years of serious economic disorder. During that period we have made progress in certain directions, but none at all in others. For example, no one can question the fact that very real social progress has been made. The value and desirability of these accomplishments from the social standpoint are self-evident. Nor would any of us wish to see them lost, if we as a Nation can support and justify their continuation. The difficulty is that social legislation almost invariably costs money, large sums of money, and can be supported only if the economic condition of the country is healthy and prosperous. We all agree, I am sure, that American citizens should not be permitted to starve, that "made" work is better than the dole; that old-age and unemployment insurance and guaranteed bank deposits are fine and worthy things; that maximum hours and minimum wages are all to the good in sweatshop industries; that reclamation and rehabilitation of the soil is essential for the future of America; that slum clearance and low-cost housing are much to be desired. But I repeat that these enactments cost money, billions in the aggregate, and they can be supported through the years only if our economic system is sound and successful.

The fact is, however, that the economic record of the past decade is just as disappointing as the social record is gratifying. In a recent editorial Fortune magazine points out that our national income is back to 1919, our unemployment problem completely unsolved, our national debt up nineteen billions (now amounting to $1,250 per family), and that, comparing the period 1933-39 with 1923-29, the only significant increases among 22 basic economic measurements were in population, strikes, strikers, Federal taxes, Federal expenditures, and national debt. All the other items show a decline varying from 9 to 84 percent, and include manufacturing employment, industrial production, wholesale prices, factory pay rolls, national income, new construction, and corporate financing.

We must, I submit, place more emphasis on economic recovery, lest, failing to achieve it, we are forced to abandon—as we surely would be—the social advances of the last decade. For government cannot create wealth. All it can do is redistribute existing wealth. A great deal of new wealth must be created to support our social program, and this can be done only by increasing output, the production of useful goods. To reach this goal, we must move forward on the economic front.

Oliver Wendell Holmes once said, "The longing for certainty and repose is in every human mind. But certainty is generally an illusion and repose is not the destiny of man." I do not know the circumstances which prompted Holmes to make that statement, but if it was true then, how deeply, how desperately true it is today. Certainty—that is to say assured security—is generally illusion, and repose—that is to say escape from hard work—is not the destiny of man. That quotation, gentlemen, is heavy with truth. May we all heed and profit by it.

The question of what is wrong with America's economic system, what has caused the long-continued apathy in our industrial and financial mechanisms, has produced a long list of conflicting explanations and as many suggestions, equally conflicting, for the correction of the difficulty. Stemming from totally different concepts of the cause of our lagging activity, the proposed corrective measures are not only diverse and inconsistent, but certain of them would alter fundamentally our traditional view of government and its functions and the jealously guarded freedom of action which American citizens have so long enjoyed.

This brings us face to face with a serious problem—a problem that is real, because it goes to the roots of our system of constitutional democracy, a problem that cannot be ignored. Let us examine ourselves as adult Americans. Are we good judges, competent critics, and intelligent readers of our country's history? Are we well enough grounded in political economy to judge what is good for our future, and what is bad? Do we understand the fundamentals of the American system under which we have grown up? Lacking that knowledge of fundamentals, how can we distinguish between proposals which are consistent with the pattern of that system, and those which would impair and destroy it? Can we fashion for ourselves some kind of simple projector by which the trends and tendencies of the day can be clearly viewed and contrasted with the doctrines upon which this Nation was founded? These questions, gentlemen, are far easier to ask than to answer.

We are told that the average American has received no more than a seventh-grade schooling. It is clear, therefore, that the ordinary citizen cannot be expected to understand and pass intelligent judgment upon the complex questions which are ever before us in business, banking, agriculture, government, and many other fields. But it is he, nevertheless, who will determine whether and to what extent America will continue to live by the principles so firmly established by our forefathers. What can we do to keep these simple and fundamental doctrines ever before us?

No one knows better than I the difficulty of keeping even reasonably well informed on the major problems of the day, and the hours of reading and study it takes to satisfy not a New England, but merely a Midwestern conscience that one's views and pronouncements on current questions are not simply parroted from his favorite columnist but are bottomed by thoughtful analysis and honest conviction. And because our Government is and must be active in so many fields, and because the legislative and administrative questions before it are so diverse and numerous, it is most difficult to preserve perspective, to see the forest despite the trees, and to maintain an objective and consistent viewpoint. The task of thinking simply, unemotionally, and directly has perhaps never been more difficult and surely never more urgently needed than in this forty-first year of the twentieth century.

Formulae for thinking, like rules for making friends and influencing people, must be open to the charge of over-simplification and must prove to some extent ineffectual. Nevertheless, in this disturbed and complex day in which we live, when in foreign lands outlaws and iconoclasts seem successfully to be defying the validity of the virtues we have always embraced, when character and integrity appeal almost to inhibit rather than to help one's cause, it may not be unprofitable for each of us to sit down quietly and by way of reminder restate to ourselves as simply and briefly as we can, the fundamental principles which made, and if we hold firmly to them, which will preserve our American way of life.

Were we each to do this, the enumerations would doubtless differ, both in number of items and in the order of importance of the common ones. The central core, however, would surely be the same. If from that core we could formulate a simple one-page statement, a primer if you like, of the doctrines of American self-government, and if we could spread that statement far and wide across the land for every American to read and live by, the present trends toward government by men rather than by laws, toward enlargement and centralization of government functions and toward government by small but articulate pressure groups, would be arrested in their tracks.

And were I asked to set down in brief and simple fashion the items I would include in a primer of American self government, they would be these seven:

Our American Constitution is of inestimable value. In clear language it safeguards the fundamental rights of the individual. It limits the powers of government to those expressly and by clear implication granted to it. Because amendment is difficult and time-consuming, it stands as a bulwark against hurried, ill-considered, or emotional change. The first item of my primer of American self government is therefore:

1. UNDERSTAND, HONOR, AND PRESERVE THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

American government, whether National, State, or local, comprises three branches, which in order to prevent concentration of power must always be kept separate and distinct. They are the legislative branch, whose duty it is to enact all laws subject only to the principles and limitations laid down by the Constitution; the executive branch, whose duty it is to administer, but never to make, the laws of the land and to operate all government services; and the judicial branch, whose duty it is to interpret the laws made by the legislature, to decide whether they conform to the Constitution, and whether acts or omissions of the people or the other departments of government are in accordance with the law. The second item of my primer is, therefore:

2. KEEP FOREVER SEPARATE AND DISTINCT THE LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS OF GOVERNMENT

Government is created by and belongs to the people. It has no rights or powers except as the people grant them. The cost of government must be paid for by the people through taxation, and the tendency is for government to grow and become increasingly costly. Because government is not like private business, in which competition and the profit motive provide a tremendous incentive to careful planning and efficient operation, government is inherently less efficient than private business. Therefore it should be permitted to do only those things which government alone can properly do and which are necessary for the welfare of the people. Thus the third item of my primer becomes:

3. REMEMBER THAT GOVERNMENT BELONGS TO THE PEOPLE, IS INHERENTLY INEFFICIENT, AND THAT ITS ACTIVITIES SHOULD BE LIMITED TO THOSE WHICH GOVERNMENT ALONE CAN PERFORM

Of the many rights and guaranties which Americans enjoy under the Federal and State Constitutions, perhaps the most important are freedom of speech, freedom of worship according to one's own conscience, and freedom of decision and action in such matters as where to live, what kind of work to engage in, whom to work for, and at what pay. This freedom of action, coupled with the right of the American citizen to have and to hold the fruits of his labor and to save or dispose of them as he wishes, is called the enterprise system, and it provides opportunity and incentive to improve one's position in life. Our fourth item, accordingly, is:

4. BE VIGILANT FOR FREEDOM OF SPEECH, FREEDOM OF WORSHIP, AND FREEDOM OF ACTION

The enterprise system under which thousands of private businesses and millions of men and women are constantly searching for new, better, and more useful products and services, and for ways to improve and lower the cost of existing ones, has produced a standard of living in this country higher than any which the world has ever known. The enterprise system cannot function successfully without incentive to improve, expand, and to create new enterprises.

Accordingly if the profits of business are taxed inordinately, or if restraints and limitations are imposed which deprive the managers of reasonable freedom of action, or if Government competes or threatens to compete with private business, the enterprise system will languish. These things should therefore be avoided, and if they are, the inherent incentives of the system will cause business to expand, to create new enterprises and profitably to produce ever better, ever cheaper goods for more people to buy. Along this road lies progress and the only permanent solution of our unemployment problem. The fifth item is therefore:

5. CHERISH THE SYSTEM OF FREE ENTERPRISE WHICH MADE AMERICA GREAT

Thrift and economy are still the great virtues they were in our grandmothers' time. Debt burdens the future and too much of it impairs one's credit. Borrowing, therefore, should be resorted to only in periods of real emergency. These principles apply equally to government and to private citizens. The difficulty is that government can borrow more readily than the citizen, and having borrowed for the benefit of one group, it is very difficult not to do so for other organized groups. Our national debt has risen enormously in the past 10 years despite substantial increases in taxation. All this money must some day be repaid out of future taxes. Our immediate problem is to stop piling up more debt. This is not easy, indeed for the moment it is impossible. The safeguard we must seek is widespread understanding of the problem plus realistic and courageous leadership. Briefly stated, our sixth item becomes:

6. RESPECT THRIFT AND ECONOMY, AND BEWARE OF DEBT

Integrity of contract and respect for the rights of others are foundation stones of civilization. They have been all but destroyed in many quarters of the world, and until they are restored barbarism will stalk the earth. Let us keep the candle of integrity burning brightly in America. If we do so, we shall one day use it to rekindle the flame of mutual trust, fair dealing, and respect for others in a suffering and chastened world. The seventh and last item of our primer is, therefore:

7. ABOVE ALL, LET US BE SCRUPULOUS IN KEEPING OUR WORD AND IN RESPECTING THE RIGHTS OF OTHERS

This, then, is one primer of American self-government. If each of you would write your own, I am sure I would be satisfied to accept them. For it seems to me that the principles are so simple, so clear, that having thought them through we may say of them in the language of our forefathers, "These truths we hold to be self-evident."

But thinking on these subjects, and particularly thinking through on them, is not sufficiently widespread. Is it not our task as Americans to encourage and stimulate such thinking in every way at our command? For if our educators, our business and professional men, our churchmen, and our farmers, our trade and civic organizations would write their primers of American self-government and tell the story on a national scale through the press, the radio, the pulpit, the classroom, and the public forum, how could we fail to reinculcate in the minds of our 130,000,000 home-loving citizens, the rules for living the American way?

And now in closing let me say that I have deliberately avoided anything but passing reference to the wars abroad. Tragic and disastrous as they are for those involved and for ourselves, and essential as it is for us to view them realistically and to prepare for bitter times ahead, let us emphatically remember that these wars may obscure but they cannot and will not cure our domestic ills. Indeed, if on a peacetime basis we view dangerous tendencies toward the extension and concentration of government, toward the creation of too powerful bureaucracies and toward unparalleled enlargement of our national debt, is it not clear that the preparation for or actual engagement in war must speed and aggravate these tendencies? Let us, therefore, keep our vision unclouded by emotionalism, and let us recognize that conditions beyond our borders make ever more compelling the need for understanding, for teaching, and for living our primer of American self-government.

Meeting of Representatives of American Republics at Habana, Cuba

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. CORDELL HULL, SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the Honorable Cordell Hull, Secretary of State and delegate of the United States to the second meeting of the foreign ministers, or their representatives, of the American Republics, at Habana, Cuba, Monday, July 22, 1940:

Mr. Chairman, fellow representatives of the American republics, permit me, first of all, to express my deep personal pleasure in setting foot once more on the soil of the great nation whose guests we are at this time. Forty years have passed since my first visit to these shores, when I had the honor to serve with my regiment in the cause of Cuba's liberation. I doubly welcome the present opportunity to revisit this country—both because of the personal gratification which it affords me and because of the vital importance of the purpose which has brought us together in this beautiful city of Habana.

We are here as representatives of the 21 free and independent American Republics. We meet when world conditions are perhaps graver than they have ever been before. Our purpose is to devise concrete measures by which a number of pressing problems may be met. Our objective is to safeguard the independence, the peace, and the well-being of the American republics.

For nearly a year now a new major war has raged with increasing fury over important areas of the earth. It came as a culmination of a process of deterioration of international conduct and international morality, extending over a period of years, during which forces of ruthless conquest were gathering strength in several parts of the world.

These forces now at work in the world shrink from no means of attaining their ends. In their contempt for all moral and ethical values they are bent on uprooting the very foundation of orderly relations among nations and on subverting, undermining, and destroying existing social and political institutions within nations. They have already left in their wake formerly sovereign nations with their independence trampled into dust and millions of proud men and women with their liberties destroyed.

Our American republics had no part in kindling the tragic conflagration which has thus been sweeping across the world. On the contrary, severally and jointly, we did everything in our power to stay its outburst. Once the conflict had begun we did everything we could to limit its spreading. But it has been increasingly clear that in the vast tragedy which has befallen large portions of the earth there are dangers to the American nations, as well, which it would be suicidal not to recognize in time and not to prepare to meet fully and decisively.

It has been increasingly clear that our nations must not blind themselves into fatal complacency as so many nations have done to their mortal sorrow—regarding the possibility of attack against them from without or of externally directed attempts from within to undermine their national strength and to subvert their cherished social and political institutions, or both. Too many nations have only recently paid a tragic price for confidently placing reliance for their safety and security solely upon clearly expressed desire to remain at peace, upon unequivocally proclaimed neutrality, upon scrupulous avoidance of provocation. Conquerors, invaders, and destroyers ignore or brush aside reasons such as these.

Looming ominously on our horizon is the danger that attempts may be made to employ against our nations, too, the same means of subordinating their destinies to control and dictation from abroad that have already been notoriously employed elsewhere against numerous other countries. We must recognize the serious possibility that no effort or method may be spared to achieve, with respect to some of us, economic domination and political penetration, and to sow, among our nations, the seeds of suspicion, dissention, and discord—the frequent prelude to even more menacing action.

Lest our nations, too, suffer the fate that has already befallen so many other peace-loving and peace-seeking nations, wisdom and prudence require that we have in our hands adequate means of defense. To that end, in the face of common danger, our nations are already working together, in accordance with their firmly established practice of free consultation among equals and of voluntary cooperation with regard to problems which are of common concern to all of us. It is to examine such of these problems as are immediately pressing and to seek for them most effective solutions that the representatives of the 21 American republics have come together at this time.

I

I should like to consider first the situation which confronts us in the economic sphere.

The war now in progress has brought with it a disruption in the channels of international commerce and a curtailment of foreign markets for the products of the Western Hemisphere. This has meant to many American nations a diminution of foreign-exchange resources and a loss of purchasing power sufficiently serious to place severe strains on their national economies. In some cases, stagnant surpluses of commodities, the exportation of which is essential to the economic life of the countries concerned, have accumulated and continue to accumulate. Their existence is a matter of present and future concern to farmers, workers, businessmen, and governments throughout the continental area.

We must assume that these difficulties will continue certainly as long as the war exists. We must anticipate that these problems, and possibly others, will continue for some time after the war ends.

If the standards of living of the American peoples are to be maintained at levels already achieved, and particularly if they are to be raised in accordance with the legitimate aspirations of these peoples, production and distribution must expand, not only in this hemisphere, but throughout the world. This same condition is essential to the well-being of all other areas. For no nation or group of nations can hope to become or to remain prosperous when growing poverty stalks the rest of the earth.

Under existing conditions, the problem is singularly pressing. Though war now is in progress, we must contemplate its eventual end. At that time, perhaps 80,000,000 people in Europe, and many millions in other parts of the world, who have been entirely engaged in war work, must find a new place for themselves in the economics of peace. At the same time, it is to be assumed that, once the pressures of war are ended, there will be a general demand that reasonable conditions of life may be restored. To effect this transition, and to supply the world with what it then needs, will necessitate a great increase in production, distribution, and exchange of goods. Failure to achieve this can only mean that the tragedy of war would be followed by the still greater horror of disintegration in great areas.

It is plain that international commerce is indispensable if economic rehabilitation is to be achieved. It is also plain that the only available means of doing this is to resume, as soon as circumstances permit, the normal currents of world trade. I have no doubt that the American republics are ready and indeed anxious to do their part in bringing this about; though the extent to which we can thus play our part must depend materially on the economic methods and policies pursued by other countries.

We are confronted with two opposite trading methods. Open trade, freed as rapidly as may be practicable from the obstruction and regimentation of excessive restrictions, can accomplish the necessary task. Prosperity for the American republics or for any part of the world cannot be achieved—even the necessities of the war-torn areas of the earth cannot be met—by regimented or restricted trade, especially directed under a policy of national or regional autarchy. We recognize the need for a transition period, but we are convinced that there can be only one satisfactory permanent policy.

We have long known from experience that international trade inevitably declines in volume and usefulness when it is conducted on a basis of exclusive bilateralism, or is pressed to unfair advantage, or is used to attempt economic domination. Eventually such methods destroy the trade and the trader alike. In the present situation they are totally unable to provide that volume and distribution of goods which alone can save great areas from intense distress. Only where equal treatment, fair practices, nondiscrimination, and peaceful motives lie beneath trade can it develop to the degree needed to rehabilitate a shattered world and to provide a foundation for further economic progress.

Today, in spite of what has occurred in other parts of the world, the American nations continue to adhere to liberal trade principles and are applying them in their relations with each other as fully as the present state of affairs permits. They should be prepared to resume the conduct of trade with the entire world on this basis as rapidly as other nations are willing to do likewise.

In the meantime the American nations must and should do everything in their power to strengthen their own economic position, to improve further the trade and other economic relations between and among themselves, and to devise and apply appropriate means of effective action to cope with the difficulties, disadvantages, and dangers of the present disturbed and dislocated world conditions. To accomplish these purposes the nations of the Western Hemisphere should undertake the fullest measure of economic cooperation, so designed and so conducted as to serve the best interests of each nation and to bring injury to none.

Progress has already been made toward the forging of new tools to carry out certain phases of economic cooperation on an inter-American basis. The Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee, which was established last November pursuant to a resolution of the Panama meeting, has proven itself to be an efficient body for considering and working out such mechanisms. It has recently created the Inter-American Development Commission to carry out the work of planning and promoting the development of new productive facilities in the American republics. In addition, it prepared the framework for the establishment of an Inter-American bank to foster cooperation in the spheres of long-term development and of money and foreign exchange. The Government of the United States is taking steps to implement the Inter-American Bank Convention and urges that the governments of the other American republics give their cooperation so that this important institution may be placed into operation as rapidly as possible.

Useful as these organizations can be in the long run, there remains the immediately pressing situation confronting the American republics as a result of the curtailment and changed character of important foreign markets. Fully realizing that under present disturbed conditions no nation can expect to maintain a normal economic situation, and in order to meet the emergencies which confront their nations, the governments of the American republics, it is believed, should give consideration to the following program of immediate cooperative action:

1. Strengthening and expansion of the activities of the Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee as an instrument for continuing consultation with respect to trade matters, including especially the situation immediately confronting the American republics as a result of the curtailment and changed character of important foreign markets.

2. Creation of facilities for the temporary handling and orderly marketing of accumulated surpluses of those commodities which are of primary importance to the maintenance of the economic life of the American republics, whenever such action becomes necessary.

3. Development of commodity agreements with a view to assuring equitable terms of trade for both producers and consumers of the commodities concerned.

4. Consideration of methods for improving the standard of living of the peoples of the Americas, including public-health measures, nutrition studies, and suitable organizations for the relief distribution of some part of any surplus commodities.

The Government of the United States of America has already utilized its existing agencies to enter into mutually advantageous cooperative arrangements with a number of American republics in connection with programs for the development of their national economies and by way of assistance to their central banks in monetary and foreign-exchange matters.

It is now taking steps which will make possible the extension of both the volume and character of the operations of such agencies. When these steps have been completed, the Government of the United States of America will be in a position to expand its cooperative efforts with other American nations in the fields of long-term development and of monetary and exchange matters.

It will also be able to participate in immediate joint action with other nations of this hemisphere to meet pressing trade situations which may arise before the program outlined has come into operation.

Finally, it will be enabled to enter effectively into the cooperative program as it proceeds, assisting in the temporary handling and orderly marketing of the important commodities of the hemisphere; implementing, on its part, the commodity agreements which are developed; and carrying out other operations involving such export products.

While the proposed measures are being developed, consideration should be given to the desirability of a broader system of inter-American cooperative organizations in trade matters to complement inter-American cooperative organizations in the field of long-term economic development and of money and foreign exchange.

By helping each other, by carrying out with vigor, determination, and loyalty whatever decisions are reached, the American nations can build a system of economic defense that will enable each of them to safeguard itself from the dangers of economic subordination from abroad and of economic distress at home. It is no part of our thought to obstruct in any way logical and natural trade with Europe or with any other portion of the world, but rather to promote such trade with nations willing to meet us, in good faith, in a spirit of friendly and peaceful purpose, and on a plane of frank and fair dealing. Against any other kind of dealing, we naturally will protect ourselves.

II

The solution of our economic problems alone is not enough to preserve the peace and security of this hemisphere. There exist also other problems, which are of an altogether different character but the solution of which is of no less importance to our freedom and independence.

I refer to the threat to our security arising from activities directed from without the hemisphere but which operate within our respective borders. A new and evil technique has been invented which seeks by devious methods to corrupt the body politic in order to subject it to alien purposes. With cynical effrontery, sanctuary within the generous citadels of free speech and freedom of assembly is demanded by agents whose masters would obliterate those institutions and foment instead dissension, prejudice, fear, and hatred.

Make no mistake concerning the purposes of this sinister campaign. It is an attempt to acquire domination of the American Republics by foreign governments in their own interest. Already we have seen the tragic results abroad when governmental structures have been undermined and the fabric of established institutions riddled by the termites of alien propaganda.

We long ago recognized the source and extent of this infection and have already taken some steps to eradicate it. At Lima we declared that it was incompatible with the sovereignty of any American Republic that persons or groups within our countries should be controlled by any outside government for its own purposes. It is now urgently incumbent upon us to take decisive remedial action to the end that the independence and political integrity of each of the American Republics may be fully safeguarded.

To this no friendly government can legitimately object. The inter-American system carries no implication of aggression and no threat to any nation. It is based solely on a policy of self-defense, designed to preserve the independence and the integrity of each of the American nations. It implies no hegemony on the part of any member of the inter-American group; but it equally rejects the thesis of hegemony by anyone else. It resembles in no way regional policies recently pursued in other parts of the world, which pretend to invoke our inter-American system as precedent. The difference is that our sole purpose is self-defense, while these other policies seem instead to be pretexts for conquest by the sword, for military occupation, and for complete economic and political domination of other free and independent peoples.

III

There are other pressing political problems arising out of the vast changes which have taken place on the continent of Europe. The principles on which we act with respect to these problems have been forged by the American republics through years of discussion and practice. They are applied entirely without discrimination, solely for the purpose of assuring that the security of the American Hemisphere shall not be impaired by the repercussions of warfare elsewhere.

Specifically, there is before us the problem of the status of European possessions in this hemisphere. These geographic regions have not heretofore constituted a menace to the peace of the Americas; their administrations were established, for the most part, many generations ago and, in our time, have acted as congenial neighbors. We have no desire to absorb these possessions or to extend our sovereignty over them, or to include them in any form of sphere of influence.

We could not, however, permit these regions to become a subject of barter in the settlement of European differences or a battleground for the adjustment of such differences. Either situation could only be regarded as a threat to the peace and safety of this hemisphere, as would any indication that they might be used to promote systems alien to the inter-American system. Any effort, therefore, to modify the existing status of these areas—whether by cession, by transfer, or by any impairment whatsoever in the control heretofore exercised—would be of profound and immediate concern to all the American republics.

It is accordingly essential that we consider a joint approach to this common problem. We must be in a position to move rapidly and without hesitation.

It has been suggested that our action take the form of the establishment of a collective trusteeship, to be exercised in the name of all of the American republics. The Government of the United States endorses this suggestion and is prepared to cooperate, should occasion arise, in its execution.

The establishment of a collective trusteeship for any region must not carry with it any thought of the creation of a special interest by any American republic. The purpose of a collective trusteeship must be to further the interests and security of all of the American nations, as well as the interest of the region in question. Moreover, as soon as conditions permit, the region should be restored to its original sovereign or be declared independent when able to establish and maintain stable self-government.

IV

Seldom has a meeting of friendly nations opened in an atmosphere of more widespread misconception and more flagrant misrepresentation as to its aims and purposes than have emanated in recent weeks, from responsible and irresponsible quarters, in connection with this meeting.

We have met to consult together regarding our own pressing problems. We covet nothing anywhere in the world. We are free from the spirit of enmity toward any nation. But we cannot fail to be acutely conscious of the dangers which confront us as a result of present world conditions and against which we are taking and intend to take fully adequate measures of defense. National life itself today imposes as an absolute obligation the will to national defense, should national institutions or integrity ever be threatened. Achievement of this requires that we call out anew the endless energy, the complete spirit of sacrifice, the iron will, which characterized the pioneers, the liberators, and the defenders, to whom we owe our present freedom. Let no man say that in the world of today any nation not willing to defend itself is safe. The fortitude and resolution of our forefathers won for us our free institutions. We proudly have inherited them, and proudly are prepared to maintain them.

At the same time, while meeting the imperative needs of emergency conditions we must—and, I am certain, we will—continue our abiding faith that what is happening today is but a temporary interruption in the progress of civilization. Mankind can advance only when human freedom is secure; when the right of self-government is safeguarded; when all nations recognize each other's right to conduct its internal affairs free from outside interference; when there exist among nations respect for the pledged word, determination to abstain from the use of armed force in pursuit of policy, and willingness to settle controversies by none but peaceful means; when international economic relations are based upon mutual benefit, equality of treatment, and fair dealing.

In 1937, in an attempt to prevent the impending catastrophe of a new war, the Government of the United States addressed a communication to all nations, reciting these basic principles of orderly international relations under the rule of law as the foundation of its foreign policy and inviting comment thereon. More than 50 nations expressed on that occasion their belief in the validity of these principles. At Montevideo, at Buenos Aires, at Lima, at Panama the 21 American republics proclaimed their acceptance.

I am confident that sooner or later the entire world must return to a system of international relations based on those principles. They are the only possible foundation stones of an organized society assured of enduring peace and of sustained prosperity. The price of their abandonment is the chaos of international anarchy and the inexorable impoverishment of nations and individuals, such as we witness today in Europe and in Asia.

In a system of cooperative peace such as we envisage there is no exclusion. Its underlying principles are universal in their applicability; they can be accepted by all nations to the benefit of each and all; they must be accepted by all if the light of modern civilization is not to be extinguished. Any nation which in good faith accepts and practices them automatically shares in the vast benefits they confer.

At this time, when these principles and these ideals are being widely challenged, when institutions based on them are being crushed by force over large areas of the world, it is doubly essential that our nations keep them alive and rededicate themselves to the cause of their preservation.

It is in this spirit, and in this spirit alone, that the Government which I have the honor to represent approaches the tasks that are before our present meeting—in complete confidence that in this vital respect all of the American nations stand today as united as ever.

Dangerous Suspicions and Unfair Aspersions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, during times such as these when the world becomes weary and heartsick with the results of war, we are apt to become confused and often suspicious of the motives and actions of our own people. Loyalty in America is not confined to any one nationalistic group any more than it is more abundant in one religious faith than in another. Loyalty and devotion to American ideals and to our system of government is just as strong in the heart of the Negro as it is in the heart of his Caucasian brother.

Those of us who have gone through the war period between 1914 and 1918 remember only too well the whispering and the suspicion which was directed against some of our loyal Americans of German antecedents and the actions of some of those who would cast aspersions upon this loyal American element were shameful and sinful in the extreme. Eavesdroppers strained their ears to obtain information against their German-American neighbors. Peeping toms observed every action of these people. Innocent remarks were often twisted and magnified to give unpatriotic meanings and doubtlessly many an innocent person was made to suffer heartache and public scorn because of the ultra-chauvinistic and superpatriotic antics of some of our misguided people.

Undoubtedly there were many innocent American citizens of German origin who were shadowed, trailed, and persecuted without any cause or reason whatsoever. Many were doubtlessly made to suffer along with dangerous aliens who were properly confined to stockades or were imprisoned, and it is against a resurgence and revival of any such possibility, Mr. Speaker, that I want to raise my voice at this time. There are countless thousands, there are millions of loyal Americans of German antecedents who hate and despise nazi-ism and who hope and pray for Germany's early return to right, reason, and decency. I have discussed this matter with many of my German-American friends and I am convinced that if it were within their ability to solve the problem that nazi-ism would be crushed and would become a thing of the past, relegated as it were to oblivion.

There is no tie that binds Nazi Germany to any element of our loyal people. The severest criticism and condemnation of Hitler and his Godless philosophy is frequently directed by German-American newspapers and societies. On more than one occasion Hitler himself has referred slurringly to German-Americans. He berated them as being below the average of German intellectualism. He placed them among those who might be rated as subhuman. Only recently a Berlin dispatch under date of July 19, emanating through the Associated Press, refers to the Germans in America in the following and uncomplimentary manner:

> The greatest traitors were those Germans and Italians who went to America and were incited against authoritarian states.

The Nazis of Germany recognize their inability to sway American sentiment, and on more than one occasion I have read of the chagrin and disappointment of the Nazi high command because the Americans of German extraction cannot be made to be tractable and will not follow Hitler's commands.

In our zeal to suppress nazi-ism, "fifth column," and other dangerous anti-American activities, let us be certain before we charge our friends and neighbors with acts of treason. Hysteria is a symptom of subsequent jitters which dulls the intellect and may be the cause of grave injustice, disorganization, and national panic, precisely what the "fifth columnists" and Nazis seek to attain as their objective. While ever on the alert, let us remain cool, calm, and in full possession of our faculties if we want to be helpful and effective.

American citizens of German extraction have proved their unfaltering patriotism to such an extent that their patriotism should never have to be questioned, and they can be relied upon to stand by the flag in any emergency. They will stand shoulder to shoulder with the great mass of our American people in defense of our American institutions, our ideals, and the preservation of the Nation.

Merchandising and Chain Stores

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, permission having been granted, I am offering for the RECORD excerpts from the testimony on April 26, 1940, of Malcolm P. McNair, professor of marketing at the Graduate School of Business Administration, Harvard University, before a subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee on H. R. 1, which would impose a destructive tax on the chain stores of this country.

CHAIN STORES ARE NOT MONOPOLIES

Now, the general point that I should like to make is in regard to this fear of monopoly, which is very frequently put forward as a reason for curbing the growth of chain stores. It is my opinion that that fear is quite unjustified.

In the first place, it is very easy, indeed, as everyone is aware, for an individual with relatively small means to enter many kinds of retail business, and those individuals are doing it practically every day.

Not only are these small retail stores in a very great numerical majority, but the most recent census figures which are available indicate that the sales of independents, during the period 1935 to 1937, were growing more rapidly than the sales of chains.

A comparison in the 1937 study on the basis of identical stores shows that 80,664 independent stores increased their sales 22.8 percent between 1935 and 1937, whereas 22,189 chain stores increased their sales only 17.1 percent between 1935 and 1937. And, incidentally, it may be remarked that these same 22,189 chain stores increased their pay roll 22 percent over this period.

CHAIN DISTRIBUTION STABILIZING

Now, the reasons why that change took place in the rate of growth, in my opinion, are two. First, I think that there is evidence that the chain system of distribution is becoming stabilized; chains are becoming stabilized as a factor in distribution; are not now growing as rapidly as they did during the initial period. Second, I should say that the development of new methods of distribution is a factor, and I have in mind particularly the supermarket, during recent years, which has tended to slow up the rate of chain development.

Now, according to the best estimates which I can assemble, if we take all types of what might be called large-scale distributors—now, by large-scale distributors I mean chains; I mean mail-order houses; I mean department stores; even, I think, if we were to include voluntary chains in this group, because they are, after all, a type of mass distributor—if we were to take all that group together, I think, according to the best estimates I can get, it is very doubtful whether their total volume of sales is as much as 40 percent. I would guess that it was nearer 35 percent. If you take the voluntary chains out of that, I would guess that it drops down perhaps to the vicinity of 30 percent of the total retail distribution.

Frankly, I do not see much to get excited about in that situation. I think it is pretty clear that, considering the ease of access to retail business and the personal nature of the retail function, and the value placed by many consumers on personal contacts, and services, that large-scale retail distribution is not going to wipe out independent merchants in any period that can now be foreseen.

As a matter of fact, I would say that a very considerable number of years would elapse before all of these large-scale methods of distribution, taken together, would amount to as much as 50 percent of the entire field of distribution.

Consequently, I think the fears of monopoly are very greatly exaggerated, in fact unwarranted.

Also, it is my own observation that the fiercest competition in the retail field is commonly found between the chains themselves; between each other, rather than between the chains and the independents. I think that is true rather generally of most types of large-scale distribution.

The large-scale distributor of the department store or chain store or supermarket type, my observation is, is primarily a price competitor. He goes out and fights on a price basis. That is not perhaps always true of the large-scale manufacturer.

I do think that in our apprehension about large business in this country we ought to make a distinction between the large businesses which tend to behave on a price-fixing or monopolistic basis, and those large businesses which go out and compete vigorously on a price basis. It is my observation, in the field of distribution, that the large-scale distributor of the chain type, the department store type, the supermarket type, the mail-order type, generally goes out and competes pretty vigorously on a price basis.

For those reasons I feel very strongly convinced myself that the fears of monopoly in connection with chain-store growth are wholly unwarranted.

LESS WASTE MOTION

Formerly we had the situation where a manufacturer here, for example, sold to an independent wholesaler over here, and the independent wholesaler, in turn sold to a small retailer over here.

That is the system in which, as a matter of fact, there is a good deal of waste motion; there is a salesman going out from the manufacturer to make the contacts with the wholesaler; the wholesaler's salesman traveling on to the retailer to make contacts with him. Nobody knows exactly what the requirements of the customers are. The wholesaler does not know exactly what he can sell to the various retailers. There is a lot of waste motion in that situation.

Therefore, we have seen at various times in the past a tendency for the manufacturer to absorb this wholesale jobber. He took them over and made wholesale branches of them, and sold direct to the retailer, so he could be in closer contact with the retailer.

What we have also seen, though it is not so well recognized, is that the retailer, when he distributes on a large scale, such as a chain, he takes over that wholesale job, incorporates the wholesaling business essentially under one overhead with his retail business.

That pulls together, in the first place, large buying power; in the second place, it pulls together a very exact knowledge of the requirements of the market and it makes it possible for this combination wholesaler-retailer, when he is operating a large number of stores, or supermarkets, or when he happens to be a large distributor himself, to go to the manufacturer, essentially to take the place of the manufacturer's sales organization, to sit down with the president of a manufacturing concern, explain to him his requirements, or give him an order that will keep that manufacturer busy perhaps over a period of 6 months or so, instead of having to manufacture in dribbles or smaller orders.

Now, then, my opinion, and I state this deliberately, is that the organization advantages, the advantages of the systemization that is possible, if you bring together or integrate or amalgamate these distribution functions, instead of scattering it between separate manufacturers, between separate wholesalers, and separate retailers, is a considerably more important reason for the advantages of the chain in dealing with a manufacturer, than is the buying power alone.

It is my opinion that buying power by and of itself has been exaggerated as one of the advantages of a chain or other large-scale retailer in dealing with the manufacturer. I think its principal advantages come from this combination and coordination of functions, this saving of lost time between the manufacturer and the consumer.

UNWILLINGNESS TO PROGRESS

I think our economic system is more likely to collapse from the throwing of monkey wrenches than it is from refinement and improvement. I think we have too many obstacles—I might put it this way: I think too many people have been unwilling to advance, unwilling to go along with new developments. I think there has been too much desire, perhaps, to hold prices too high. I am in hearty sympathy with those economists who maintain that prices on the whole perhaps have been held too high. We ought to get prices down so that we could have more progress. Of course, the T. N. E. C. has been working on this conundrum for a long time now, but I would suggest that perhaps some of the high prices that ought to be looked at are the high cost of distribution and not merely the high price of manufacturing.

I think it is quite possible, in my opinion, that one of the obstacles to greater investment today, is exactly this high cost of distribution. We haven't yet made enough of a dent in the high cost of distribution. We have made a little dent in it by means of some of these combined functions, particularly in the chains and the supermarkets, or combination distributors. I don't think we have made anywhere near enough dent in that.

LOGICAL COUNTER TO MASS PRODUCTION

I think this system of mass distribution really is a thoroughly logical counter to mass production. I don't think we can have any advance in our standards of living if we do not have capital flowing into the job of distribution and flowing in largely to the large-scale distributors, the chains and other large-scale enterprises. We have had a flow of capital into that. We are not distributing our merchandise in the fashion of the old "horse and buggy" days, or the small craftsmanship days. We have had a flow of capital into that, and I think that flow of capital into the field of distribution has tended to reduce distribution cost somewhat, but I don't think it has gone far enough. I think we need a freeing up of the flow of capital into the field of distribution. I think that instead of trying to freeze this situation, we have to thaw it, so that we can get as great ingenuity as possible working on this problem of reduction of distribution cost, because I think we have now reached the point where to get more opportunities for investment we have to squeeze down distribution cost as well as the manufacturing cost.

DANGER OF PATMAN BILL

I think there is a grave danger that if this Patman bill should become law it might cause a new business slump by upsetting the balance of production and distribution. Our economy, as we are now well aware, is in many respects a very delicate one, easily subject to shock. When any part of the economy sustains a shock the effects of that shock are very rapidly transmitted to other parts of the economy. The enactment of this measure would cause a decline in local real-estate values, would cause a loss of income to agricultural producers, would cause a drop in employment, not merely in the chains but also in many manufacturing enterprises which have been developed primarily to serve the chain-store market. The strong probability that those results would ensue has been brought out in previous testimony before this committee. I merely want to suggest to you that, even though men thus thrown out of work might eventually find employment in other types of distributive enterprise, even though the opening of new independent stores might eventually tend to check the decline in real-estate values, nevertheless the shock to the economic system of forcing such a drastic reorganization in the distribution machinery would be very likely to precipitate the country into a new economic tailspin.

I should like to remind you also that an incidental consequence, if this bill were enacted into law, would be a substantial decline in the tax revenues of the United States Treasury. Figures are not available for the total volume of income taxes paid by all chains; but I have been able to make a compilation of income taxes paid in 1938 by 35 large chains with a volume of sales of $2,451,222,000. This figure was $14,985,000. Estimates are based on data published in Survey of American Listed Corporations, industry reports of the survey of the American Listed Corporations, a Work Projects Administration study sponsored by the Securities and Exchange Commission, volume II, New York, March 1940. Even assuming that the ratio of taxes to sales volume is lower for the entire group of chains which would be affected by this legislation than it is for the selected ones whose tax figures are available, still the probable sum involved is in the neighborhood of $40,000,000 or $42,000,000. This figure, it should be noted, does not take into account social-security taxes. But whatever is the total sum of taxes now accruing to the Treasury from chains, there are several good reasons for supposing that this amount of Government income would be drastically reduced if the Patman bill were enacted into law. In the first place, because of lower efficiency, independent enterprise, even if they transacted the same volume of business as the chains which they replaced, almost certainly would not make so large a profit. In the second place, a very large number of these small enterprises would escape the social security taxes because of the small number of employees involved. And in the third place, the profits of individual stores would be the income of the proprietors and as such would be subject to personal and family exemptions. The net result, I am confident, would be to cut the Treasury's income from these sectors of retail business at least in half.

Keep These United States Out of War

STATEMENT OF POLICY OF SEATTLE PEACE COORDINATING COMMITTEE

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement of policy of the Seattle Peace Coordinating Committee. This organization in Seattle is a federation of peace groups representing citizens of all political persuasions, varying religious affiliations, and of many different racial origins. The statement indicates that this organization feels strongly about the matter of the maintenance of peace for America. They vehemently demand that emphasis be placed upon the continuation of progressive legislation for domestic rehabilitation and the taking of every precaution to insure that America will not be embroiled in the bloody holocaust of Europe; that we bolster our internal morale by providing opportunity for the unemployed and the neglected one-third of our citizenry and our youth to secure a place in the sun.

The resolution is as follows:

SEATTLE PEACE COORDINATING COMMITTEE—STATEMENT OF POLICY

The American people demand peace and preservation of civil rights.

They remember 1917. They are determined that America shall never again be sacrificed to Wall Street profits.

Yet today the national administration is whipping up hysteria to conceal maneuvers that are leading us into war. It is turning our resources over to the Allies, and demanding compulsory military training for all Americans. Such actions endanger our own defenses and threaten democracy itself.

The Seattle Peace Coordinating Committee declares that this Nation can and must remain at peace. To guarantee this, the committee pledges itself to the following program:

1. Strict neutrality in word and action.

2. No repeal of the Johnson Act to permit credits to warring nations which have defaulted on previous loans.

3. A true national-defense program based on a decent standard of living in every American home. This requires: (a) Defense of labor's right to organize and bargain collectively; (b) Jobs for the unemployed, and economic security, by passage of the American Standards Work and Assistance Act and the American Youth Act; (c) Adequate pensions for the aged, and cost of production for the farmer; (d) National housing and health programs. This program, implemented by adequate defensive armaments, will make this Nation invincible.

4. Opposition to conscription and compulsory military training; and

5. Preservation of the Bill of Rights, the very keystone of American liberty.

There shall be no M day in America.

A Fourth of July Prayer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BOEHNE, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ADDRESS OF REV. O. A. GEISEMAN, S. T. D.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Rev. O. A. Geiseman, S. T. D., Grace Lutheran Church, River Forest, Ill.:

A FOURTH OF JULY PRAYER

God willing, we, the people of these United States, shall in a few days again celebrate the day on which we commemorate the declaration of our national independence. One hundred and sixty-four years ago our American forbears created on this continent a free Nation. They shed their blood and they gave their lives in defense of the principle that the Creator has endowed all men with the inalienable right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They established a government by the people, of the people, and for the people. Many things have come to pass since that happened. The past one and a half centuries have perhaps been as eventful from the viewpoint of secular history as any other comparable period of time throughout all history. This has been the time in which especially the western world has witnessed a great industrial revolution; it has been the time in which our country has experienced a civil war, the passing of the great American frontier, the World War, a universal depression, and on top of all that, a second world war. Yet, despite all of these great historic events, despite the countless changes which have taken place otherwise, we still are a free people. And so, I invite you to join with me this morning in following the spirit of the psalmist who said, Psalm 95: verse 6, "Oh come, let us worship and bow down, let us kneel before the Lord, our Maker."

Let us kneel before the Lord our Maker and with humble hearts and a sense of profoundest gratitude give thanks to our Heavenly Father. Let us give thanks to Him because He has preserved our freedom unto us. When our forbears sounded the battle cry of freedom in this land of ours, it echoed 'round the world. The flag of our Nation came to be unto men everywhere a symbol of liberty, of justice, and of hope. In certain parts of the world the lamps of liberty were lighted though they may never have burned there quite as brightly as they did in our country, yet they burned. But in recent years the light of freedom has been extinguished, first in one land and then in another, so that this morning we, the people of the United States, are practically the only great Nation which can still be spoken of as a free Nation. We still enjoy the freedom of assembly, freedom of press, freedom of speech, and above all things, that freedom which, forget it not, is fundamental to all other freedom, the freedom of worship. Though these be troublous times yet the lowliest American citizen, no matter how ill-informed, no matter how prejudiced in his feelings and views, has the privilege of saying what he thinks so long as it does not subvert law and order and so long as he remains within the limits of our American Constitution and our laws. It makes our hearts heavy just to think that millions upon millions of men, women, and children who once knew what it meant to be free, this morning are no longer so.

When you and I then, approaching the day of our national independence, remember that we are free, we cannot but bow down before our God, kneel before our Maker, and thank Him with all our hearts for this blessed privilege.

But when we think as citizens of America, we have reason to be grateful not only for the freedom which is ours, but also for the abundance of material blessings which God has showered upon us. It has come to be quite popular for Americans to complain ever since the depression began. We can hang our heads and make long faces, and talk as though we were the most oppressed people in the world because of the taxes we have to pay and because of the bad times which we have experienced.

My friends, we ought to blush with shame just to think that way, to say nothing about talking that way. God has poured His gifts upon us with such abundance, He has blessed our land with so vast a store of natural resources that we are a rich people. Just think of the masses of immigrants who were born in other lands and who came to these shores poor as church mice, but who by reason of God's bountiful goodness, their own industry and frugality, and opportunities for free enterprise, the unbelievable development in industry on American soil, and the richness and fertility of our American farm lands, how many, many of these people have not only secured that which was necessary to their barest existence, but actually have become rich in a true sense of that word. Just think of the members of our own congregation. We live in decent homes, we wear adequate clothing, we eat wholesome food, our children get a good education—all because God has blessed us as American citizens.

I do not mean in any way to minimize the heartaches people have endured as a result of droughts, dust storms, mortgage foreclosures, unemployment, and business losses, but I do mean to say that the poorest person on the relief rolls of America has been more bountifully provided for than millions and millions of people in other lands ever dare hope to be in their fondest dreams. God has been good to us. We have reason as we approach a great day of national celebration to think of that goodness, to kneel down before the Lord, our Maker, and to express to Him our humblest thanks.

We have further reason to thank Almighty God because He has preserved peace unto us. Which other great nation in the world can you mention this morning that has not as yet become embroiled in the now raging and spreading wars? We are practically the only one. Our sons are still going to school, and they are still engaged in the productive enterprises of peace. Our wives, sweethearts, mothers, and daughters need not look through tear-dimmed eyes upon a world of sorrow and gloom from which their loved ones have been erased by the murderous ruthlessness of war. We are not being driven mad by the hellish sound of fearful bombs dropping from Stuka dive bombers upon our homes, our churches, and our land. We can quietly pursue our daily tasks, enjoy our pastimes and pleasures, gather in the family circle, assemble in God's house to worship our Lord and our Redeemer. "Come, let us bow down, let us kneel before the Lord, our Maker," and give thanks unto Him.

But as we approach the day of our national observance we do not only want to thak God as we kneel before Him, but we also want to implore. We want to come to Him with our supplication that He may forgive—forgive all our sins, and only God knows how numerous and great they are, but forgive in particular our spirit of ingratitude, our failure to appreciate, our refusal to acknowledge the goodness of God, and the blessings which are ours as citizens of these United States. Where is our appreciation? What are you and I doing as individual Christian American citizens to show God that we are thankful, and to preserve for ourselves, our children, and our children's children the blessings we now have. We have reason with penitent and contrite hearts to come before God this morning and say, "Lord, have mercy! We have been unworthy of any grace. We have failed to appreciate. We deserve no more. Please forgive us."

And while we pray, let us beg of Him also that He may fill us with a holy zeal so that we may preach with greater enthusiasm the truths of His holy word, and, above all, His message of salvation. I am afraid that only a very few people understand the intimate relationship between civic liberty and the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Lose the one, and you are almost inevitably foredoomed to lose the other. It is only there where an appreciable number of people believe that God is the Creator, the Father of all; it is only there where an appreciable number of people believe that Jesus died for all, and that every single human being represents an immortal and blood-bought soul that you can hope to preserve an appreciation of the dignity of the individual man. It is at the foot of the cross on Calvary where all inequalities among men are wiped out.

I read only the other day that on the same Sunday in the same Christian church the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Charles Evans Hughes, and an unnamed Chinese laundryman were received at the same time. At the foot of the Cross the ground is level. Here there is no Jew nor Greek, here there is neither male nor female, neither bond nor free, but here all are one in Christ Jesus. It is only then when a sufficiently large number of people have that understanding and such a view of life and man that you can hope to preserve the spirit of democracy, the sense of freedom and equality which we enjoy as citizens in this country. Let us pray God then that we come to conceive of our task with greater clarity, that we recognize its tremendous significance more fully and that we further share this message of love and salvation with our fellowmen more eagerly, more generously, and enthusiastically. It is only by the saving message of God's Holy Word that the individual sinner can find peace with God and forgiveness for his sins; and it is only by the glorious message of divine love and salvation that we can hope to retain a solid foundation for the democracy which is now ours.

Having prayed for that, let us pray further that Almighty God may pour out His Holy Spirit upon us in such abundance that we can show forth the faith that is within us by shining deeds of love. Our message of love and salvation will be of little account if we do not exemplify it and support it by lives of love. Otherwise we will move men to blaspheme God rather than to honor and glorify Him. It is only then when we let our light so shine before men that they can see our good works that they will join us in glorifying our Father which is in Heaven. The Spirit of God works faith in the hearts of men by the message of salvation and by the blessed means of grace. Men should be attracted to this message by the beauty of our lives. The language of loving deeds performed by the Christian man and woman is a language which can be universally understood, and it is by this language we must meet the arguments of totalitarianism. It is by the force and the power of this argument we must overcome the forces of a godless anti-Christian communism, just as in the days of the early centuries the Christians overcame a heartless paganism by their deeds of love. Let us then pray the Heavenly Father that He may make us capable not only of confessing our faith in words, but of exemplifying it in deeds.

Further, let us pray for the President of the United States and all others in authority. The past decade has been one of chaos and confusion. The passions of partisan politics have often run very high and the people who have occupied positions of authority have become the victims of these passions. From 1929–31 it was Herbert Hoover over whom the storm broke, since 1932 it has been the present President of these United States. We are a free people. The humblest citizen may differ in his political views and ideas from the highest official in the land. But, my friends, nowhere has God allowed His children the privilege of cursing those who are in authority or even of holding them in contempt. Our Lord says, "I exhort, therefore, that first of all supplications and prayers be made for all men especially for those who are in authority." Let us turn then day after day to the throne of grace and beg our Heavenly Father that He may endow those who occupy the positions of authority—the President, the Congress, the Cabinet Officers, the foreign ambassadors, whoever they may be—with such wisdom, such discernment that they may say and do whatever may most fully reflect glory upon his Holy Name, whatever will contribute most fully to the preservation of peace for our own people, and whatever will serve best the well-being and happiness of men everywhere.

Finally, while we are on our knees and thinking of the 4th day of July in the year of our Lord 1940, let us also pray for the preservation of peace. We still have peace. We know not for how long. We do know that God has ordained the Government for the purpose of protecting the life and the property of its citizens. We do know that the Government possesses the power of the sword. We do know that if attacks should be made upon our own country you and I should want to be found among those who with unswerving loyalty and with true Christian and patriotic devotion would want to do all we could even to the sacrifice of our own lives for the preservation of Old Glory. But while all that is true, we also know that war can make no constructive contribution to the welfare of men. God may in His own way eventually work to bring out of such destruction something good for subsequent generations. That may all be true, but it can only come by the overruling power of God. It does not come as a result of war. War is a curse and not a blessing. Human lives and hearts are not conquered by cannon and by force. Men's hearts and souls are conquered only by love and persuasion and so we hope and pray that God may preserve peace unto us. We do not want our Nation to become embroiled in foreign wars and assist in creating blood-drenched shambles in wider areas of the world. We want our Nation to preserve the idea of peace and good will toward men everywhere, so that when others have spilled their blood, spent their energies, destroyed their countries, we may come with the hand of mercy and build a new day and a new civilization upon the ruins. It is our hope and prayer that this glorious flag of ours may more fully than ever before become the symbol of love, of kindness, of justice, and of hope for the nations of the world. May God hear us as we express our word of thanks and respond in infinite mercy to our humble pleas, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

Antitrust Laws and Labor Unions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, a great part of the world today finds itself locked in physical conflict. This battle among great nations and empires has drawn the close attention and observation of those other nations which are fortunate enough not to be engaged in this titanic struggle. The outcome of this war, undoubtedly, will have a tremendous effect even on the lives of those not engaged therein. It is only natural then, that we watch the tide of battle with deep interest and not a little apprehension.

But at this time, with so much of our thought and action concentrated on world-wide affairs, we must not forget certain ever-present and ever-pressing domestic problems that we have before us. There is a struggle going on in these United States which did not begin a few short months ago, nor a few years ago. It has been going on for more than half a century, and at times it has been a very bitter struggle. I am speaking of the fight which the laboring man of this country has carried on for the right to earn a living wage and work reasonable hours under decent conditions, as we Americans understand these things. It took a great deal of courage for a workingman to band with his fellow craftsman 50 years ago and announce the principles for which they stood and for which they were prepared to fight—courage and the determination born of the conviction that they were right. When one considers the power of their opponents—employers and big business corporations—it appears virtually incredible that they should succeed in any measure at all. Certain it is that the odds were no less than the allied nations faced at the outset of the war against the totalitarian states.

Labor unions formed by small groups of valiant workingmen had just discarded the swaddling clothes of its infancy in the early 1900's and had begun to test its ability to walk. It had hardly taken the first step when it was struck a blow, from which it still feels the effect. This blow was the application by the Federal courts of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act to labor unions. At a time when it needed a helping hand it received instead a crippling kick. Later, attempts were made to free labor unions from the yoke of the antitrust laws by the passage of the Clayton Act, which in very high-sounding phrases proclaimed that the labor of a human being was not a commodity or article in commerce and that labor unions were free to strike and carry on all lawful activities of a labor union without such activities being a violation of the laws of the United States. The helping hand thus extended was withdrawn by judicial interpretation of the act and another blow thus was dealt to labor. With undaunted courage they carried on, never ceasing to have faith and to hope that some day the true plight of the workingman would be brought to light and effective measures carried out not only by the legislative branch of our Government but by the judicial and executive branches as well. Injunctive process halted labor in its attempts to better its conditions and preserve for itself whatever ground it had gained.

An enlightened legislature, fully realizing for the first time what government by injunction meant to organized labor, passed the Norris-LaGuardia Act in 1932, prohibiting the granting of injunctions by the Federal courts where a labor dispute existed. At least, recognition was given to the rights of labor to organize freely, to picket and strike if necessary, to do virtually everything that had been hitherto denied to them, short or fraud and violence, to bring about the objectives for which they had organized.

The declaration of the public policy as contained in the Norris-LaGuardia Act shows that Congress recognized the necessity of giving the workers freedom to exercise actual liberty of contract and freedom to organize with groups of their own choosing for the avowed purpose of negotiating terms and conditions of employment. Nor did the declaration stop there. It went on to say that the worker shall not only be free to organize but he shall be free to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

No one can deny that this act has been a great boon to labor, nor that the declaration of public policy did not truly reflect the feelings of the great majority of the people. In limiting the power of the Federal courts in granting injunctions, a real obstacle was removed from labor's path. But that path has not remained free from hurdles, and now labor faces what is, undoubtedly, its most serious problem—namely, criminal indictments under the Sherman antitrust law. It is difficult, if not impossible, to comprehend how and why labor should be tempted on the one hand to act in accordance with the public policy as declared in the Norris-LaGuardia Act and on the other hand face the peril of criminal indictment by the Government if it should so act.

This is a problem that must be faced squarely if any stability and harmony is to be offered to the laboring man. It is sufficiently difficult in these trying times of lack of employment to keep up the spirit and morale of the working people. If labor unions are forced to relinquish the ground they have gained in the last half century through these indictments, then surely that last back-breaking straw has been placed upon the backbone of our country—the laboring man.

The rights which the Norris-LaGuardia Act has proclaimed to belong to labor should be guaranteed to it, and whatever steps are necessary should be taken without hesitation to declare the activities of labor unions, short of racketeering, to be exempt from criminal prosecution by the Government.

The aforesaid views are those of Irving Dobbins, member and officer of Local No. 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which views I espouse.

Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. BURCH

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

RESOLUTION FROM THE DANVILLE (VA.) CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND AN EDITORIAL FROM THE DANVILLE (VA.) BEE

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the Danville Chamber of Commerce and an editorial from the Danville Bee:

Be it resolved, That the Danville Junior Chamber of Commerce, composed of 100 business and professional men between the ages of 21 and 36, at a special meeting called for the purpose of considering the problem of an adequate national defense, do hereby approve and accept the resolutions passed by the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce in convention assembled on the 21st of June, 1940.

It is our sincere belief that the resolutions so passed represent the views of millions of American young men on the subject of national defense and particularly on the question of compulsory military training.

We realize fully that compulsory military training affects our individual life, our families, our positions, and our future, but we feel that the integrity and institutions of our country are gravely threatened, and that to insure our independence and freedom it is imperative that we make the sacrifices necessary to assure adequate military training.

We believe compulsory military training as voted for by American citizens and controlled by the people of the country, is democratic in every sense of the word and that it is in our power, under our Constitution, to tax ourselves with this burden if we so desire to aid in the preservation of that Constitution.

We do not believe that military conscription as outlined in the bills before Congress will give any militaristic group the opportunity to sway this country against its democratic ideals or breed in us a militaristic attitude toward the world at large.

We thoroughly respect the opinion of those Americans and those organizations made up of Americans who feel that compulsory military training is not necessary to our program of national defense, but we challenge the rights of any organization to speak for young men of America which continues to include in its membership those, be they few or many, who openly favor any form of government contrary to the democratic form of government of the United States of America.

We challenge and condemn the resolutions as passed at the last convention of the American Youth Congress as failing to represent the views of American young men on the subject of compulsory military training.

Notice of this action taken by the Danville Junior Chamber of Commerce shall be forwarded to Congressman THOMAS G. BURCH, of the Fifth Congressional District of Virginia, to United States Senators Hon. CARTER GLASS and Hon. HARRY F. BYRD We respectively commend this action to the attention of other junior chamber of commerce organizations in the State of Virginia, and the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, and urge similar resolutions be forwarded to their respective Representatives in Washington.

[From the Danville (Va.) Bee of July 19, 1940]

SMARTIES IN DISGUISE?

The resolutions adopted by the Danville Junior Chamber of Commerce are interesting because they openly challenge, for the first time, so far as we are aware, the cynical attitude of the American Youth Congress which recently expressed its opposition to compulsory selective service for national defense—an extremely unhealthy sign—but one which is not symptomatic of the Nation's youth, taking it as a whole. The Youth Congress has the same sort of leaning as has the Youth Committee Against War which has been doing some spectacular picketing and getting its name in the papers. The positions taken by the two groups of youth cited have a false value, inasmuch as they receive the national publicity when for every single youth who professes opposition to organized national defense there are a hundred conservative-minded and nonvocal youths who are not opposed to it.

The recorded position which seems to portray a lack of patriotic interest has caused many searching questions. Is this attitude the result of the so-called college instruction in liberalism which veers over toward the communistic side? Is it the result of an exaggerated sophistication which leads to the recording of this and similar actions simply for the sake of being smart or of creating an illusion of a new form of youthful intelligentsia?

The natural tendency of every normal young American is to defend his country and to place himself subserviently at the disposition of those in whom defense is entrusted. Groups which embark on policies which place the freedom of the individual above the freedom of the State are either being studiously misled or else are infected by a dangerous virus.

Examination of their point of view shows extraordinary shortsightedness. They take the position that having made sacrifices to pursue higher education they are entitled to something more than the armed camp and the drill ground, that the affairs of their country should be so ordered that they should escape the perils of conscription. They fail entirely to realize that national defense is for the sole purpose of perpetuating American freedom of action which protects the privilege of the pursuit of culture. They might be told in the plainest of English that by showing reluctance to serve their country they are inviting intellectual enslavement and the putting of the ax to the root of the tree of freedom which gives to the United States, these days, magnificent stature.

Expenditures for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, there has in recent weeks been much controversy and discussion on the floor of this House concerning expenditures for national defense. At times an effort has been made to make it appear that the Republican Party has in years past neglected national defense and failed to make adequate appropriations for this purpose. I am, therefore, inserting at this point a very carefully prepared table showing the expenditures of government, national-defense expenditures, and the ratio of national defense to the total of expenditures for the years from 1923 to 1940 inclusive. The table speaks for itself and should set at rest the misstatements and misrepresentations that have at one time and another been made on this very important subject.

Total ordinary expenditures (exclusive of debt retirement and refunds), total expenditures for national defense, and ratio of defense expenditures to total ordinary expenditures, 1923–41

Year	Total ordinary expenditure	Total national-defense expenditures	Ratio, national defense to total ordinary expenditures
			Percent
1923	$3,137,000,000	$607,000,000	19.3
1924	2,889,000,000	575,000,000	19.9
1925	2,881,000,000	578,000,000	20.0
1926	2,909,000,000	580,000,000	19.9
1927	2,865,000,000	586,000,000	20.4
1928	2,938,000,000	625,000,000	21.2
1929	3,087,000,000	677,000,000	21.9
1930	3,283,000,000	702,000,000	21.3
1931	3,580,000,000	667,000,000	18.2
1932	4,434,000,000	664,000,000	14.9
1933	3,794,000,000	633,000,000	16.6
1934	5,947,000,000	494,000,000	8.3
1935	6,933,000,000	663,000,000	9.5
1936	8,612,000,000	880,000,000	10.2
1937	8,386,000,000	895,000,000	10.6
1938	7,586,000,000	980,000,000	12.9
1939	9,142,000,000	1,056,000,000	11.5
1940	9,446,000,000	1,163,000,000	12.3

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

RESOLUTION OF RESERVE OFFICERS OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am inserting a resolution unanimously adopted by the Statewide rally of Reserve officers of South Carolina, held at Columbia, S. C., on June 29, 1940.

You will note that these Reserve officers of my State have endorsed the President's policies of handling the international situation, and that they pledge to him their loyalty and unlimited support.

This resolution is very timely and appropriate and clearly indicates the patriotic attitude of these Reserve officers:

I

That we endorse the President's policies in the handling of the international situation; that we express to him our confidence in his integrity of purpose and in the soundness of his judgment; that we pledge to him our loyalty and unlimited support.

II

That we endorse the appointment of Colonel Stimson to be Secretary of War, and of Colonel Knox to be Secretary of the Navy; that we believe both of these men highly qualified for their respective positions.

III

That we strongly deprecate and disapprove the injection of partisan politics into the handling of the questions of national defense and of international policies; that we strongly disapprove of the tactics of any public citizens and newspaper editors who at this time for partisan purposes continue to attack the President's motives and policies in the handling of the international situation; that we believe it is the duty of all good citizens to support and uphold the President in his international policies and in his efforts toward national defense, and we believe those who are doing otherwise are doing a disservice to this country.

IV

That we believe this country should make immediate preparation for war just as though we were about to enter the war, and that we favor bending every possible effort toward the organization and creation of an Army adequate to meet any emergency, with a corresponding increase in the air force and the Navy.

V

That we believe it essential to the immediate welfare and safety of the United States of America that we coordinate all national efforts in the realization that we are all but at war; and, therefore, it behooves all good citizens to conduct their affairs on the assumption that war may be imminent; full support of all measures being given to the President of the United States.

VI

That we believe compulsory military training should be at once instituted; that we are thoroughly convinced compulsory military training will enhance our prospects of remaining at peace and be of untold benefit to the youth of the country.

VII

That we believe the American ideals of liberty and equality of opportunity are worth fighting for; that we believe the American way of life and ideals are threatened in the war now going on in Europe. Hence we are in full sympathy with the policy adopted by the National Government of giving aid to Great Britain and those fighting with her in her fight for freedom.

VIII

We believe that full use should now be made of Reserve officers on basis of capacity to relieve Regular officers in discharge of many routine duties.

Mobility—and the Engineer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ARTICLE BY COL. STUART GODFREY

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor and pleasure of acquaintance with a number of the principal officers in the Corps of Engineers of the War Department, among them being Col. Stuart C. Godfrey, Chief, Operations and Training Section, Office of the Chief of Engineers. Colonel Godfrey, in the course of his duties, made a careful study of the function of engineer troops in the present European conflict and has prepared a nontechnical article entitled "Mobility—and the Engineer," which I am privileged to present to the House of Representatives and the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This article has been cleared for publication in the RECORD by the Public Relations Branch of the Intelligence Section of the Army.

As I was privileged to serve my country in the Corps of Engineers during the World War, and served 12 of my 29 months in France, and in that part of France which received the brunt of the Nazi attack, recent operations there have held for me an intense interest as I am well acquainted with the terrain. Hence, it is a pleasure to present Colonel Godfrey's discussion concerning the relation of engineer troops to mobility.

The article by Col. Stuart C. Godfrey, Corps of Engineers, follows:

MOBILITY AND THE ENGINEER

The military engineer is much concerned with movement. Therein he may be likened to a traffic cop, who gives the "go" signal for the movement of friendly transport, while posting a "stop" sign to hostile vehicles. The ability of transport to move, and move rapidly, depends in great degree upon his engineering means—to help or to hinder.

Thus in examining for its military lessons the astounding demonstration of mobility that has recently been given in Europe, involving the skillfully coordinated use of a balanced force, he is not surprised to note that the engineers played a very important part in the rapid advance.

The success of the recent "blitzkrieg" may indeed be viewed as one essentially due to an increased degree of mobility. Not so much the method, as the tempo at which it was executed, was novel. The foot soldier marches at some 3 miles an hour. Motors increase this rate more than tenfold, while planes multiply it a hundredfold. The problem, then, is to take full advantage of this increased mobility.

The planes, with the open sky as highway, become long-range artillery. They also transport parachutists and infantry behind the enemy lines.

But the tanks, earth-bound as they are, must also be hurled forward. Everything must be geared up to this accelerated pace.

Does an unfordable river block the advance? Perhaps a critical bridge may be seized by the dash of a few motorcyclists while the defenders are still hesitating to destroy it. But suppose the bridge is out, the opposite bank still held by the enemy. Time was when the army waited till night, crossed in the dark by raft or skiff, gained a foothold on the opposite bank, enlarged its toehold, later built a bridge. Now it appears that success may sometimes be achieved more speedily, a crossing accomplished audaciously in fast motorboats, or a bridge built under fire. Heavy losses for the engineers, yes; but a small price to pay for a formidable obstacle overcome.

Or suppose a fortified line blocks the way, with tank traps, mine fields, concrete pillboxes. Most careful preparations are now in order. The weakest spot or spots are selected, and a replica laid out in some rear area where the whole operation is minutely rehearsed. An initial bombing or shelling aims to stun the defenders. Then comes a hand-to-hand grappling with each obstacle in turn. In the van of the troops assigned to knock out a pillbox are engineers with explosives, hand grenades, flame throwers of intense heat, scaling ladders. Supporting them perhaps is the fire of antitank guns and antiaircraft guns directed against the portholes. Out of the sky are dropped other troops to operate against pillboxes farther to the rear. Meanwhile other engineers are opening up a path for the tanks, detecting and removing mines, cutting away steel barriers with acetylene torches, hastily bridging other obstacles such as ditches.

Such concentrated assault tactics may well result in an early breach in the fortified line. Instantly the breach is exploited, and through it pour streams of scout cars, tanks, supporting infantry, engineers with bridging equipment, ready for the next obstacle. Movement, full speed ahead, is resumed.

With such speed is coupled audacity—the calculated defiance of ordinary restraints. An unexpected seizure may yield an important bridge, an enemy airfield, even the capital of an unsuspecting nation. A column of tanks may succeed in traversing seemingly impassable mountain roads, or may thrust deep into enemy territory. Great the risk, but it is a calculated risk that plays for big stakes, and is willing to pay in losses.

This concept of mobility in the attack seeks at the same time to deny mobility to the defender. It attempts to bomb his airfields with their planes on the ground, it interrupts his routes of communication, blocks his tanks, breaks up his columns forming for ccunterattack.

A defense against such an offensive needs to be equally mobile. A purely passive defense will fail. Such attacks can be stopped, but only by the exercise of an equal degree of vigor, audacity, and speed on the part of a defensive force, equally well trained and equipped with modern weapons, and defending a position in great depth.

In the defense, as in the attack, time is of the essence. How often has a retiring force, fearing to destroy an important bridge too soon, failed to destroy it altogether, until too late.

For such an attack, or defense, the demands on engineers will be enormous. Engineers, combat engineers, will be needed in plentiful numbers out in front, in addition to the units at work on roads and general construction and special tasks in rear. These combat engineers, an essential part of the combat team, must be specially trained in rapidly removing obstacles, in building bridges, in grappling with fortifications. They will be imbued with initiative, foresight, and the ability to work at top speed.

On the defense, engineers will be able, rapidly and effectively, to organize ground for maximum resistance, to prepare tank obstacles that cannot readily be overcome, to gain time and thereby thwart a hostile rapid advance.

The equipment of these combat engineers must be designed to accomplish results in minimum time. Power tools replace hand methods when practicable—which is by no means the general rule at the front.

As to ferrying and bridging equipment, the crux of the need is to have available for each successive obstacle the suitable bridging means, in type and quantity (giving the impression that the bridge is actually cut to length for a given width of stream).

It must be recognized that heavy bridge loads are not compatible with a high degree of mobility. There is no reliable evidence to indicate that rapid bridging methods have been developed for tanks of 30 tons and upwards. Such tanks, brought to a locality by railroad, may well be effective in a local operation against a heavily fortified line, but the rapidly moving tank columns which have been used so effectively in Europe were composed of tanks of 20 tons and less.

As to our own Army and its engineers, their mission—to assist the movement of our own troops and impede enemy movement—remains unchanged. With the increase of motorization and mechanization, with the destructiveness of aerial bombing, with the increased tempo of operations, that task has become even more important—and also infinitely more difficult of execution, demanding greater numbers and more equipment.

In the first World War the engineers earned their place as a combat arm, and that role has been recognized anew in the composition of the combat teams of the triangular divisions. Still more significant, perhaps, with respect to mobility, is the task for the engineers with our armored divisions, and for the newly constituted aviation engineers who will serve the G. H. Q. Air Force.

Still to be achieved for us is the completion of the organization and equipment for an adequate balanced force, and its perfected training as a coordinated team. In the task of preparation, aiming to create a highly mobile force, great emphasis will be placed on every time-saving, every speed-increasing factor. In this quest for mobility the engineers will be prepared to make their distinctive contribution.

Can We Fight Hitler With Equipment "On Order"?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert herewith an address recently delivered by me before several State conventions of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, as follows:

Comrade Commander and comrades, it is a real pleasure to get away from Washington and to enjoy the privilege again of not only addressing you but likewise mingling with a group that in the past have signally honored me.

To my mind, you represent a group that I affectionately term my own gang, and a gathering that appreciates a straight-from-the-shoulder discussion of the perplexing questions incident to the war situation.

Every war is accompanied by a wave of propaganda. You and I know the World War was no exception, and today from experience I hope that you comrades have not been misled by the abundance of foreign propaganda that has been unloaded on the American people during the past few years.

I hold in my hand a portion of what the average Member of Congress receives daily as propaganda from abroad. Here is a piece from Germany, a pamphlet from England, a circular from France, as well as Japan, Belgium, China, and other countries. Each of these pamphlets blames the other fellow in an effort to have the American people take sides in their century-old world wars.

To us who have served before, this propaganda is old stuff. We rubbed elbows with the Frenchman, the Britisher, the Jap, and others involved in this effort to sell their own bill of goods to America. Our services in the A. E. F. qualify us to take this propaganda with a grain of salt.

However, this cannot be said about the nonveteran. It appears that the American people are falling for this propaganda hook, line, and sinker. Therefore, we veterans must assume the responsibility of acquainting the American people with the true facts and, in so doing, make a worthwhile contribution to the welfare and preservation of our form of Government.

Unfortunately, all propaganda has not been confined to foreign sources, because I hold in my hand pieces of printed propaganda now being circulated throughout the United States by William Allen White, Kansas publisher, and his committee to defend America by aiding the Allies. For months and months the White committee has been leading the American people down a blind alley by advocating that we strip our own meager defenses to aid the Allies. There is no question the Allies have your sympathy and mine in the valiant struggle they put up against a superior military foe. But when it comes to exposing our own country to danger by disrupting our national defense, common sense tells us that we are forfeiting our own national safety.

At this point I want to impress upon you veterans, one thing, and that is, the White committee almost overnight developed to be self-appointed saviors of this Nation. Do you believe for a minute William Allen White is paying the bill for all this propaganda being fed the American people? Do you realize the members of the White committee are beyond military age? Can you forget that a few years ago this same gang of super-patriots labeled you and I treasury raiders when the adjusted compensation, commonly miscalled "bonus" was being considered in Congress? When we were pleading for adequate care and compensation for the disabled, and the dependents of deceased World War veterans, where was this same gang? Their patriotism was forgotten as they raised their voices in loud protest over payment of benefits to those whose service to country rendered them in need.

Let's forget William Allen White and his gang and talk about cold facts. For more than 150 years the American people have enjoyed the freedom of a democracy and a form of government universally recognized as a masterpiece of statesmanship. In 150 years we have accomplished more than the nations of the old world achieved in 10 centuries.

We value blessings that the Old World has never enjoyed. Therefore, comrades, if we are to continue to enjoy these benefits, we must safeguard our form of government by an adequate national defense, with a determined effort to stay out of this war.

Before talking about our national defense, let us give some thought to the type of defense needed should we be called to repel invasion from the Old World. The Hitler military machine, which is recognized as a mechanical military monster the like of which the world has never known, has required 7 years to develop at a cost of $40,000,000,000. It has consumed the energies of Europe's greatest industrial country, mobilizing every energy, talent, and resource of the industrious and talented German people. This military monster, a product of Hitler's mind, has revolutionized every phase of warfare to the extent that today it knows no equal. The striking power of Hitler's war machine is terrific.

In the short space of 21 days Hitler conquered Poland, destroyed a half million soldiers, and took 700,000 prisoners.

In spite of the British blockade, Hitler invaded and mastered Norway in 8 days. In similar fashion he crushed Holland in 4 days and vanquished Belgium in 17 days. In like manner he required but 21 days to destroy or capture the British expeditionary force in France, together with three entire French Armies.

Following the surrender of Belgium, it required Hitler but 17 days to conquer Paris, capture the Maginot line, drive the French Army more than 100 miles south of Paris, and reduce the French people to servitude.

In 2 months of active military operations Hitler has conquered a territory as great as New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin. He has conquered more than a hundred million people, possibly destroyed 2,000,000 soldiers, and taken as prisoners 3,000,000 more.

With the exception of Norway and Denmark, each of the nations subdued was of the opinion that they had set up a real defense against German aggression.

Let us examine this German war machine. From information available, it has at least a dozen mechanized divisions, commonly referred to as Panzer divisions. Each division consists of 1,274 motor vehicles, that consume 10,568 gallons of gasoline and 1,023 gallons of oil every 24 hours. These divisions move at the unbelievable rate of 40 miles a day. To you veterans, surely you recognize the great problem of keeping this giant military monster in operation, whose make-up is as follows:

A Panzer Division—Its Fuel Consumption

	Number	Daily use in gallons
		Gas	Oil
TANK BRIGADE
Light tanks	288	8,740	576
Medium tanks	72	3,600	216
Armored cars	50	625	43
Attached tanks:
6-ton "Assault"	45	1,350	90
20-ton "Break Thru"	36	4,320	360
80-ton "Break Thru"	12	6,000	360
Total	503	24,635	1,645
INFANTRY BRIGADE
Two motorized battalions: Trucks	100	850	100
Infantry transport: Trucks	550	4,450	475
Motorized artillery:
Carriers (7½-10-ton)	45	1,350	70
Truck train (80 2½-ton; 20 5½-7-ton)	100	1,034	134
Motorcycle battalion:
Cycles	64	112	8
Trucks	42	115	13
Antitank battalion:
Gun trailers	36	360	54
Cargo trucks	72	504	36
Reconnaissance battalion:
Scout cars	24	360	24
Trucks	79	475	37
Motorcycles	32	56	4
Trucks	8	80	11
Engineers' battalion:
Light motorcars	12	72	4
Trucks	50	435	30
Service signal battalion:
Light motorcars	24	70	5
Trucks	36	245	18
Total	1,274	10,568	1,023

Table above gives break-down estimates on a German Panzer division and shows tremendous daily consumption of gas and oil in gallons. Supply factors should double the figure shown for tank brigade gas and oil requirements, making totals 49,270 and 3,290. An air cooperation squadron is attached to each division but number of planes varies greatly. Figures for supply vehicles attached to a division are not available.

Recently I had an opportunity with other Members of Congress to view the official German war films in an "off the record" private showing in which was revealed the bloodiest warfare the world has ever known. We saw German parachutists land and immediately assemble machine guns; we saw giant German bombers unloading their cargo of death and destruction on the peace-loving countries of Norway, Holland, and Belgium; we saw the flame thrower taking its toll of human life and property; we saw the 6-ton, 20-ton, and the 80-ton tank in action; we saw the armored cars and motorcycles—in short, we saw Panzer Divisions, with not one soldier on foot, destroy modern armies that yesterday were heralded as among the world's greatest military forces.

My comrades, it is too bad William Allen White and his committee who advocate stripping our own national defense to aid the Allies could not witness the harrowing spectacle revealed by these films. In one Panzer Division they employ 288 light tanks, 72 medium tanks, 45 six-ton tanks, 36 twenty-ton and 12 eighty-ton tanks, or a total of 453 tanks. Remember, comrades, this is only one Panzer Division, and Hitler boasts of many such units.

On May 1, 1940, Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, and Gen. R. C. Moore, Assistant Chief of Staff for Supply, appeared before the Senate Military Affairs Committee and disclosed the exact status of critical items of equipment for the preparedness military program of this Nation. They submitted the following table giving an inventory of what we actually have on hand and what we have "on order." The table is as follows:

Actually on hand May 1, 1940

Ordnance:
Small arms and miscellaneous:
Semiautomatic rifle, cal. .30	38,000
37-mm. antitank gun	228
60-mm. mortar	3
81-mm. mortar	183
Machine gun, .50 cal	319
Machine gun, .30 cal. (light)	86
Automatic rifle, cal. .30	0
Artillery:
75-mm. gun (modern)	141
75-mm. howitzer (field)	60
105-mm. howitzer	0
155-mm howitzer (hi-speed)	436
155-mm. gun (modern)	4
155-mm. gun (hi-speed)	88
8-inch howitzer	0
Combat vehicles:
Scout car	485
Combat car	114
Light tank	10
Medium tank	18
Antiaircraft equipment:
3-inch gun, AA	448
90-mm. gun, AA	0
Director	168
Height finder	142
Sound locator	194
37 mm. gun, AA	15
Cal. .50 machine gun, AA	1,014
Detector, AA	0
Searchlight, 60-inch mobile, AA	285

On order, May 1, 1940

Item	Number	Date of delivery
Ordnance:
Small arms and miscellaneous:
Semiautomatic rifle, caliber .30	131,789	June 1942.
37-mm. antitank gun	744	Do.
60-mm. mortar	1,840	April 1941.
81-mm. mortar	479	November 1940.
Machine gun, .50 caliber	367	April 1941.
Machine gun, .30 caliber (light)	960	July 1941.
Automatic rifle, caliber .30	6,558	December 1940.
Artillery:
75-mm. gun (modern)	459	June 1941.
75-mm. howitzer (field)	96	May 1941.
105-mm. howitzer	60	October 1941.
155-mm. howitzer (high-speed)	295	March 1941.
155-mm. gun (modern)	36	April 1942.
155-mm. gun (high-speed)	56	August 1940.
8-inch howitzer	0
Combat vehicles:
Scout car	0
Combat car	34	December 1940.
Light tank	392	June 1941.
Medium tank	126	August 1941.
Antiaircraft equipment:
3-inch gun, antiaircraft	52	September 1940.
90-mm. gun, antiaircraft	114	September 1941.
Director	39	September 1940
Height finder	58	January 1942.
Sound locator	321	August 1941.
37-mm. gun, antiaircraft	584	Do.
Caliber .50 machine gun, antiaircraft	126	August 1940.
Detector, antiaircraft	18	August 1941
Searchlight, 60-inch mobile, antiaircraft	294	January 1941.

You will note from the above table that in the entire United States Army on May 1, 1940, we had 10 light tanks and 18 medium tanks, or a grand total of 28 modern tanks comparable to a modern German tank. Yes, it must be admitted we have 392 light tanks on order, but you will note they will not be delivered until June 1, 1941. You will also note we have 126 medium tanks on order and their delivery is not until August 1941.

When you return home and receive a copy of the convention proceedings, study this inventory and determine for yourself what we have and what we do not have and when delivery may be expected of items on order.

Let us not forget the Air Corps of the Army and Navy and their important place in present-day methods of warfare. Rear Admiral John H. Towers, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, recently told the Senate Naval Affairs Committee that the Navy had on hand 1,755 planes and on order, 1,137. He continued by asserting the Navy would have only 1,902 combat planes by July 1, 1941.

Major General Arnold, Chief of the Army Air Corps, testified that of the 2,752 planes in the Army Air Corps, only 52 planes are fit for modern warfare, and of the remaining 2,700, perhaps a half dozen could be rendered fit for combat. In other words, 58 fighting planes in the United States Army and Germany has 18,000.

William Allen White and his committee, eager to furnish aid to the Allies, especially planes, should thoroughly analyze the fact that as to the planes on order, the whole delivery schedule of Army and Navy planes has been delayed by a recent order giving the Allies priority on all American military production desired by them. Thus the 3,837 plans on order are not in fact in production for our own use should the Allies elect to call for them.

Comrades, you recall from the start of this discussion we decided to look at the facts. One fact you cannot overlook is that soldiers, sailors, and marines cannot fight wars with equipment on order, and William Allen White and his committee should recognize this fact.

Another fact is that the General Staff of the United States Army knows more about war than the President or anyone else, and I am convinced when Hon. Harry H. Woodring resigned as Secretary of War he was forced to do so because he elected to follow the advice of military experts rather than to accept the viewpoint of a group of international meddlers whose military knowledge is zero plus and whose only concern is to utter high-sounding phrases tending to send the youth of America to the battlefields of Europe. Hon. Harry H. Woodring is entitled to the esteem and love of the great American public for his courage and manhood in refusing to become a tool of the international bankers. One has only to read the following statement from Harry Woodring's own lips to arrive at a suitable conclusion as to why he was forced to resign as Secretary of War. Upon returning to his native State of Kansas on June 1, 1940, to receive honors from Washburn College, Secretary Woodring said:

"I'm an advocate of adequate defense but I will never stand for sending American boys into Europe's shambles. There is a comparatively small clique of international financiers who want the United States to declare war and get into the European mess with everything we have, including our manpower.

"I'm not going to stand for it and I'm not going to resign until forced to do so.

"They don't like me because I'm against stripping our own defenses for the sake of trying to stop Hitler 3,000 miles away. Eventually they will force me to resign, and I'll be darned glad to come back to Kansas where the people have their feet on the ground and are not easily swayed by demagogues and subtle propaganda."

Comrades, Harry Woodring saw the handwriting on the wall and as a true American he put the welfare of his country first. In other words, he has the veterans' viewpoint—build an adequate national defense by arming to the teeth.

But the White committee of superpatriots would have us police the entire globe and neglect our own back yard.

We must recognize the fact that in addition to building up our own military defenses we have the problem of assisting in militarizing the Western Hemisphere which means adequate defense for every country south of the Rio Grande.

Many of you comrades have served in the Latin-American countries and you realize the shortcomings of our neighbors in these countries in developing into military men. They lack both the temperament and the physique to make real soldiers. In order to protect our own interests and to offset the alien influences now running hog wild in these countries, we now have a huge task in being forced to send men, money, planes, tanks, and other implements of war to properly militarize this Western Hemisphere.

In the face of building our own inadequate defenses and shoulder the burdens of our Latin American neighbors, William Allen White and his commmittee have the gall of an army mule in advocating that we strip our armed forces of greatly needed military equipment in their frenzied efforts to meddle into European affairs.

I take the position we must arm to the teeth and when that task is completed militarize South America before turning our attention to the plight of European nations.

America has a huge task in carrying out our national-defense program because it is easily seen that needed equipment cannot be delivered for a period of from 18 months to 2 years. At the completion of that period we hope to have an Army and equipment comparable to Hitler at a cost of approximately $50,000,000,000. We cannot possibly achieve this goal if we are to listen to William Allen White and his cohorts or the propaganda from Europe that would have us strip our armed forces of an adequate national defense.

Our national-defense program will be of no avail unless we as a Nation unite in our efforts to properly defend this country and the Western Hemisphere. There was never a time in the history of this great Nation when national unity was at a greater premium.

If this objective is to be attained our national unity must be above suspicion. America will not countenance the presence of those who harbor a desire for other forms of government. Such deluded individuals with their warped minds and false political philosophies are the scum of creation and unfit to associate with liberty-loving Americans. These breeders of international hatred and disrupters of the American way of life are the tools of Stalin and Hitler and form the backbone of the "fifth column" in America.

Despite the love of Americans for national unity, it is a known fact that the "fifth column" is running hog-wild throughout the country. Yes, the "fifth column" is on the march.

No city in this great land is immune to the workings of these disciples of Stalin, Mussolini, and Hitler. They preach and practice their un-American doctrines with a sneer on their faces and a song of hate in their black hearts.

With reckless abandon and unmitigated gall they have invaded Government departments in the Nation's Capital, enlisting Federal employees in their determined drive to undermine this Government.

Make no mistake about it—the "fifth column" is on the march.

Daily the corridors of many Government buildings in Washington resound to the footsteps of hundreds of Federal employees known to harbor un-American doctrines.

I hold in my hand a printed membership list of the Washington, D. C., branch of the American League for Peace and Democracy containing the names of 563 Government employees known to be members of this organization branded by the Dies committee as a Communist-front organization. The salaries of this group range from $1,080 to $10,000 annually, which are paid from the pockets of the taxpayers of America. Since this list was published in the official hearings of the Dies committee on October 5, 1939, only 20 persons named therein have notified the Dies Committee that they have renounced their membership. During the month of June the House of Representatives was informed that this group of employees was still on the Federal pay roll. One week later specific attention was directed to a fellow traveler in the Department of Labor who, while occupying a $7,000-a-year position, finds time to carry on at the expense of the American taxpayer the program of another Communist-front organization.

A week later I had called to my attention that the acting chairman of the Federal Advisory Council for Employment Security, when asked to consider a motion granting preference to American citizens, publicly confessed the fact that he was an alien.

The climax in this parade of "fifth columnists" was reached several days ago when there arrived in Washington a man who from his own lips asserted that he was a delegate to the Twentieth Anniversary of the Russian Revolution in Moscow. This individual is daily awaiting an appointment to a key position in our national-defense program concerning the training of the youth of America.

Yes; the "fifth column" is truly on the march in this great Nation.

Congress has enacted the necessary laws to suppress the "fifth column" if only those high in authority would recognize this menace and move promptly to exterminate it.

America cannot afford to allow this parade of "fifth columnists" to go on unmolested. With the entire country working at a feverish pace to attain the objectives of our national-defense program, it is not difficult to realize how the "fifth columnists," or, as they are more appropriately termed, "filth columnists," can disrupt our well-organized plans.

Every loyal American will find no difficulty in recognizing the real threat of the "fifth column" to our national unity and likewise to our priceless heritage—a free democracy.

It is unthinkable that the taxpayers of America should be called upon to pay the salaries of Federal employees who have "fifth column" tendencies. Nor should the mothers and fathers of America be asked to entrust the training of their sons to Moscow-minded individuals. We have only to recall the sad fate of France and other countries of Europe betrayed by the "fifth columnists" who were permitted to thrive unmolested at the expense of the people.

Let the message of the American people to these alien agitators be phrased in plain language—if you don't like the American form of government, get out and stay out.

We have heard a lot recently of purging political office-holders for differences in opinion. If we are to attain the required solidarity of this Nation, let us witness those in high authority conducting a worthwhile purge in ousting from Government circles known enemies to the American way of life.

America has a gigantic task in building a national defense to preserve our priceless heritage of liberty and freedom. But we can never accomplish our task while there lurks in the shadows of the Nation's Capitol a group of alien-minded ingrates who, like vultures, are bent on destroying this Nation.

America is at the crossroads. If we are to proceed in the right direction, let us with a firm hand and a stout heart inform the "fifth columnists" that their hey-day is over and that they will be no longer coddled, nursed, or tolerated.

In short, there is no choice. You are either an American or not an American.

Let our actions and our words convey to these "fifth columnists" in blunt language the command of all liberty-loving Americans—if you don't like America, get out and stay out.

In closing, let me for a moment pay tribute to the great veteran organizations of this country who from year to year have advocated an adequate national defense and the suppression of un-American activities.

For 3 years I served you as your commander in chief and from coast to coast conveyed your wishes to the American people for an adequate national defense, urging them to realize the menace that springs from un-American groups who were bent on gaining a foothold in this country. Many laughed at us, called us superpatriots, and sneeringly remarked that we could see a "red" behind every bush.

Today as we assemble in this convention hall the people of America are aroused to the menace that is threatening our national life. Had the people of America taken the advice of the veteran organizations, today we would have a national defense second to none and we would have no ism in this country but true Americanism.

Comrades, in bidding you adieu I beseech you to return to your homes, happy in the thought that we are free Americans and that the false propaganda flooding our country in the language of an old sailor, is plain "baloney," and in stowing it away, "use plenty of salt."

Thanks a million, gang, and I hope to see everyone of you at our national convention in Los Angeles.

Nazi-Communist Strangulation of Small Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the war-ravaged world, calloused and inured to shock following repeated German excesses and the murder, plunder, and enslavement of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Finland, Denmark, and Norway, shuddered when the murderous German legions again invaded the peaceful countries of Luxemburg, Belgium, and Holland. The bloody imprint of the iron heel of the Hun blotted out the freedom, the culture, and the happiness of these unfortunate peoples. Like the locust hordes, the legions of Hitler destroyed everything in their path. Nothing was inviolate and nothing was spared. Some of the most beautiful and picturesque cities in all Europe have been ruthlessly destroyed. The civilization of a thousand years has been steeped in blood by the plundering hordes of nazism and it will take another thousand years to eradiate the traces of this systematized, coldly premeditated German destruction.

Like the periodic plague of destructive locusts, the German armies break loose upon their unsuspecting and trusting neighbors at least once in every generation. The locusts, after devastating everything in their paths, reappear in 17 years. The German armies have in the past 75 years plundered and destroyed their neighbors on the average of once every 15 years. In 1864, Germany without excuse or reason attacked, plundered, and then deprived Denmark of the provinces of Schleswig and Holstein. In 1866, she traitorously turned upon Austria, her erstwhile ally and partner in crime. In 1870, France was brutally attacked and was treated in typical Germanic fashion. In 1914, Belgium and again France were made to feel the brunt of German madness which, of course, drenched nearly all of Europe in the blood of the innocents.

In 1939, or exactly 75 years since the previous attack upon Denmark, nazified Germany tore into shreds the 10-year nonaggression pact with Poland and invaded the realm of her peace-loving neighbor. How long the world will permit this organized frothing fiendishness to continue, no one knows. Unless it is destroyed or burns itself out, civilization and democracy among men and among nations is in danger of being extinguished. The atrocious attitude of this bandit among nations is responsible for all of the misery, destruction, and killing. Mussolini and Stalin are but accomplices and petty gangsters following the example and carrying out the orders of Hitler, the master mind and chief. This combination will never be broken up and peace will not come to the world unless and until Germany is defeated and Hitler, his hide tanned and stuffed, is put on display in a London museum as a warning to all future madmen who might be tempted to leave their lowly though honorable paperhanging trade for a career of murder and plunder.

Today Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia are no more. These three struggling little nations have been absorbed by the Russian bear. If press dispatches can be believed, the people of these little nations celebrated with dancing and music their absorption and inclusion in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. What brazen effrontery, what sinful misrepresentation disseminated in the United States for the purpose of misleading the American public—the proud and intellectual Lithuanians, figuratively throwing their arms about the necks of their Bolshevik oppressors as they give up their own thousand-year-old nationalism, tradition, and culture for filthy and godless communism. Picture, if you can, these three gallant and inoffensive little nations along the shores of the Baltic dancing upon their own graves.

Lithuania will never give up her freedom. She will never forsake or renounce her independence and will, for a certainty, rise again when the world returns to rationalism and fairness. The absorption of the three little Baltic countries is the direct result of Germany's war phobia, for which no other nation in the world, not even the instrumental Russia, is to be blamed. Germany and Germany alone is responsible for everything that has happened recently in Europe and which has caused untold suffering, hardship, and the loss of independence by the invaded nations.

The "blitzkrieg" continues as nation after nation is wiped out. Hitler continues the visitation of destruction by fire and sword as he imposes his will and his desperate philosophies upon weak and God-fearing nations.

Let America take heed of what has happened, and let us not be misled by German propaganda and lies as to what Hitler's attitude might be toward expansion in the Western Hemisphere and his professed lack of interest in the United States. Let us arm this Nation so that all the power of Hitler and of hell combined will not prevail against us. That is the only kind of reasoning that Germany understands today. That is the only kind of action that she will recognize. It is the one certain way for America to preserve her democratic institutions, traditions, and system of government; that is the sole and the only way to preserve peace.

We are not going to attack Germany, but Germany will attack the United States only if we are unprepared. Rearmament, with a two-ocean navy, means peace and preservation for America.

Health and Medical Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ADDRESS BY SURGEON GENERAL PARRAN

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able statement recently made by Thomas Parran, Surgeon General, United States Public Health Service, on the subject Health and Medical Preparedness, before the New York State Conference of Health Officers and Public Health Nurses, Saratoga Springs, June 25, 1940.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The problem which concerns each of us today is what we can do to contribute to the safety of our country. Traditionally, as doctors and nurses, we have been servants of peace. When war did come, it was our job to patch up the wounds, ease the suffering of the wounded, and repair as best we could the damage done by shot and shell.

We are not at war. If we have time enough—if we are swift and wise enough in the time that we have—war in this hemisphere may be prevented. But the old rules of war, and the preparation for it, have been demolished. The whole task of national defense is different than it was 25 years ago. Just as the perversion of the physical and chemical sciences has brought more brutal, more rapid, more devastating destruction both to unprepared armies and unarmed civilians, the developments of the medical sciences have expanded the scope of what doctors and public-health workers can do for preparedness. The concept of a total war necessitates the concept of a total defense—a total national effort, not only toward resistance but toward unassailable strength.

Psychologically, this country as yet seems unprepared for the total effort toward strength which recent world events make imperative. On the one hand we hear imprecations because we are not now better prepared in guns and ships and planes and organized manpower. On the other hand, we hear criticism at steps taken now to prepare promptly against aggression toward ourselves or our immediate neighbors. One of the risks I see to national unity of action lies in the idea that defensiveness alone is all we need to preserve our democracy. Yet as Governor Lehman has said again and again, democracy is a thing we must constantly fight for. All recorded history shows, I think you will agree, that no nation has arisen to strength, as we have; or remained strong, as we hope to; no human rights have been established or liberties maintained without dynamic, aggressive action. St. Paul and the Apostles were not defensive when they established the Christian faith. Our Revolutionary ancestors were not defensive when they fought to establish human liberties and found a nation. The Boston Tea Party, for example, was one of the most provocative acts on record. Buchanan was merely defensive when he permitted the Nation to fall into the turbulence and dissension which preceded the Civil War. Lincoln took the dynamic aggressive to preserve the Union, without which we now should be as helpless as little Denmark.

Today I would discuss with you the aggressive action which you and I, by virtue of our calling—because we are the servants of peace—must take to build up national strength. The needs to be met are enormous in scope, yet simple in analysis. National strength can be built up only by the adequate application of all the sciences to the provision of armament, munitions, and supplies, food, and manpower. Our job is manpower.

Seven competent, trustworthy persons recently were called to assist the Government in national defense. Industry is represented both in raw materials and processing. Labor, agriculture, transportation, and the consumer are represented. There is a shrewd eye on the stabilization of prices. Research problems in the physical and chemical sciences are being attacked with vigor by an able committee, which will apply all the knowledge we have or can discover to the perfection of armaments. Yet, so far as I know, there has been no more thought than in 1917 of the application of medical and public-health science to the physical problems of a nation arming.

Yet for what cause is this Nation arming, if not on behalf of the men, women, and children who compose it? Their physical fitness, their freedom from preventable disease, their morale, or mental stamina will determine almost entirely the effectiveness of all other defense efforts. Important in the easy days of peace without a cloud on the horizon, it is urgent now that the people of this Nation be physically tough, mentally sound, and morally strong. If we are not, to quote Mr. MacLeish, "we can leave our planes unbuilt and our battleships on paper. We shall not need them."

In time of stress, the health problems of the military and civilian population are inseparable. At present they are the responsibility of many unrelated Federal agencies having the happiest personal good will toward one another, but with no more official authority or compulsion toward coordinated action than did an airplane factory and an automobile plant 2 months ago. Each of these agencies legally can perform only certain functions set up by law. None of them has a close, working integration with the organized medical and public-health professions. The State health departments are as diverse as the 48 States. None of the official agencies have the benefits of a full working relationship with the great voluntary associations for health and welfare, in which doctors, dentists, nurses, engineers, in their technical capacity, work side by side with citizens to caulk up the leaks in the hull of our national manpower. None of the official agencies has the full aid and service which the public-spirited foundations set up to promote health and welfare are able to give.

Our defense plans, for the immediate emergency, are still young. There is much in the way of organization and coordination yet to come. But as a first step in meeting the vital needs of manpower preparedness, I propose that a coordinator of medical and health preparedness for national defense be appointed under the National Defense Council. There is much for him to do. He would work with and through the Surgeons General of the United States Army, the United States Navy, and the United States Public Health Service, other Federal agencies, and the national voluntary organizations concerned with the prevention, diagnosis, and treatment of disease.

A first task is the need for listing and classifying professional and technical personnel in the country; for planning and aiding, if and when necessary, the recruitment and mobilization of medical and health personnel.

Another urgent task involves the protection and promotion of the health of industrial workers. With the vast expansion of the war industries, many new industrial hazards appear and familiar ones are intensified. When new factories are designed, expert industrial-hygiene advice is required for proper installation of power exhausts of chemical gases. Records of present performance show the need of extended industrial-hygiene measures to control and prevent special health hazards. In the recruitment and training of workers, thorough physical examinations are necessary upon employment and periodically thereafter. It is wasteful for industry to train a highly skilled employee over long months, only to have him break down suddenly with tuberculosis, mental disease, or some other crippling condition. The expansion of war industries will bring acute problems of housing, medical care, and health protection for workers and their families. Our industrial machines are the most efficient in the world. The men and women who man the machines must have a comparable efficiency.

Certain diseases have particular military importance. The venereal diseases are at the top of the list. They caused more disability in the last war than anything except wounds and influenza. Fortunately we have been forehanded in building some machinery in every State to deal with this problem. We need to intensify these efforts, especially in those areas of military and industrial mobilization.

The importance of tuberculosis is accentuated by the current situation. Here, too, we have made some progress since the last war in terms of a lower active infection rate and a lower death rate, but we do not have in any State the machinery to detect all active cases of the disease. In very few States do we have the sanatoria to care for such cases. It should be possible promptly to find and to isolate all sources of infection. Recent developments in the small and microfilm techniques mean that we can easily afford it.

Not one of the seven fine persons on the National Advisory Commission of the Defense Council, however, is aware of what this country can do to eliminate tuberculosis as a major obstacle to national security. We know that Hitler has put all of his active tuberculous together in factories to give, between dying coughs, a few months of service in munition making. This was segregation and service to the state but without regard for the welfare of the individual. If we plan well now, we shall not need such suicide squads for bomb manufacture. Segregate, yes; but let us restore also.

Of the many military medical and health problems in the tropical Americas, the most important is malaria. There is no disease of comparable importance (except the mental diseases) against which we have made less scientific progress, during my generation. Quinine is still the major remedy. Like rubber, originally secured from South America, now our major source of supply is from across the Pacific Ocean, the Dutch East Indies. Holland is no longer able to import, process, and distribute this remedy. Its cartel prevented us from storing a sufficient war chest of our most needed medical strategic material. All of Central and South America now look to us to supply their needs. For 2 years I have been concerned with this problem. It is not yet solved. No major military operations in the Tropics of this hemisphere are possible without quinine or the equally potent German synthetic, atabrine. Here is another job for a national coordinator on the medical front.

Another strategic medical material for which we are dependent upon foreign sources is opium. For 4 years I have prescribe the total annual amounts which could be imported into the United States. Before and after Munich, I aided our commercial importers to build up a war chest of opium and morphine. In the vaults at Washington, formerly used to store gold, we have stored enough morphine for at least 3 years. Our regular source has been from the eastern Mediterranean, now closed. Before this supply is exhausted we can, if necessary, grow in certain areas of the United States the pain-relieving poppy plant. But it must be planned now.

Other diseases require our attention. Next to the venereal diseases, mumps is the most disabling of the acute infections among recruits. Meningitis was a great hazard during the last war. Influenza still is a major threat. During the intervening 22 years many facts about it are becoming clear, but with present knowledge effective prevention and control is not possible. Research must be speeded up and coordinated. It may be that the nation which first learns how to control influenza will by this knowledge tip the scales toward victory in the wars ahead. No one now is coordinating our search for the practical prevention of this major hazard to successful defense. Until recent months we could expect aid from medical discoveries in our sister democracies. Now, in this country, alone, we must carry the burden. As yet we have not gone forward with it.

When armies are mobilized certain proven immunizations are used. Typhoid fever, yes. Smallpox, yes—since Jenner's discovery of more than 100 years ago. A recently developed toxoid against tetanus is of proven value and will be used routinely. Effective immunization against gas gangrene would be another great aid. By a few months of coordinated effort on the part of commercial, university, and governmental groups, a practical protection against this major war hazard should be perfected. Here is another job for the coordinator.

Our first concern may be in tropical America. I have discussed malaria. What about yellow fever? Prevalent throughout large areas of South America, a constant threat to the southern half of the United States, we do not have in this country enough of the effective vaccine against it to immunize one regiment. In spite of the requests from year to year, I have not been able to secure funds with which to produce a reserve supply.

These examples, among many I could cite, illustrate my major thesis. There are many diseases, of great military importance, which we could control if we were given the will, the authority, and the money to do it.

If or when war comes, every 1,000,000 men mobilized need 7,500 doctors drawn from civil practice. Dentists, nurses, sanitary engineers are needed too. In the mobilization of 4,000,000 during the last war, more than a fourth of the effective medical men of the country were called to the colors. Whole counties were depleted of doctors. Many medical schools were almost put out of business, because the best men left for military duty. We should not repeat these mistakes. Today we should investigate who should go, who should stay to practice, to teach, to operate an essential civilian service. We have no machinery now to do this. A coordinator of medical and health preparedness should create the machinery, working with the public health agencies, the schools, and the medical profession itself.

We have a shortage of laboratory technicians. Intensive courses would provide more. Universal training would deplete the ranks of medical students; yet we need doctors each year to replace obsolescence. Some medical and other scientists are vastly more valuable to the country working on their present jobs than they possibly could be in the Army or Navy. Here are other tasks for medical planning through a coordinator.

Further, let us consider the whole problem of national fitness. The President has recommended that all youth give 1 year to public service—be trained during this time in some skill. How fit are they from a physical and mental viewpoint? Enrollment should include a careful examination. All correctable defects should receive prompt attention. As yet, there is no organization, no planning of an organization to do it. This is a task projected.

Let us consider two tasks immediately before us. The National Youth Administration employs 300,000 young people. Here is a measurable group, beneficiaries of the Government. After 5 years no plan has been worked out to appraise their physical status. Shouldn't we take this group of underprivileged youth and apply our proven medical science to relieve their correctable defects?

Employed by the Work Projects Administration are nearly 2,000,000 people. The Nation wants to use their services; they, themselves, want to serve in the ways they can best contribute to national safety. What is their physical status? No one knows. I propose that each of them be examined; that we use methods comparable to those of the draft boards of 22 years ago, and classify the Work Projects Administration employees physically into three or four classes. Those qualified to become good workmen should be first on the list for training in the industries now short-handed. Those who have remediable defects merit rehabilitation. Up to now no agency has had the authority or the money to do these two specific jobs which seem important in national preparedness.

If our workers are malnourished, they cannot be efficient in producing what we need for defense. Yet every survey of nutrition, by whatever method conducted, shows that malnutrition in this country is widespread and serious. For example, studies by the Department of Agriculture show that 40 percent of the people are not getting a diet adequate to maintain good health and vigor. Eight out of every ten in this category do not have an income sufficient to purchase, at market prices, a diet adequate in amount and kind; this in spite of the fact that the foods of which the Nation has an apparent surplus are those in which the dietary of so many is deficient—milk and milk products, citrus fruits, green vegetables, and meat.

Not through any pity for their working people, but because their scientists proved to them that it was an essential to national power, the Germans began several years ago to provide for the working masses a diet better than ours have now. We have made a beginning in this direction through the food-stamp plan. What we need is an intensive national drive, with rigid scientific controls, to use the food we have to improve the fitness of our manpower.

Though I would not presume to draw up a blueprint for the whole effort of health preparedness, each of the problems mentioned needs prompt attention. With authority from the National Defense Council, several committees of experts, both official and professional, should undertake special responsibilities. What seems now a huge, illimitable job is, in reality, a composite of measurable tasks. There is a competent person to do each, if it is assigned to him. There is the will among our professions and among our citizens which will see that each is done. But I repeat, the first step is a strong leader in the National Defense Council to see that the country's needs are met for physical and mental preparedness, for health, and medical mobilization, for peace or war. At the same time he would serve to unite the efforts of official, professional, commercial, and voluntary groups in our unified drive for aggressive strength.

In the past there has been division of opinion and occasional dissension among our professions concerning methods proposed to bring better health and a higher standard of medical care to our people. In the face of danger it is the democratic way—even the herd instinct—to unite for the agreed objectives of safety. We cannot now afford controversies. The preparedness of our manpower for national safety is not controversial. Given a hand in the planning, all of us together, official and professional, can work out methods in which we all believe.

There is no time for dogged adherence to outworn patterns, nor for a major change in proved forms of medical practice. Medical science grows, expands, opens up new possibilities for saving life and building strength. In the application of its basic sciences, medical practice must expand also to meet the new demands of the Nation for self-preservation.

In the dictatorships, the state is served by sacrifice of the individual and enslavement of the men of science. If our democracy is to stand, we—as doctors, as health officers, as health workers, as citizens—of our own free will because we know it is necessary, must put medical science to work now, fully, to make our men as good as our machines.

Sad Commentary on Democratic Jobholders' Convention—"They Didn't Cheer in the Galleries"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ARTICLE BY ELSIE ROBINSON

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, perhaps P. T. Barnum was right when he said, "The people like to be fooled," but the reaction to the recent Democratic Convention in Chicago, of which a substantial proportion of the delegates were jobholders enjoying the largesse of the New Deal, seems to cast some doubt on Barnum's famous dictum. At least when a typical American gets fooled he does not want the party which perpetrated the hoax to think that he "got away with it"—perhaps this accounts for the great surge of sentiment throughout the land by which Americans are letting the President know that they were not misled by the "I don't want a third term" histrionics which preceded the steam-roller carnival in Chicago.

Elsie Robinson was an experienced and impartial observer of the Chicago convention. Her reactions are illuminating. She watched the job-holding delegates cheer as they applauded the "draft us and save our jobs" drama, but she wondered about the eloquent silence of the galleries. She investigated this curious paradox. With true reportorial skill she reveals her findings in the following article, which was syndicated in papers throughout the country.

The taxpayers and the job hunters in the galleries "sat on their hands," while the tax eaters and the jobholders went through their practiced parades and marched gleefully while the superintendent of city sewers of Chicago chanted his weird crys and called the tunes from a hide-out beneath the speakers' platform. Ed Kelley, of Chicago, and Frank Hague, of New Jersey, had their machines on the floor, and their "Pied Pipers" sent out the cry "Draft Roosevelt" which these two new patron saints of the Democratic Party had ordered them to proclaim. But they had forgotten the galleries—and they did not cheer in the galleries.

It is a most unusual story. But read it from the pen of an eyewitness. Elsie Robinson was there. She saw the parade on the floor and observed the awful silence in the galleries. Let her describe it to you in person:

GALLERY SILENT AS DELEGATES CHEER F. D. R.

(By Elsie Robinson, famous magazine writer and author)

They didn't cheer in the gallery.

Yes; you'll read differently. They'll tell you of the "spontaneous roars of enthusiasm" and the "uncontrolled delight" which met the announcement of F. D. R.'s name on the Tuesday evening meeting of the Democratic Convention. But it just wasn't so.

I was there—and I know. And there's no use trying to pull punches at a time like this—even though it might suit your preferences or mine to do so. The simple truth is all that can serve or save us in this era of fear and dismay.

So here's the pay-off on what really happened on Tuesday night at that "demonstration of Democratic loyalty." Whatever your position in our United States scheme of things, you had better get the facts straight. For, regardless of party or politics, those facts are going to make American history * * * and decide your destiny and mine. And the whole thing is condensed in the first line of this article:

They didn't cheer in the gallery.

SOMETHING WRONG

I was sitting in the press box when the rumpus started. Wondering. There's been something wrong with this picture since it started—but I couldn't figure it out. Individual pique? Political peeve? Quien sabe?

But something wasn't clicking—anyone could tell that. One look at the grim or bored faces of the delegates told that * * * particularly if you remembered those hot, hilarious riots of 1932. Riots no political boss needed to plan. And now—

The place was jammed, of course. The word had gone out that Senator BARKLEY was "going to spill the dope; be the President's mouthpiece; tell 'em where the big boy stood." So in they came. All those who had tickets. And presently, surprisingly, those who hadn't.

The common people, the obscure and forgotten, who've never seen a convention ticket, who've never heard the ballyhoo which decided their fate—in they came.

Men in overalls; women in shabby "basement bargains," with babies at their breasts or tugging at their knees; unemployed youngsters with hunger in their eyes, longing to find their place in the scheme of things.

Shuffling through the suddenly opened doors, past the strangely welcoming smiles of Chicago's slickest cops—America en masse—wondering what was what, shuffling down the long lobbies, climbing the long stairs, settling down at last in the gloom and glare of the galleries.

JUST BLURS IN GLOOM

Far up there in the stadium's smoky vault they sat. Thousands of pale, inarticulate blurs against the darkness. Blurs immeasurably removed from the colorful crowd of delegates on the floor, from the big shots on the platform, from the chattering "socialites" in the boxes, gay as birds of paradise. America's forgotten millions, sitting up there in the gloom, peering down through the mist, watching, waiting, waiting, waiting for the real stuff to happen.

And it didn't happen.

Yes; there was a show. You know the program. The speeches, the songs, the whoopee—all plotted far in advance, cleverly planned, carefully drilled, expensively arranged. The very best "enthusiastic response" which Messrs. Mayor Kelly, of Chicago, and Boss Hague, of New Jersey, could possibly contrive. Both of 'em past masters in fixing fireworks. But for once the fireworks didn't fix and the fuzes fizzled—fizzled because they had forgotten the one important thing—

Those faces in the gallery which didn't cheer!

So the show started off with many a misgiving. (It always had been so easy before—why should they doubt their stuff now?) At this moment Senator BARKLEY's voice would waver—drop—give the ultimate announcement.

"The President has never had, and has not today, any desire or purpose to continue in the office of President, to be a candidate for that office, or to be nominated by the convention for that office."

OVATION DOESN'T COME

The quaver, the hush, the announcement. So carefully planned and rehearsed. The waiting delegates, so thoroughly informed. And then?

Something went wrong. The delegates started to march. The big shots started to cheer. The visiting firemen were all set to cut loose. But something happened which upset the expectations and scuttled the beautiful dreams—

They didn't cheer in the galleries.

A mechanical dribble of mass marching. Most of the delegates sitting apathetically while their leaders stumbled forward, feebly, with half-furled flags. A trained voice shrieking "Alabama wants Roosevelt! Arkansas wants Roosevelt! Arizona wants Roosevelt!" But never an answering cheer to prove that all America wanted Roosevelt!

Never a cheer from those waiting, watching galleries!

FINDS ANSWER IN GALLERIES

No cheers? No mobs? Only this obvious, synthetic response? So what?

I decided to discover—left my seat—mounted by myriad steps to those glum and glowering galleries. Surely here, if anywhere, there should be spontaneous sizz-boom-bah. Here, in the ranks of the W. P. A., the ramparts of relief.

But there wasn't!

Silent they sat, those nameless millions—watching and waiting for the real works. Slant-eyed and cynical, they regarded the mechanical monkeyshines of the marionettes on the floor, so far below. With infinite boredom they listened to their dictated ballyhoo.

There weren't any cheers in the gallery.

Mayor Kelly might and did enthuse. The bands might thunder and the organ might peal, but the regiments of the ragged and hopeless weren't giving any smiles or sweet kisses. They had come looking for action. They were sick of projects * * * sick of relief * * * sick of charity or paternalism under any name. They had come seeking the old, self-respecting way of living and giving. The old American way of life.

And they hadn't found it. They'd seen a mechanized merry-go-round instead. And, as far as they were concerned, it was a flop.

That's the truth of what happened on Tuesday evening, July 16, in the Democratic Convention at Chicago.

CROWD DISILLUSIONED

I don't like to record that truth. I'm not a political writer. I'm just one of those wishful thinkers who saw, in Franklin Roosevelt, the hope and solution of our American system—our American problem. But there was no answer.

There came, Tuesday night, the cruelest disillusionment that has ever been handed to the voters of America. * * *

And I saw their roused, resentful answer to that disillusionment.

The galleries did not cheer.

Farley might smile, Kelly might thunder, Barkley might plead. But those silent galleries knew their own hearts' need—and hunger. They remembered what the man who did not come once had meant to them. They remembered their timid dreams * * * their reluctant hopes * * * their final, reckless trust. They remembered—

And their trust turned to ashes within them.

He had not come—the man they had trusted. He had not spoken "Yes" or "No." He had postponed and denied * * * had sent, at last, a message which any man might mold to his own desire.

They had come seeking an answer. But there was no answer. The floor might turn on a spotlight and put on a show * * * but the gallery did not cheer.

Republican National Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to privilege granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the very able address delivered by former President, the Honorable Herbert Hoover, before the Republican National Convention recently held in Philadelphia. The address is as follows:

We are here faced with the task of saving America for free men. The whole world is in confusion. Two-thirds of the world is at war. Twenty nations have become the stamping ground of militant despotism. Almost everywhere in the Old World the light of liberty for which men have struggled and died has gone into a long night. Men and nations have lost their moral and spiritual moorings. Even in America our system of liberty has been weakened. We are divided in mind and fearful. And confusion in liberal nations is made worse by the spread of incompetence in government.

The world has survived confusion before. And men have grown in soul and safety. But how? Because some organizations of men have stood solid. They stood not because they knew the solutions to all these confusions, not even because they have the power to find solution. They stood firm and they held the light of civilization—until the furies passed, because they held to certain positive principles of life, of morals, of spiritual values.

SAVED THE NATION

In a time of confusion the action of a Republican convention 80 years ago saved this Nation for free men. And free men of two generations built it into unparalleled greatness.

Upon this party again rests the responsibility for the freedom and prosperity of men for the next two generations. The Republican Party again accepts that responsibility here and now.

Our party is not concerned here with petty or factional issues or minor criticisms.

This crisis in America is no sudden blow. We have witnessed a steady sapping of our system of liberty and the mismanagement of government for the last 8 years. During all this time we have had 10,000,000 chronically unemployed, 18,000,000 of our fellow Americans have been continuously on relief. Agriculture has been held afloat by Government subsidies. Unending deficits and huge increases in debt threaten the financial stability of the Government. Our industry and business are hesitant and are afraid. In this decade, we have actually decreased in national income and national wealth for the first time in 150 years. America has gone backward. The human consequence is that one-third of our people are frozen to poverty.

RESULT OF INCOMPETENCE

This condition is not an inheritance from the inevitable world depression which followed the last World War. It is the result of incompetence in government. We were on the way to recovery in 1932. Every other democracy had recovered from that depression long before the outbreak of this war.

Now, economically weakened for the past 8 years, we are faced with mismanaged national defense.

And this new world war is no sudden blow. It comes from the destruction of systems of liberty in the Old World. Since the last World War over a billion human beings in Europe and Asia have been shaken by revolutions. The insidious poisons of men's minds from this cauldron sweep over us.

And now with this war one liberty-loving country after another has been submerged. Our indignation, our sympathies, and our fears are desperately involved in their heroic struggles for freedom.

And now France, who tended the cradle of our liberties, has fallen. But the spirit of a great race does not die. France will rise again.

Whatever the outcome of this world cataclysm, whatever the solution of our domestic crisis, the pattern of this world will not again be the same. Dictatorships, totalitarian economics, and militarism will long continue over a large part of the earth. New economic and political forces will be loosened upon the world.

To be prepared, we must at once undertake seven stern tasks.

First. We must restore and revitalize liberty in America.

Second. We must restore and rebuild morals in government.

Third. We must restore decent life and living to one-third of our farmers and workers, who have been chronically submerged by the New Deal.

Fourth. We must restore competence to government.

Fifth. We must prepare this Nation to defend the Western Hemisphere.

Sixth. We must develop and maintain foreign policies that keep us out of these wars unless we are attacked. We should facilitate all nations fighting for their freedom in procuring materials and munitions, but subject to definite limitations which keep us out of war.

Seventh. We must recall our people from the flabbiness of the New Deal. We must reestablish stamina, character, and ideals. We must regenerate hope and confidence in America.

WEAKENING STRUCTURE OF LIBERTY

Let us first examine the weakening of the structure of liberty in our Nation.

There is a far larger war in the world today than a war of tanks and airplanes. It is even more dangerous to America. That is a war of hostile ideas, philosophies, and systems of government. There are no neutrals in that war. That is where we have to fight.

From this vast seething laboratory of the Old World in revolution we can find warnings of the fate of democracy.

For more than a century and a half before the war of 1914 the whole continent of Europe up to the Russian border had been struggling upward toward liberty. These people in 20 races had attained a large degree of free government—free speech, free worship, orderly justice, and free enterprise. After that war, liberty and peace seemed assured to the world.

And then in less than 20 years hundreds of millions of these people surrendered freedom for bondage under totalitarian government. This abandonment of liberty has been the most gigantic revolution in history.

Two years ago I was the invited guest of some 12 European countries. That gave me a unique opportunity to inquire into some things that might help the American people.

LIBERTY WEAKENED

I wanted to know more of what ideas and pressures had plunged these nations into dictatorships.

There will flash into your minds that it was communism, fascism, or nazi-ism. That is not what I refer to. They were the effect. I was seeking the cause. Liberty had been weakened long before the dictators rose under those banners. There was a long poignant drama before the last act in this gigantic tragedy of civilization.

There were many disintegrating forces. But also, in every single case before the rise of totalitarian governments, there had been a period dominated by economic planners. Each of these nations had an era under starry-eyed men who believed that they could plan and force the economic life of the people. They believed that was the way to correct abuse or to meet emergencies in systems of free enterprise. They exalted the state as the solvent of all economic problems.

BUREAUCRATIC GOVERNMENT

These men thought they were liberals. But they also thought they could have economic dictatorship by bureaucracy, and at the same time preserve free speech, orderly justice, and free government. They can be called the totalitarian liberals. They were the spiritual fathers of the New Deal.

These men were not Communists or Fascists. But they mixed these ideas into free systems. It is true that Communists and Fascists were round about. They formed popular fronts and gave applause.

These so-called liberals shifted the relation of government to free enterprise from that of umpire to controller. Directly or indirectly they politically controlled credit, prices, and production of industry, farmer, and labor. They devalued, pump-primed, and inflated. They controlled private business by Government competition, by regulation, and by taxes. They met every failure with demands for more and more power of control. And they employed that handmaiden of power, named "Gimme a Billion, Quick."

These leaders ignored the fact that the driving power of free economic life is the initiative and enterprise of men.

When it was too late they discovered that every time they stretched the arm of government into private enterprise, except to correct abuse, then somehow, somewhere men's minds and judgments became confused. At once men became fearful and hesitant. Initiative slackened, industry slowed down in production.

GOVERNMENT DEBT MOUNTED

Then came chronic unemployment and frantic Government spending in effort to support the unemployed. Government debts mounted. And finally Government credit was undermined. Out of the miseries of their people there grew pressure groups—business, labor, farmers, demanding relief or special privilege. Class hate poisoned cooperation.

Does this sound unfamiliar to you?

It was all these confusions which rang down the curtain upon liberty. Frustrated and despairing, these hundreds of millions of people voluntarily voted the powers of government to the man on horseback as the only way out. They did it in the hope of preserving themselves from want and poverty. They did it in hope of preserving their national independence.

And that blight of totalitarian liberalism even spread to Great Britain in 1929. But that liberty-loving people overthrew it in 1931. The British fully recovered prosperity in 1934. The blight swept over France in 1936 under Premier Blum and the French attempted to escape collapse by voting his government out in 1938. But their productive life was so injured that they are paying in blood, in tears, and defeat.

Need I carry this analogy further?

This is a battle which Americans had better not lose.

OUR TOTALITARIAN LIBERALS

We have now had 8 years of experience with our own totalitarian liberals. Battling against all the natural forces of recovery, they succeeded in stabilizing depression.

What is more, in forcing their economic measures upon us they have given even deeper wounds to liberty. Their headlines in history would be: Vast powers to President; Vast extension of bureaucracy; Supreme Court decides against New Deal; Attack on Supreme Court; Court loaded with totalitarian liberals; Congress surrenders power of purse by blank checks to President; Will of legislators weakened by patronage and political pie; Attacks on business; Stirring class hate; Pressure groups stimulated; Men's rights disregarded by boards and investigations; Resentment at free opposition; Attempt to discredit free press.

Certainly the New Deal has not been allergic to power. And now fed fat on power they demand a third term for Mr. Roosevelt. That is not a mere violation of tradition. It is a violation of a fundamental restraint on power in this Republic.

But we Republicans would welcome Mr. Roosevelt as a candidate. For this battle must be fought out under the guns of debate.

RESTORATION OF AMERICAN LIVING

One of our Republican tasks is to restore security of living and hope to those 40,000,000 Americans—farmers and workers—who are today plunged into insecurity or destitution. Restoration of jobs to 10,000,000 unemployed is the first step to lift this mass of poverty. It is the first step to relief of farmers. It is the first step to balancing our Budget.

Unemployment is not a chronic disease of a free system. It is a disease of governmental interference with that system. These jobs can be restored alone by the restoration of the vitality of free enterprise.

Let me say at once I am not interested in free enterprise because it is a property system. I am interested in it because intellectual and spiritual liberty can be sustained only by economic liberty. They are indissolubly bound in a common fate. I am interested in free enterprise because it is the one dynamic force by which we can restore jobs to our people.

INDIVIDUAL ENTERPRISE

It was dynamic individual enterprise which raised the country from insignificance to greatness. It was not government that put these prairies under the plow. It was not government that flung these railways across a continent. It was not government that built these great factories or cities. It was not government that built these millions of churches or added this wealth of music, art, and literature.

Is this Nation to be a great national workshop or a vast eleemosynary institution? We cannot exist two-thirds workers and one-third dependents.

It is easy to prove that the people are fearful of the New Deal. The evidence of their fears and loss of confidence is when they postpone the building of homes. It shows when they fail to improve and construct factories to produce the new goods to which science and invention beckon our energies. Let me give you just one figure.

POINTS WITH PRIDE

The New Deal points with pride to its housing schemes. In the 7 years before the New Deal, and with no subsidies, a free America built 3,437,000 new family units of housing. During the whole New Deal with all its subsidies, America has built 1,737,000 new units. They no doubt have some more "on order."

There can be a free economy in America which releases the productive energies of men. Or there can be a dictated economy. These cannot be mixed. A free economy means sweat, turmoil, competition—hard at times if you choose. It means ever-new wrongs that must be righted, but it means also resistless growth and progress.

The restoration of confidence does not require exploitation or monopoly. A free people can no more tolerate private economic power without checks and balances than we can tolerate political power without balances and checks. But in effecting great reforms there is a dividing line. Upon the right of this line is cure of abuse and solution of marginal problems. On the left of it is dictation and tyranny and discouragement of production. We must now reform the reforms.

LOSSES CAN BE REPAIRED

A confident, alert, alive, and free people can quickly repair losses, repay debts, and bury mistakes.

In the meantime while we are getting our economic machine back to work we must care for those who suffer. It was a Republican administration in 1930 that first announced we cannot allow Americans to go hungry and cold from no fault of their own. We organized and prevented it. It was a Republican administration which first started relief for farmers.

But wholesale relief cannot go on forever. No government can carry this deficit indefinitely. We must restore these people to self-support before the money fails. These people want work. The Nation needs their work. They want their self-respect restored through productive jobs.

That can come only through a change of administration.

That brings me to restoration of morals in government.

Does anyone in the United States doubt that the New Deal has built up the most gigantic political machine to control the vote ever known in this country?

What of the abundantly proved misuse of relief for politics?

What of this shady substitution of political patronage for the merit system?

What of this vicious building of city machines through handing them gigantic Federal funds to expend?

What of the use of taxpayers' money for partisan propaganda?

The whole business stank to an extent that the Jeffersonian Democrats joined with Republicans in Congress in passing new laws trying to stop this political corruption.

PHONE USE INCREASED

The effect of the new law on the New Deal has probably been to increase the use of the telephone instead of the typewriter.

Today there are three or four hundred thousand New Deal political officeholders who are the officers over an army of 10,000,000 voters who receive Government benefits. A modern explanation of the New Deal method would be that elections have been taken into protective custody.

There is no time tonight to go into the whole field of intellectual and financial morals of the New Deal. They will be amplified in this campaign.

At the end of this debate we ought to have an election—not an auction.

Is all this liberalism? Liberals fought these things for centuries.

Does not the citizen lose faith in the moral standards when he sees such Government dealings?

There can be no double standard of morals in a republic. For ideals must be served with clean hands.

COMPETENCE IN GOVERNMENT

Let us for a moment explore the question of competence in government, as distinguished from philosophy and morals.

There can be monstrosities in broad policies of government beyond those that merely cost money. They can jeopardize the Republic. I may mention a few samples. You will have others.

My first comment is that competence in government is not alone laws and policies. It is the capable administration of them. That means the quality and experience of the men and women doing the job. Many good objectives have gone wrong up that alley.

For 50 years the American people have fought to dig out the spoils system. Our people built a great dyke of competence through nonpolitical selection by merit. At one time 80 percent of Federal servants were employed that way. Today one-half of its officials have never passed a merit examination. That is, however, a minor part of the subject. I cannot discuss its major aspects because I do not wish to deal in personalities.

My second example of the consequences of incompetence in government relates to continued deficits and mounting national debt in peacetime. It is a dull subject. And like any chronic disease we "sort of get used to it." Deficits, debts, inflations, and their spawn on managed currency have been the curse of the earth ever since the last war. They are inscribed on the tombstones of every fallen democracy.

We are still alive and therefore I make two mild suggestions. These deficits are partly the natural results of pressures that arise from stabilized depression.

Therefore I suggest that we release national energies that make productive jobs.

Thereby we would restore the national income from the present seventy billions to the one hundred billions it ought to be today. Thereby the revenues of the Government would increase automatically. Thereby the billions of dollars for relief would decrease automatically.

These deficits are partly due to men who, no matter what they say, show no comprehension that the money which they spend comes from the sweat of people who toil and produce. Now the ordinary peacetime expenses of the Government have increased from about four billion under Republicans to nine billion under the "abundant life."

My other suggestion is that somehow, somewhere we might pare a little off the abundance without hurting anybody but officeholders. But these men cannot stop spending. It is in their blood. And it is part of the new economics.

Our national debt is now long past the danger sign and its speed is increasing. It already weakens our national defense.

One source of the intellectual depression today is Mr. Roosevelt's gay dismissal of his fantastic national debt by the idea that Americans do not owe it, because we owe it to Americans.

MUST BE PAID

You and your grocer are both Americans. You might ask your grocer if he would not concede the same idea. The fact is this debt represents the self-denial of those who have toiled and saved. They have a large part of their savings in that debt.

Their one hundred and twenty-five million insurance policies, and their thirty million savings and bank accounts are in it. Our children will have to pay it.

And in another direction these deficits and debts are becoming the explosives which will destroy the whole of our social reforms. During these 8 years the New Deal has given hourly advertising to their advances in the social field. There have been advances.

We sorely need them. We always will need them. Republicans builded them over years. We have no quarrel with the principle of protection for labor, the farmers, the old, and the destitute. Our quarrel is with method and incompetence in administration. But the torpedo prepared for these services is that the Nation is not allowed to produce enough goods and wealth to foot the bill for them.

They cannot be long paid by the magic of borrowed money.

CURRENCY

My third sample of the higher incompetence is the purchase of three-quarters of the whole world's gold supply. We bought it by giving foreigners our commodities and our investments. We have buried nineteen billions mostly in a hole at Fort Knox.

The foreigners got our property at depression prices. We paid a high price for this metal.

You have often been reminded of the legend of King Midas. Today that legend bears more careful examination. Midas also had the starry-eyed notion that he could benefit the kingdom if he had the power to turn his commodities into gold.

The gods gave him the power. And when he finished he had a great pile of gold but no commodities. Then he assembled another commission for advice. The god Bacchus advised him to jump in a certain river. He came out with donkey's ears.

FACE LOSS OF $19,000,000,000

Even Midas did not undertake to operate on silver. He left that to the New Deal.

Unless we quickly restore the vitality of this pile of dead gold, this Nation will face a loss of the whole nineteen billions of it. We should start by putting it in circulation at home. We should start putting it in circulation abroad by swapping it for useful metals which we do not ourselves produce.

We would far better have many years' stock of manganese, nickel, tungsten, and tin than the so-called precious metals. These we may need for national defense.

PREPAREDNESS

There are other major incompetences in government which I could well discuss. There are agriculture and relief. But tonight my last example is national defense.

Mr. Roosevelt recently broadcast an alibi that preparedness had been neglected by Republican administrations.

NATIONAL PREPAREDNESS

In the 6 years of peaceful world outlook before the New Deal we had spent about six hundred eighty million a year on our preparedness. As a matter of fact, Mr. Roosevelt considered we were spending too much on it.

He supported the Democratic platform in 1932 which implied that. And in 1934 he drastically reduced our defense to five hundred fifty million, lopping off twenty millions from the Air Corps alone. And that year he reduced the number of commissioned naval graduates by one-half.

The interlude would seem to weaken the alibi.

Nazi-ism in Germany and our New Deal both rose to power in 1933. During these dangerous years our Republicans in Congress supported repeated increases in defense appropriations until they reached one thousand four hundred million a year. In these 6 years the New Deal has spent six and two-tenths billions.

What have we got for that enormous sum?

UNPREPARED FOR DEFENSE

After all that expenditure we are told we are wholly unprepared to defend ourselves.

Our military leaders say to the Congress we are not organized for modern war; we do not have more than 75,000 fully equipped men.

Despite the growing menace in the air, and the expenditure of three hundred and fifty millions of dollars on the air force in the last 6 years, General Arnold says not half a dozen of our Army planes are modern.

If we spend another six and two-tenths billions and get no more actual defense than from the last six and two-tenths billions, nobody will be afraid of us.

Yet the lives of our children, the fate of our Nation, the future of our civilization are at stake. We cannot risk failure. This is another battle which America better not lose.

FOREIGN RELATIONS

The first line of our national defense is clear, realistic, and sober foreign policies, directed to secure respect, good will, and peace.

To realize that ideal, during the whole 12 years of Republican administrations after the last Armistice we strove to keep the face of civilization turned toward good will and peace. Americans saved Europe and Russia from collapse in famine. Americans led the advance on methods of international controversy by peaceful means. We led the world to reduce naval arms and lifted billions from the backs of all who toiled. We led in constructive proposals for land disarmament. We set a moral standard in the world by refusal to recognize the murderous regime in Russia. We refused to issue a Communist licence to undermine our institutions. We had organized a world conference to stabilize currencies and by removing trade barriers to give the world a chance. That conference was scuttled by Mr. Roosevelt. That killed the last hope of world cooperation.

The immense task now is to shape our foreign policies to protect us from the conflagrations in Europe and Asia.

There is no such thing as our isolation from wars which envelop two-thirds of all the people in the world. The Monroe Doctrine alone is the negation of that. There is no such thing as economic isolation. Those shocks jam through the doors of our farmers and our workers every hour.

There is no such thing as moral isolation. These violations of treaties and agreements raise dangers to the reign of law everywhere. There is no such thing as intellectual and spiritual isolation. Emotions come through the air in every telegraphed and printed word.

NATIONAL UNITY

From all this there are shifting dangers in which the Nation should have common counsel that we may have national unity. In a few days this convention will have chosen our national leader. The President will be able to secure from him the views of our party upon those transcendent questions.

Today a thousand tragedies to mankind crash one after another. Our emotions are inflamed. We are hostile to totalitarian ideas. We resent aggression. We are indignant at brutality. Our national sympathies are with democracies fighting for their freedom.

But here and now America must summon reason to control emotion. The greatest quality of men in danger, second only to courage, is cool, deliberate action. That is equally the necessity in a nation. An idealism as never before must keep its feet on the grounds of realism.

TIME FOR PREPARATION

The first policy of calm realism is not to exaggerate our immediate dangers. Every whale that spouts is not a submarine. The 3,000 miles of ocean is still a protection. The air forces, tanks, and armies of Europe are useless to attack us unless they establish bases in the Western Hemisphere. To do that they must first press our Navy. It can stop anything in sight now.

The second policy in realism is competent preparedness. We must be armed so that no foreign nation will entertain the dangerous thought of starting over these 3,000 miles of ocean. We must be so prepared that we can rely solely upon our own right arm.

We need a Navy powerful as never before. Rather than a vast accumulation of arms, we must have an industry tuned up to turn out war machines faster and better than any nation on earth. We need a trained personnel of keymen in reserve. We have the resources, the genius, the industry to make us impregnable.

But preparedness is not only making armies and navies. It must be supported by a sound national finance, national economy, and a restored productivity of our people.

And before we can have preparedness we must have competent organization in Washington.

New Deal politics will never "make tyranny tremble." I suppose we might frighten tyrants by appointing another board to advise the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense.

The third of realistic policies bears upon supplies of materials and munitions to those nations who are fighting for their freedom. My belief is that we should facilitate them in every way subject to two limitations. First, that it involves no action which takes us to war, and, second, that as liberty lives by law we must act within the law.

PEACE OR WAR

Today many of our citizens, consciously or unconsciously, are considering peace or war with the totalitarian governments.

The most vital realism in all our relations requires that we keep out of these wars unless the Western Hemisphere is attacked.

It is a solemn determination. Our price of war is the lives of our sons and the poverty of our grandchildren. But we are here also considering the fate of our Nation and the fate of liberty in the world.

It is nonsense that we cannot defend freedom here even if the Old World fails. Our ancestors, with sparse population and resources for the first 50 years of this Republic, sustained liberty here when most of the world was ruled by despots. We can do it again if we have to.

And the spirits of American boys buried in Flanders 22 years ago rise before us today to warn us that we can make war but we cannot assure liberty in the Old World.

The hope of mankind and the hope of civilization is that democracy survive on this continent. Those who advocate war should never forget one thing. The first necessity of any great war is to set up dictatorship. France and England were compelled to do so. But with our already weakened structure of liberty and the fabulous national debt we shall have, and the mania for power of the New Deal, we would be generations in restoring free men in America. We should be sacrificing the last sanctuary of liberty in the world in the belief that we are defending liberty.

MORE HARM THAN GOOD

Those who feel we should intervene in this war should take note of other realistic reasons why we should keep out. If we join, we shall in our own unpreparedness require 2 or 3 years to make ourselves effective. That will be too late. In the meantime we should require the whole energies of American industry to arm ourselves. For us to declare war would do the Allies more harm than good.

The final realism is that if we are to keep cool and not stimulate war there must be an end to provocative speech by our officials.

Expressions of indignation or regret do not require insults. The first responsibility of the President of the United States is to abate war, not to stimulate it. It is not the province of the President of the United States to create hate. Irresponsible talk in explosive times may bring danger. And we need remember that the day will come when we might be of service to humanity in dealing with these same men for peace.

And there is an infinite service that America can bring to the world. After this struggle we shall see hate sitting at the peace table. We might with our moral force and counsel abate its dread consequences. I know the famine, disease, and suffering that is yet to come with this war. With our economic strength and our compassion we can save millions of lives, give aid to reconstruction and inspire tolerance and hope again to the world.

In foreign trade after this war we shall meet an impoverished Europe reduced in its standards of living and above all armed with totalitarian directed exports and imports. All that points in three directions. American workers and farmers will require more protection than ever from imports. We shall need mobilized counteraction on exports. We shall need to develop self-sufficiency in our own industrial production. Under these impacts the Hull treaties will go to the heaven of forgotten issues.

REGENERATION OF AMERICA

Finally, the greatest task of all deals with the intangibles of national life. It is to stiffen the stamina and the morals of our people. It is to unify their ideals and lift their spirits.

I have said whatever the outcome of this war, whatever the solution of our domestic crisis, the form of this world will not be the same. We must meet great change.

In time these world storms will blow themselves out. Perhaps it will be a long time. But the spirit of Luther, Goethe, Schiller, of Mazzini and Garibaldi still live. And here upon our soil the temple of liberty must stand.

But truly we have been following the suicide road for liberty that led to disaster in Europe. But let me give you a word of encouragement. Those countries were economically lean from the last war. We still have economic fat on our national bones.

QUALITY OF OUR PEOPLE

Our ability to meet these storms and these changes will abide in the qualities of our people.

There is in every nation some quality distilled from its racial life. Those are the mores of the race. Ours is a belief in God, a belief in the dignity of the common man. Ours is a spirit of independence, a vigorous assertion of self-reliance, of devotion to duty. Ours is a high sense of cooperation in time of stress.

We have always fought tyranny in any form. We have not in the past been deterred by difficulty or defeated by disaster. We have sought new frontiers, new obstacles to surmount. We have been resilient, courageous, fearless, and unconquerable. The New Deal has contributed to sapping of our stamina and making us soft.

In quest of security we have retreated from liberty. In quest of reform we have abandoned justice and stirred class hate. In quest of relief we have injured self-reliance. In quest of an easy way out we have lessened the vision of America.

REGENERATION HARD

The road to regeneration is burdensome and hard. It is straight and simple. It is a road paved with work and with sacrifice and consecration to the indefinable spirit that is America.

Centuries ago, alone under the stars, contrasting his own insignificance with the immensity of God's universe, there sprang to the lips of the Psalmist the question "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? And the son of man, that thou visiteth him?"

Was man created a little lower than the angels, a being for whom the abundance of life consists of justice, liberty, and opportunity?

Does he possess the right from the Creator to plan his own life, to dare his own adventure, to earn his own reward, so long as he does no harm to his fellows? Or must he submerge his life, his liberties, and his independent personality in an omnipotent government?

If man is merely one of the herd, running with the pack, Stalin is right, Hitler is right, and, God help us for our follies and our greeds, the New Deal is right.

AMERICANS DARE NOT LOSE

But if man is an inviolable human soul, possessed of dignity, endowed with inalienable rights, America is right. And this is a war that Americans dare not lose.

Republicans! You go into battle for the greatest cause entrusted to the government of mankind.

With steadfastness to these ideals, you can put this house in order. You can defend this Nation. You can demonstrate that self-governing, free people can solve the problems imposed by the industrial revolution. You can restore employment and agriculture and end their sufferings.

You can wipe out coercion and corruption. You can make this a classless country, devoted to equal opportunity for all. You can build up humane measures of security, of increasing standards of living for all of the people. You can remove their fears. You can inspire their devotion to American ideals. You can, and you will, hold alight to a confused world the lamp of liberty.

Are you prepared to fight?

War Propaganda, 1917 and 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, under permission granted, I present for publication in the RECORD another article referrrd to by me at that time as being part of a series entitled "Twenty-five Years Ago."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR TRADE AND NEUTRALITY

In discussing the forces that bring nations into war, one must not forget the powerful effect of war business.

It has a great appeal to public sentiment, particularly in a country that is suffering from unemployment. If citizens can be entangled in the economic battle of the war they can more easily be drawn into the military part.

The country buying the goods never fails to let it be known they are buying from us. It is part of their propaganda. It is the propaganda of economics.

Stephen and Joan Raushenbush, in their interesting and informative book, War Madness, say:

"The way to get into war is to get a war and a panic tied up together so we have to take one or the other. If we take the war, which is the likely course, we'll get the panic, too. But nobody thinks of that, because it will only come later."

Another interesting comment from their book:

"We had become a virtual arsenal of supplies for the Allied countries. It was hard to be neutral, then."

Today England speaks of the United States as being her arsenal.

Continuing the quotation from War Madness:

"In each of these decisions, the necessity to do nothing that would hurt our war trade and threaten panic was fundamental.

"Because almost all our trade was with the Allies, all the things we did, or failed to do, in order to keep the war boom going and avoid the panic which everybody seemed to expect if the war orders suddenly stopped, happened to work out in favor of our customers—the Allies. At the same time they all worked against Germany. Ours was a neutrality moulded and shaped by a great war trade of which we had become the victims.

"Once a war boom gets started, it is impossible to stop it. No administration would dare to throw the country into a depression by trying suddenly to stop a war boom. If we want to stay out of wars into which we are taken via a war boom, we must prevent that war boom from getting started. The American people can take their choice between peace or profits. They will not be able to have both. When the war starts in Europe, unless we protect ourselves adequately beforehand, we shall learn again that we cannot have a large war trade with whichever side has control of the air and the seas, and remain neutral."

ARE THEY INTERESTED IN PROFITS?

Certain bankers and industrialists who have large holdings in business very much affected by war trade, are calling for the continuation of the war. Could it be that every day the war continues brings to them and their corporations extra dividends?

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I named individuals who financed large newspaper advertisements calling for our more active intervention in the war. In the list you will find officials and directors of corporations that manufacture or sell iron and steel products, chemicals, mechanical equipment, oil, metals, celluloid, electrical equipment, aircraft, munitions, steel castings, barbed wire, shell casings, and many more products that are vital to the conduct of war.

They have interlocking business connections with others in this country and exert quite an influence to get America involved in the conflict.

It will be after the war when we find out the real story of the profit angle involved in the activities of many who now proclaim their interest in the war to be for lofty motives and high ideals. There are many who do believe this war is for these motives and ideals but there are others who claim so to cover up their profit motives.

Don't underestimate the propaganda of economics. It is a powerful force.

PRESIDENT EXPRESSES DANGER OF WAR TRADE

President Franklin Roosevelt expressed the danger of war trade in his Chautauqua speech when he said:

"It is clear that our present policy and the measures passed by the Congress would, in the event of a war on some other continent, reduce war profits which would otherwise accrue to American citizens. Industrial and agricultural production for a war market may give immense fortunes to a few men; for the Nation as a whole it produces disaster. It was the prospect of war profits that made our farmers in the West plow up prairie land that should never have been plowed, but should have been left for grazing cattle. Today we are reaping the harvest of those war profits in the dust storms which have devastated those war-plowed areas.

"It was the prospect of war profits that caused the extension of monopoly and unjustified expansion of industry and a price level so high that the normal relationship between debtor and creditor was destroyed.

"Nevertheless, if war should break out again in another continent, let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fool's gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality.

"They would tell you—and, unfortunately, their views would get wide publicity—that if they could produce and ship this and that and the other article to belligerent nations the unemployed of America would all find work. They would tell you that if they could extend credit to warring nations that credit would be used in the United States to build homes and factories and pay our debts. They would tell you that America once more would capture the trade of the world.

"It would be hard to resist that clamor; it would be hard for many Americans, I fear, to look beyond—to realize the inevitable penalties, the inevitable day of reckoning, that come from a false prosperity. To resist the clamor of that greed, if war should come, would require the unswerving support of all Americans who love peace."

This is a quite different position than the one he took when asking for the repeal of the embargo and amending of the Neutrality Act, and in later statements.

The headline of the New York Times on November 3: "House dooms arms embargo, 243–181; $1,000,000,000 in war orders expected; Allies to buy 7,800 planes here; Rush of orders is foreseen within a few weeks—Trucks, clothing, foodstuffs are among many needed products."

Other headlines of the Times: "Says repeal opens arsenal to Allies; War orders flood aviation industry; Purchases of war materials to reach $1,000,000,000 in 6 months; Allies may double plane orders here."

Hundreds of such headlines are seen in the papers. The belligerents want to be sure that the feeling that business will get out to the smaller communities. They want to get them interested in the economic factors of the war. For instance, the headline in the Times says: "Small plants due to get war orders; British not to confine buying to large producers, head of commission says."

Newsweek, in relating the story of Allied buying, says:

"Actually, a new export boom (reflecting earlier buying, of course) was already under way. During the 48 hours ended last Monday, 250 bombers left New York harbor in Allied and Greek freighters, and the Association of American Railroads revealed that cars unloaded at the harbor soared to a new high early in June."

A recent story on the steel industry says that "the bare possibility of early peace in Europe, a factor not lost sight of by the steel industry, as 10 percent or more of current output is for the British," affects the future outlook.

We are advised that war exports boom our export trade and that "Exports in June * * * were more than 40 percent greater than the average for the corresponding month in the 3 preceding years."

Later in the article, I shall cite the involvement of war trade in 1914–17.

JEROME FRANK STATES THE CASE

This war business does affect our neutrality.

Jerome Frank, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, correctly states the case in his book, "Save America First":

"Every student of our conduct prior to our entry into the last war agrees that nonparticipation was made all but impossible because of our precious huge shipments to the belligerents. Lloyd George and Tardieu were both sure that our war trade would make it impossible for us to preserve our neutrality, and that it was only a question of time before we would join England and France. And there is only an artificial distinction between huge sales to belligerents after they declare war and when they are approaching war. The same forces are now at work that were operative in 1914–17."

I have heard Senators arise and with indignation say that the profit motive had nothing to do with our leaving the position of neutrality in the last World War.

But, let us look at the story of 1914–17 as recorded by historians.

WAR TRADE DESTROYS NEUTRALITY

Ray Stannard Baker, in his Life of Woodrow Wilson, said:

"Thus by the end of the year 1914 the traffic in war materials with the Allies had become deeply entrenched in America's economic organization, and the possibility of keeping out of war by the diplomacy of neutrality, no matter how skillfully conducted, had reached the vanishing point. By October, perhaps earlier, our case was lost."

Writing about May 1916, Ray Stannard Baker used this language:

"Trade between the United States and the Allies had become the great artery which, flowing westward, fed American war prosperity and, flowing eastward, sustained the life of the Allied armies and populations. Diplomats and statesmen alike dreaded any policy that threatened to contract that life-giving stream. Even the boldest pronouncements and demands of the President fell short of being vital. Nevertheless, there was always the danger, which the diplomats of the belligerent nations had to watch narrowly, that some outrage would prove a breaking point, or that this strange President, with his ideals and his moral convictions, might—there was horror in the thought—bring his vast Nation into the war on the wrong side."

WARTIME TRADE ENTANGLES US

And, again, we find these words from Baker:

"And yet, however the President may have striven to subordinate or moralize the economic factors of the conflict, they were there, as always, enormously potent influences behind the scenes. At the beginning of the European war he had tried to curb their influence by a 'moral' loan policy, but had found it, by September 1915, impossible to maintain. The effect of our rapidly expanding wartime trade—trade that was then perfectly legal—was to entangle us vitally with the welfare of the Allies. The President saw clearly and feared this tendency; he considered that there was 'a moral obligation laid upon us to keep free the courses of our commerce and of our finance' from entanglements with either group of belligerents that we might use our increasing economic power for the benefit of the world."

Another statement by Ray Stannard Baker:

"Whether these vast economic forces were to be used selfishly or altruistically, there they were—realities, facts—and the President himself saw that 'we have interests which we see being drawn slowly into the maelstrom of this tremendous upheaval.' The war, indeed, had reached the point where everything that happened in Europe immediately affected America."

CREDIT FOLLOWS SALES

And, in the words of Baker, "if shipments (of war trade) were cut off, what would happen to American business?" The statement follows:

"It was inevitable that with the shipment of such enormous quantities of war materials to the Allies, the problem of paying for them would again arise. For a considerable time the British could finance their purchases through their large credit balance, but if the war continued even a quarter billion dollars would not last long. And when all was said, if the shipment of war materials was unobjectionable, why not loans of money? And if credits were not given, how could the munitions traffic continue? And if shipments were cut off, what would happen to American business?"

Secretary Lansing, whose memoirs show that he was not neutral from the first of the World War, said about war trade affecting neutrality:

"Can we afford to let a declaration as to our conception of the true spirit of neutrality, made in the first days of the war, stand in the way of our national interests, which seem to be seriously threatened?"

Yet, if we look at the profits made by the sale of war material and then compare that with the cost of the war, we will see that war profits are an illusion.

M'ADOO COMMENTS

Secretary McAdoo said in 1915:

"The high prices for food products have brought great prosperity to our farmers, while the purchases of war munitions have stimulated industry and have set factories going to full capacity throughout the great manufacturing districts, while the reduction of imports and their actual cessation in some cases have caused new industries to spring up, and others to be enlarged. Great prosperity is coming. It will be tremendously increased if we can extend reasonable credits to our customers. * * * Our prosperity is dependent on our continued and enlarged foreign trade."

It is quite interesting that the Secretary of the Treasury 25 years later takes a similar position. Secretary Morgenthau is one of the first to break the news to the people of the value of foreign orders.

Sir Gilbert Parker, who directed the propaganda for Great Britain in the United States preceding the 1914–18 World War, knew the value of the propaganda of economics. He advised his country of the United States' interest in the sale of these war materials. One of his correspondents wrote:

"Within earshot of my own house 16,000 workmen are busy day and night * * * making munitions for England. Other factories of munitions and other war supplies are being enlarged or built new in this one city of New Haven."

Professor Peterson commented on this, as follows:

"Could it be other than that these thousands of workmen and people dependent upon them should be friendly to the British and anxious to have them win—even if it finally took American assistance?"

Jobs. It may mean jobs in the factories for a month or so, but it may be followed with jobs in the trenches for a lengthy period. It may mean gold, but it is fool's gold. When the books are finally balanced, it will not be worth the cost.

The safest course is to have a strong domestic economy rather than trying to bring prosperity from the tragedy of war.

And again I refer to the words of Chairman Frank, of the Securities Commission: "Every student of our conduct prior to our entry into the last war agrees that nonparticipation was made all but impossible because of our precious huge shipments to the belligerents. * * * The same forces are now at work that were operative in 1914–17."

My Own Record As Compared With My Predecessor's—A Reply to Politicians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN K. GRIFFITH

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, prominent candidates in the recent campaign, which was held in Louisiana, accused the Louisiana delegation of neglecting their congressional duties while campaigning in Louisiana, and of "selling the sugar interests down the river."

What does the record show?

Follow me and I will prove these statements to be untrue by the record. I will give an account of my own stewardship for the 4 years that I have been in Congress and will confine myself strictly to the record. I will include in this record the very brief time that I spent in Louisiana during the recent campaign. For comparison, I will also give the official record of my immediate predecessor, who was here in Congress in 1935 and 1936, and who missed answering the roll call 66 times out of a total of 204, or nearly one-third of the time during the year 1935. In 1936 he did lots worse than he did in 1935; he only answered the roll call 13 times during the entire year and failed to answer it 123 times. He was present only one-thirteenth of the time. This entire year of 1936 he only voted 5 times when there was a total of 81 roll calls for votes.

In the 4 years that I have been here I have answered 603 roll calls and have missed answering 24 roll calls and most of the 24 that I missed were while I was on official business, as the attached record will prove. My 4-year record shows that I was present and answered roll call 96.2 percent of the time and was absent 3.8 percent of the time. My predecessor was present in his first year 67.64 percent of the time and in his second year only 9.6 percent of the time, being absent 90.4 percent of the time.

During the recent campaign, the Louisiana politicians used as a caption in reference to the absence of members of the congressional delegation from Washington: "When the roll was called up yonder where were they?"

Ask the politicians where my predecessor was when they voted on the discharge of the Ways and Means Committee on the Patman adjusted-compensation bill—soldiers' bonus. Why did my predecessor fail to answer the roll and vote?

Ask my predecessor where he was and why he failed to vote on February 21, 1936, on S. 3780, the bill which provided temporary Federal aid to farmers and a permanent policy of Federal aid to States for such purposes. Where was he on February 22, 1936, when H. R. 11418, the agricultural appropriation bill, was up for consideration and he did not vote?

Where was he on March 18, 1936, when he failed to vote on the conference report covering appropriations for more farm benefits?

Where was he on April 29, 1936 when they voted on the revenue bill of 1936, which bill was to supply funds with which to run the Federal Government?

Where was he when they voted to discharge the Rules Committee on H. R. 2066—a bill to liquidate and refinance farm indebtedness at a reduced rate of interest, which legislation was so important to the farmers? He did not vote. He failed to vote on this same bill on May 13, 1936, when it was up for final passage.

Why did he fail to vote on H. R. 11687, which authorized funds to be expended on highways and roads in the States?

Where was he and why did he not vote in 1936 on the conference report on H. R. 8455, which authorized public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, which legislation was so important to Louisiana?

Where was he when they voted on H. R. 11663, on June 17, 1936, which was the antilobbying bill to regulate those engaged in trying to influence legislation?

Suppose you go back to July 30, 1935, roll call No. 147, and ask my predecessor where he was when they voted on H. R. 7349, which was an act for the control of floods on the Mississippi River, and was probably the most important flood control legislation ever to come before Congress, and certainly of vital interest to all parts of Louisiana that are subject to overflows from the Mississippi and Atchafalaya Rivers. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 30, 1935, shows that my predecessor failed to vote on this bill, which was probably the most important legislation enacted while he was in Congress. He was absent when they voted on the rivers and harbors bill for flood control in 1936, also.

Remember that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that my predecessor answered only 13 roll calls out of a total of 136 roll calls during the entire second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, which was from January 3 to June 20, 1936, inclusive. Do you think it would be safe to have a man in Congress during these precarious times, who was present for only 13 roll calls and 5 vote calls during the entire year of 1936?

I now ask these same politicians, who criticized me and my record, where my predecessor was when the roll was called up yonder? You might apply to him the words of that popular song of a few months ago, the title of which was, "The Little Man Who Wasn't There."

Read this entire record which is attached and find out for yourself how false was the statement about "selling the sugar industry down the river"; read what the sugar people had to say and note the size of some of the benefit payments which they received.

MY OWN RECORD

Seventy-fifth Congress, first session

I was sworn in on January 5, 1937. The session ended August 21, 1937. During this session there was a total of 152 roll calls. I was present for 146 roll calls and absent only 6. I missed 5 of these roll calls while in Louisiana for 8 days. At that time, I had official permission from the House of Representatives to go to Louisiana for 10 days to attend to business that concerned my congressional district. During that visit, I accompanied the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to Donaldsonville, La., to lay the cornerstone of the post-office building there.

Seventy-fifth Congress, second session (called)

This session convened on November 15, 1937, and adjourned December 21, 1937. During this special session there was a total of 22 roll calls. I was present for 21 roll calls and was only absent once. I was present and did not vote 1 roll call (paired).

Seventy-fifth Congress, third session

This session convened on January 3, 1938, and adjourned June 14, 1938. During this session there was a total of 123 roll calls. I was present for 119 roll calls. I was absent and missed 4 roll calls, but was in Washington attending important committee meetings.

Seventy-sixth Congress, first session

This Congress convened on January 3, 1939, and adjourned on August 5, 1939. During this session there was a total of 157 roll calls. I was present for 152 roll calls. I was absent only 5 roll calls. The 5 roll calls, from which I was marked absent, all came in the same week, during which time I was absent in compliance with a resolution of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, and with instructions from the chairman of the committee and the Navy Department. I was honored by being named as a member of a subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee, to go to Florida, Georgia, and South Carolina to inspect proposed sites for a naval air base, over which a controversy had arisen between the Hepburn Board on the one side and the head of naval aeronautics and a subcommittee on the other side, and to make a report of our findings. In reality, I was on duty in an official capacity at the time that I failed to answer the only 5 roll calls that I missed during the entire session.

The Naval Affairs, Military Affairs, and Appropriations Committees have been the busiest of all committees for 2 years; for weeks our committee—Naval Affairs—has been holding hearings from early morning until late evening, nearly every day, preparing legislation for the enlargement of our Navy and air force, and to facilitate this additional construction program. I have not missed a single meeting.

Seventy-sixth Congress, second session (special)

This session convened on September 21, 1939, and adjourned on November 3, 1939. During this session there was a total of seven roll calls. I did not miss any roll calls.

Seventy-sixth Congress, third session

This session convened on January 3, 1940. In January there was a total of 14 roll calls. I was present in January for 9 roll calls. I was absent in January from only 5 roll calls. I was present and did not vote—was paired—on January 29, 1940. In February 1940 there was a total of 18 roll calls. I was present for 17 of these 18 roll calls. I was absent from 1 roll call on February 8 but was in Washington on that date and was making a departmental call. I have a record to verify this statement. January and February 1940 were the 2 months that I was accused by the office seekers of spending all of my time in Louisiana, campaigning and "selling the sugar farmers down the river." But the record will prove that from January 3 to January 16, which were the dates that I was in Louisiana for the first primary, I was absent from only 5 roll calls. I did not miss any roll calls in February before the second primary, due to my presence in Louisiana.

There have been 165 roll calls so far this session and I have missed answering the roll call only eight times. In other words, I have been present for 95.2 percent of roll calls so far this session. I have been absent from roll calls only 4.8 percent of the time.

Now, let us look at the record of my immediate predecessor for the Seventy-fourth Congress, which includes the years 1935 and 1936.

Seventy-fourth Congress, first session

This session convened on January 3, 1935, and adjourned August 26, 1935. During the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, there was a total of 204 roll calls. My predecessor answered the roll call only 138 times. He failed to answer roll calls 66 times. In other words, he was absent from roll call nearly one-third of the time during the year 1935.

Please read carefully what is to follow.

Scan the record closely for the year 1936, which was my predecessor's last year in Congress.

Seventy-fourth Congress, Second Session (January 3 to June 20, 1936)

There were 136 roll calls during the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

My predecessor was absent from 123 roll calls.

He answered to his name only 13 times.

He was absent 90.37 percent of the time.

During this session, there were 81 calls for vote.

My predecessor failed to vote 76 times.

My predecessor voted only 5 times.

My predecessor was present and voted 6.18 percent of the time.

My predecessor was absent and failed to vote 93.82 percent of the time during the year 1936.

In both sessions of the Seventy-fourth Congress, including the years 1935 and 1936, there were 339 roll calls. My predecessor answered only 151 of these roll calls and failed to answer 188 roll calls.

He was absent much more than one-half of the time for the entire session of 2 years.

During my entire 4 years in Congress I missed a total of only 24 roll calls out of a possible total of 627. My predecessor, in only 2 years—1935–36—missed 188 roll calls out of a possible total of 339 roll calls.

I was present 96 percent of the time.

My predecessor was present only 41.6 percent of the time.

The above records are taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I will be glad to furnish the page, number of roll call, and date of each vote and quorum call for verification. I have a complete table and index, which will permit me to furnish this information within a few minutes.

In reply to the charge made by the politicians that the "Louisiana congressional delegation sold the Louisiana sugar interests down the river," I will again quote the RECORD and confine myself strictly to verifiable facts.

Prior to my election to Congress, and during the term which was served by my immediate predecessor, the Louisiana and Florida quota was 260,000 tons of sugar, raw value. Early in my first term of service in the Seventy-fifth Congress, in 1937, through diligent work and the complete cooperation of the Louisiana delegation—for the first time in history—we were able to have Louisiana's and Florida's quota raised from 260,000 tons, raw value—which they were receiving when my predecessor was in Congress—to 420,000 tons, raw value. We received the commendations of the sugar interests for our cooperation and united effort. I will quote below excerpts from letters and telegrams to substantiate the above statements. I have in my possession the originals and will be glad to show them:

[American Sugar Cane League, the Louisiana Sugar Planters' Association, the American Cane Growers' Association, Producers and Manufacturers' Protective Association]

NEW ORLEANS, LA., November 7, 1938.

Hon. JOHN K. GRIFFITH,
Slidell, La.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the executive committee of the American Sugar Cane League held November 5, 1938, I was instructed to write you and express the appreciation of the league for the very fine spirit of helpfulness and cooperation that you have shown toward the Louisiana sugar industry in the fight it is engaged in to bring about conditions, legislative and economic, that will enable it to live and prosper.

REGINALD DYKERS,
Vice President and General Manager.

LOCAL UNIONS AFFILIATED WITH THE A. F. OF L.
SUGAR WORKERS CONFERENCE,
September 24, 1937.

Hon. JOHN K. GRIFFITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Our organization is deeply grateful for your fine support for the sugar bill during this recent session of Congress.

By the successful enactment of this legislation thousands of American workingmen and their families are guaranteed economic security because they can continue on their jobs. Your willingness to assist American workers in the sugar industry will not be forgotten.

Very truly yours,

HAROLD J. BURKE,
Secretary-Treasurer, United Weighers.

THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.,
New Orleans, La., September 16, 1937.

Hon. JOHN K. GRIFFITH,
Member of Congress, Slidell, La.

DEAR MR. GRIFFITH: I desire to thank you very sincerely for your splendid support of the sugar-refining industry in the continental United States by your vote for the passage of the sugar bill in the recent session of Congress.

As you well know, many people in our State are working in the sugar refineries and are dependent upon them for their livelihood.

I can speak for the men and women employees of our Chalmette refinery and tell you that they are deeply appreciative of the determined fight you made for them as American workmen in protecting their jobs from a kind of competition which, considering wages and other factors, would be distinctly unfair.

With my very kind personal regards, and again my thanks, I remain,

Yours very truly,

WARREN J. CRANE,
Superintendent.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE AMERICAN SUGAR CANE LEAGUE, PASSED SEPTEMBER 3, 1937

Whereas the Louisiana sugar industry, as a whole, in all its branches, as represented by the 8,757 members of the American

Sugar Cane League, is deeply grateful to the members of the congressional delegation of Louisiana for their indefatigable and successful efforts to bring about the enactment of the Jones-Brown sugar bill in a form acceptable to our industry; therefore be it

Resolved by the executive committee of the American Sugar Cane League, That the appreciation of the Louisiana sugar industry be formally expressed and put on record, and this we now do; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be sent to each of the Members of Congress from Louisiana.

REGINALD DYKERS,
Vice President and General Manager.

THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.,
New York, September 2, 1937.

Hon. JOHN K. GRIFFITH,
Member of Congress, Slidell, La.

DEAR MR. GRIFFITH: You may be sure that our employees as well as our company itself are most appreciative of your active cooperation in seeing to it that this legislation, as passed, protected the volume of business of continental refineries, and the jobs of their workmen, against subsidized tropical competition.

With personal regards and best wishes, I remain

Sincerely yours,

H. BEACH CARPENTER,
General Counsel.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 28, 1937.

Hon. JOHN K. GRIFFITH,
Washington, D. C.:

At the regular monthly meeting of the Executive Committee of the American Sugar Cane League held today I was instructed to wire you in behalf of the Louisiana Sugar Industry and say that those engaged in it thank you from the bottom of their hearts for the sponsorship of the cause of Louisiana sugar in which the Senators and Congressmen from this State have so splendidly united. We feel full confidence that the able work being done will result in a proper legislative recognition of the right to a quota of 500,000 tons for Louisiana.

REGINALD DYKERS,
Vice President and General Manager.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 8, 1937.

Representative JOHN K. GRIFFITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please accept our sincere thanks for your very courteous letter of April 2, which we assure you is fully appreciated.

This bill will accomplish the purpose desired by so many of us. Your support of that bill, as well as an increased quota for Louisiana, will cover the situation beautifully.

Please be assured that your efforts in this direction are very much appreciated.

Yours truly,

BACKER & GREEN,
ALBERT F. BACKER.

[Excerpt from an editorial appearing in the Sugar Journal of November 1939]

In the past it has been difficult to get the entire Louisiana delegation, which at all times should be wholeheartedly for sugar, to come to its support. As a matter of fact, it has only been recently that all Members of the congressional delegation from Louisiana have voted together on sugar. They realized that a greater sugar industry in Louisiana means a greater prosperity for the State as a whole and that each section of the State would prosper in some degree because of a greater sugar industry. Our present delegation, then, has worked as a unit and voted as one for the benefit of an industry which means so much to the State.

The Louisiana sugar industry is fortunate at this time in having a congressional delegation that has stood with a united front in its effort for the industry. The Senators and Congressmen from this State realize the importance of the sugar industry to the State, and they have worked harmoniously and unitedly for its interest.

It is to be hoped that the congressional delegation from every sugar State in the Union will be as unified and that they will stand shoulder to shoulder with the united Louisiana delegation in the fight for a proper expansion of the American sugar industry.

Mr. Speaker, would the above communications indicate that I had "sold the sugar interests down the river"?

In addition to the above, I wish to add that Senator BYRD, of Virginia, had placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 20, 1940, page 3155, the names of those who received as much as $10,000 or more from the Federal Government in benefit sugar payments, according to the 1937 sugar program. I find that there are 31 concerns in the State of Louisiana who received $10,000 or more in benefit sugar payments. One Louisiana concern received $195,698.76 and one company in my own district received $74,714. The above number naturally does not include the many hundreds of small sugar farmers who receive annually a lesser amount.

Does this look as if I have sold sugar down the river?

Northern Lakes States Regional Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, domestic problems are with us, and, as I have pointed out on other occasions, World War conditions should not be permitted to overshadow our economic conditions.

In 1934 the President appointed the National Resources Board, which had for its purpose a survey of the United States to find out what was wrong in the country and to report. The Board was succeeded by the National Resources Committee which is still active. In 1938 the National Resources Committee appointed the Northern Lakes States Regional Committee to investigate conditions in the Great Lakes States area. The report of the committee was made a year ago and admits serious unemployment problems due to the passing away of the lumber industry. As the President says in his release a year ago, there are more people than jobs in this area and lack of work is the one thing that needs a solution. A program to give people employment must be adopted by the Government. The administration should take cognizance of its own report and the department that is responsible for carrying out the program should submit the necessary recommendations to Congress.

This morning I had a conference with a representative of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics regarding the report of the Northern Lakes States Regional Committee concerning the rehabilitation of cut-over areas in northern Minnesota, northern Michigan, and northern Wisconsin. This report recommended to the President, and he in turn transmitted the same to Congress, certain definite objectives in efforts to assist these areas.

Recommendations from the committee indicate that legislation will be asked increasing the program of the United States National Forest Service. Additional funds will be requested, and a new policy of employing people who reside in the vicinity of the national forests will be carried out.

Recommendations of the Resources Committee would increase appropriations so that loans could be made to farmers living on small tracts of land, for the purpose of clearing land and increasing the size of their farms. Further, appropriations would be made available to help refinance farms already owned, and also to shift farmers from one particular location unsuited for agriculture to another location where they could farm with profit.

This program is an important one to northern Minnesota, as well as to the other States. There should, of course, be cooperation on the part of the State with the Federal Government. For example, those shaping the policy of State forests should cooperate with the United States Forest Service in an effort to provide employment for the localities. I have just been advised by William L. Strunk, Commissioner of Conservation, that the State of Minnesota does propose to enter actively into the work of the Northern Lakes States Regional Committee. The Department of Conservation of Minnesota recognizes that there is a real problem in the matter of land use and unemployment, which has resulted from large cut-over areas. Various agencies which have to do with this problem, from the standpoint of the Federal Government, are located in the Department of Agriculture, and it is to be hoped that within the near future legislation will be recommended which will make possible an effort to carry out the recommendations of the Regional Committee.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL J. KILDAY
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

LETTER FROM PEACOCK MILITARY ACADEMY

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Peacock Military Academy, of San Antonio, Tex., to Maj. Gen. Claude J. Birkhead, commanding general, Thirty-sixth Division, Texas National Guard:

HEADQUARTERS, PEACOCK MILITARY ACADEMY,
SAN ANTONIO, TEX., June 25, 1940.

Subject: Existing regulations re junior R. O. T. C. units, and comments on same.

To: Maj. Gen. Claude V. Birkhead.

1. The Peacock Military Academy is in hearty accord with your proposal to the Texas delegation to Congress, dated June 21, 1940, especially in regard to paragraph 4, in which you state: "Make junior and senior R. O. T. C. effective in every junior and senior high school (both public and private), and in every college and university in the land." In connection therewith, I respectfully submit the following information, comments, and recommendations in the interest of national defense.

(1) Army Regulations 145–10 now provide for two types of junior R. O. T. C. units: "Class MS for essentially military schools" like T. M. I. and Peacock, and "Class CS for public schools," like the San Antonio public school system. These same regulations also prescribe that a Regular Army officer must be detailed to each junior R. O. T. C. unit as P. M. S. & T., and that each unit must maintain a minimum of 100 boys not less than 14 years of age. Also, both types of unit receive free uniforms for their students from the Government.

(2) Under the above provisions T. M. I. is furnished a Regular Army major as P. M. S. & T. exclusively for their one small unit, while the five San Antonio public high schools are all incorporated in one CS unit with only one Regular Army major as P. M. S. & T. for all five schools. In the latter case each of the five public high schools must furnish at its own expense a National Guard or Reserve officer as commandant to administer its military training under the supervision of the one Army major.

(3) At this point I call your attention to the fact that private military schools (class MS) could easily furnish their own commandant—a National Guard or Reserve officer—just as the public schools do, in which case the one Regular Army major already supervising the five public schools could also supervise the training in the private military schools in this city. This same condition would apply to other cities as well. Students attending private military schools can afford to buy their own uniforms. The Government should furnish uniforms only to public-school units.

(4) However, in time of war it would be necessary for the Government to detail a Regular Army officer to each school, for in this case all National Guard and Reserve officers would be called to active duty. Perhaps the National Guard or Reserve officer already employed by each school could be continued on active duty in the same capacity. This would be better than putting in new men unfamiliar with the school, as well as with R. O. T. C. training.

(5) Even if additional junior R. O. T. C. units were available at the present time, many deserving and old-established schools like Peacock (established 1894) would not qualify for a unit due to the requirement of a minimum of 100 boys not less than 14 years of age. In our case, and in the case of many other schools (including junior high schools), the school does have enough boys 12 years of age and over who are old enough for the entire course of R. O. T. C. training. I therefore urge that in providing for more junior R. O. T. C. units for preparatory schools the minimum age limit be reduced to 12 years of age.

(6) Junior R. O. T. C. units should be established in all junior and senior high schols, both public and private, in order that there shall be a uniform system of military training and in order that when a student transfers from one school to another he may receive credit for the military training completed in the first school. Under present regulations there are three school classifications, (a) junior R. O. T. C. units, (b) 55c units, and schools like Peacock who receive their Government recognition under (c) act of April 27, 1914 (38 Stat. 370). By combining all of these various types of units into one junior R. O. T. C. unit the same course of military training will be given to all students and all students can transfer when necessary from one school to another without loss of time or credit. Furthermore, this would enable all students to have equal opportunity to secure credit toward a Reserve commission upon becoming 21 years of age.

(7) Another defect in the law which should be corrected is that cavalry equipment (saddles, etc.) is now available only to senior R. O. T. C. cavalry units, which are also furnished horses and caretakers by the Government. Many schools (like Peacock) have already added, or would like to add, cavalry training to their military department. They can afford to purchase and feed their own horses but they cannot buy or borrow saddles and other equipment from the Government necessary for cavalry training. In our case (Peacock) we receive rifles, bayonets, and ammunition from the Government (act of Apr. 17, 1914 (38 Stat. 370)), but there is no provision whereby we may obtain the use of saddles, rifle scabbards, and other necessary cavalry equipment (except by buying them at a high price through Army salvage stores).

(8) I, therefore, respectfully suggest the following:

(a) That junior R. O. T. C. units be made available to all junior and senior high schools (both public and private) who desire same, and that all red tape be dispensed with in order that these schools may obtain their units in time for the opening of the new school year in September 1940.

(b) That (if necessary as an economy measure) these schools be required to furnish (at their own expense) a National Guard or Reserve officer as commandant to give the military drill and instruction, under the supervision of a Regular Army officer. (One Regular Army officer could supervise several different schools in the same locality.)

(c) That private military school students be required to furnish their own uniforms (they can well afford this and most private schools already have a distinctive uniform different in color from the Army uniform). This would save the Government this great expense.

(d) That all junior R. O. T. C. units be furnished with a Springfield rifle for each student and enough additional modern equipment to acquaint the student with the automatic rifle, machine guns, etc. (a few to each school). Also, that those schools desiring to give cavalry training and who maintain their own horses (without expense to the Government) be furnished with saddles, bridles, and other equipment necessary for cavalry drill.

Captain, Cavalry Reserve, Commandant.

A Railroad Brotherhood Makes Pertinent Observations Anent Military Preparations and the International Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. COFFEE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

STATEMENT BY A. F. WHITNEY, PRESIDENT, BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD TRAINMEN

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I include herewith a powerful statement issued by A. F. Whitney, eminent and brilliant president of the great Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of the United States. In this statement this order sets forth the views entertained by it with respect to national defense and the international situation. I commend its careful study to all.

President Roosevelt wisely counseled the American people when he declared that the only thing we have to fear is fear itself. A people who have an abiding sense of security—security of their freedom, their civil liberties, their economic existence, their homes—is a fearless people. With one-third of our citizens ill-clad, ill-fed, and ill-housed we cannot possess that national sense of security and contentment so vital to the defense of our country. Good homes, wholesome environment, short working hours with cultural wages, afford the people a sense of security that contributes most effectively to the national defense. Many years ago the principle of law was laid down that a man's home is his castle. Hovels do not make secure castles.

The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen wholeheartedly supports the program of complete national defense against any enemies who may attempt to enter our gates. We believe our homes should be fully protected against any possibility of invasion. We are opposed to sending our sons across the seas to fight on foreign land. Our influence for the attainment of a lasting and constructive peace will be more effective if we do not become involved in the abdication of human reason that has so completely destroyed human security on the European Continent. If we, the richest nation in the world, dedicate our resources, mental and material, to the uplift of human life, who can deny that the example we shall establish shall be an inspiration that will cause European nations eventually to dethrone their war lords? If we shall more completely dedicate the discoveries and advancements in science and technology to the attainment of improved living conditions, who can deny that we are not thereby serving God's purpose and dealing a heavy blow to the godless forces that divert these great human achievements to the processes of human destruction?

Like Hitler, whose "blitzkrieg" first struck the German trade unions, destroying the workers' organizations and looting their insurance reserves and union treasuries, some American industrialists have declared a lightning war against organized labor in the United States. These industrialists are apparently attempting to twist the virtues of national defense into a plan for destroying the gains which labor and progressive-minded citizens have achieved through many years of struggle; they would destroy the wages and hour law, emasculate the National Labor Relations Act, intensify their industrial spying activity, shackle labor's right to organize, and throttle the people's civil liberties.

A smoke screen of sweet reassurances is intended to disguise the attack on labor. As one chamber of commerce executive recently put it, "Labor no doubt will join in making whatever sacrifice is necessary for the protection and preservation of the Nation." This particular business spokesman is hopeful that the Government will ease up on the enforcement of wage-hour legislation.

A large public utilities corporation has urged the Securities and Exchange Commission—in the name of national defense—to hold in abeyance the death-sentence provision of the Securities and Exchange Act. Also in the name of national defense, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States has sent its dive bombers into action against the National Labor Relations Act.

Why all this activity on the part of the industrial tycoons? Are they interested in real national defense? If they are, they would not be conspiring to weaken the defenses of American labor while fortifying their own strongholds. It does not require profound research to discover that the robber barons are bent on destroying organized labor in order to garner the maximum amount of profits during the present war period. Eighteen thousand new millionaires were harvested by the United States as a result of the first World War. All signs—particularly the absence of a general excess war-profits law—point to an even larger crop of profiteers at this time. Profits of many corporations have soared in 1940, as compared with 1939. While profiteers amass wealth, unemployment in the United States continues to be the lot of 10 or 11 million citizens, and there is nothing on the horizon—not even the huge public expenditures for national defense—to guarantee that this problem will be solved.

Those who lose no time to cast aspersions in the direction of organized labor not only for the purpose of discrediting and weakening the labor movement, but also to direct public attention away from their own "fifth column" activities, should be a sharp reminder of the fact that Hitler's rise to power in Germany was accomplished only because of the connivance of certain wealthy industrialists. The New York Times of November 21, 1939, quotes a United Press dispatch from Zurich, Switzerland, in part, as follows:

"Herr (Fritz) Thyssen and a small group of the Rhineland industrialists and bankers supported the Nazi cause in the years when it seemed hopeless. It was at the Cologne home of one of this group, Kurt von Schroeder, the banker, that Herr Hitler and Franz von Papen, former chancelor, reached the agreement that resulted in Herr Hitler's being called to the chancellery.

"After Herr Hitler came into power Herr Thyssen became 'leader of heavy industry' under the economic reorganization program and was appointed to the Prussian state council."

Today international affairs unfortunately are too largely governed by the rule of "tooth and claw." Nation after nation has felt the iron heel of the ruthless fuehrer. It is therefore quite understandable that the American people—and labor first of all—should be anxious to build up the strongest possible system of national defense. In bulwarking our Republic, however, we must not give way to the false plea that, in order to compete with the dictatorships, we must scuttle labor's rights and social legislation, and "temporarily" abandon the democratic way of life.

To deprive the people of achievements that have been made over years of great effort is to disarm them. It would arrest progress generally and seriously hamper our national-defense program. To refuse to solve the pressing domestic problems—unemployment, housing, social security—is to undermine the morale of the population. To whip up war hysteria and, in the fever of the moment, to restrict freedom of speech and of the press, is to bring this Nation that much nearer to fascism.

American labor must and will maintain the utmost vigilance, to see to it that democracy at home is not torpedoed from within or from without.

Colleges and the Selective Service Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

LETTER TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a letter written to the editor of the New York Times, dated July 13, 1940, by Dr. Arnaud C. Marts, president of Bucknell University, Lewisburg, Pa., showing the effect upon our colleges of the pending selective service bill as now drawn.

JULY 13, 1940.

THE EDITOR, NEW YORK TIMES, NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR SIR: There is one aspect of the operation of the pending Burke-Wadsworth selective service bill which has not been discussed publicly and which is of sufficient national importance to merit discussion. I refer to the effect this bill would have upon the operations of our 600 private colleges.

First, let me say that I approve the principle of compulsory military service for all males between the ages of 21 and 45, as suggested in this bill, and believe our Nation must immediately take some such aggressive step in the preparation of our defense against what seems to be the plans of certain military nations for world conquest.

I also believe that this military training should be universal. I am sure college men, as I know them, would not want or expect any special treatment in this regard.

In the operation of the plan, however, we must guard against any unnecessary weakening of our essential agencies and services. President Conant of Harvard has already pointed out, in his statement to the congressional committee, several services, such as the medical and engineering professions and certain semiprofessional activities, which should be protected against a too rigid operation of a conscription plan. I believe that some thought, also, should be given to the effect that a hastily conceived plan might have on the operation of our private colleges.

These colleges, with the exception of a score or so very highly endowed institutions, depend for most of their annual operating expenses upon their annual tuition income. If all male students at these colleges of the age of 21 and over were to be suddenly withdrawn from college during the next few months for their compulsory military service, many of these colleges would be forced into a serious financial crisis. They would lose immediately about 30 percent of their income and, with the exception of the few heavily endowed institutions referred to above, would be thrown into the operating red.

There is but one way for such a college to reduce its operating cost quickly to meet such an emergency—that is to reduce faculty salaries.

The average independent college, faced with an unexpected reduction of its tuition income, would have to make a horizontal slash of all faculty salaries of, approximately, 20 percent if it were to continue to operate soundly without a deficit.

There are about 50,000 faculty members in these independent colleges, and the average salary, outside of a few institutions noted above, is something less than $3,000. An unexpected cut on these salaries would throw these faculty families into the operating red.

I therefore bespeak a word of interest in their problem. These teachers in our traditional private American colleges are men and women of the highest patriotism, in spite of the contrary impression that a very small radical minority of them have created in the public mind through loose thinking and looser talking. It would be a great pity if these typically American families of modest income were made to suffer unnecessarily in time of peace, if careful thought in the preparation of the bill could protect them from this domestic disaster without weakening the bill.

I bespeak a word also for the problem of the colleges themselves. There are over 500,000 American boys and girls in these private institutions. Our Republic owes an inestimable debt to these colleges. They are among the most prized of our typically American institutions. They were our first colleges and have always been an important bulwark of the strength of our American democracy. A vast number of the present leaders of American life are graduates of these modest colleges, situated in every State in the Union. Some of these colleges have such financial worries brought on by the last 10 years of perplexities that they probably could not survive an additional acute problem of this nature. Most of them would survive, however, but at the cost of a measure of the vitality of their educational service to youth and to our Nation.

I do not have any particular suggestions to make in reference to the solution of this problem, but I do feel that the problem should be stated in order that the public should be aware of it, and in order that our Senators and Congressmen might take it into consideration in the final formulation of the bill.

Yours sincerely,

ARNAUD C. MARTS, President.

Who Is Out of Step on Trade Agreements?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK H. BUCK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, following up the policy which was then approved by Republican leadership with reference to the reciprocal trade-agreements program of this administration, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], on June 4, extended his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in an effort to convince American producers that they had been injured by imports which were alleged to have been the result of the reciprocal trade-agreements program.

I am glad to give credit where credit is due, consequently I am happy to note that in the RECORD for June 19, there was a rather frank admission by the gentleman that the June 4 contention might have been wrong.

In the June 19 statement he admits:

> The reductions already made have not resulted in widespread disaster to American economic conditions.

Then further on he confesses:

> Merely because the American market is not being flooded with the products of foreign countries does not mean that concessions made in rates of duty have not been unwise.

He expresses fear, however, that there may be injury sometime in the future.

Now, the whole implication of the gentleman's statement of June 4 was that the American market had been flooded with products of foreign countries. But in the statement of June 19 the gentleman was apparently afraid that some candidate who was not sympathetic with his point of view on trade agreements would be nominated on the Republican ticket, and that is just what happened. The gentleman turned out to be an excellent prophet. Without commenting on the contradictory foreign trade and tariff plank of the Republican platform at this time, I want to call attention to Mr. Willkie's repudiation of the position of every one of my Republican colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means on trade agreements. In spite of a side-stepping platform, what Mr. Willkie has done, or may do, many Americans have judged, and will continue to judge, Mr. Willkie on the following forthright statement from Fortune Magazine for April 1940:

> Now, obviously, it will not do for one great nation to become a free-trade country by itself. For the United States to erase its tariffs all at once would be ruinous to our people and many of our industries. The present Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, who is wise and temperate, realizes this. And so he adopted the reciprocal trade agreements as a step toward increasing our foreign business gradually. Under this policy the United States takes up the problem of tariffs with each country separately; lists the products that it would like to export; studies a similar list submitted by the other country; and then a deal is arranged, each country making such concessions as it can, with the least possible harm and most possible benefit to its own people. This agreement is then extended to apply to other countries too. What could be simpler or more in accord with common sense? What could be better qualified to benefit us, the people, as a whole? Of course, we have to make sacrifices. But the point is that, owing to the way the agreements are negotiated, the sacrifices are always, and should always be, less than the benefits gained. That is, we, the people, profit.
> We do not put much faith in the figures cited by the Republicans to show how damaging these Hull agreements have been or in the figures cited by the Democrats to show how profitable they have been. It may be years before conclusive results can be shown. But it is inconceivable to us that prosperity can be reestablished without any foreign trade. And it seems clear that if we are to have foreign trade it must be done on a reciprocal basis. We, the most successful people in the world at business and industry, know that there are two parties to every trade and that one cannot always profit at the expense of the other. It is of vital importance to us that the other party profit too.

I believe another of my Republican colleagues will be a prophet "in his own party." According to the newspapers, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] stated at Philadelphia that if Mr. Willkie should be nominated a number of Republican Congressmen would be defeated.

Since I have a real interest in the welfare of agriculture, I want to go into the gentleman's insertion in the RECORD of June 4 in more detail.

The gentleman starts out with the flat misstatement that—

> Eight years later, in 1940, we find that our foreign trade, instead of progressively improving, has steadily deteriorated under New Deal policies.

Now the truth is that in 1932 total United States foreign trade amounted to $2,934,000,000 of which $1,611,000,000 or 55 percent was exports. In 1939 United States foreign trade amounted to $5,496,000,000, a gain of 87 percent. Of the 1939 foreign trade $3,177,000,000 or 58 percent was in exports. Exports from the United States in 1939 were more than 97 percent higher than they were in 1932. That is how "our foreign trade has deteriorated under New Deal policies."

When the real facts are brought to light they explode—as they have exploded before—his assertions about the welfare of American farmers. In the attacks which he makes on the reciprocal trade agreements program, he has not had the courage to talk about the incomes that American farmers have received under that program. To dispel the smoke screen of deception which he is again trying to throw out, it really needs only two figures—the income of American farmers in 1932 in the last year of his administration, and the income in any year he chooses to select under the present administration since the trade-agreements program was inaugurated. In 1932 that income was $4,682,000.000, in 1939 it was $7,711,000,000, a gain of 65 percent. In the face of that gain, his handpicked statistics on a few imports cease to have any meaning. And those income figures can hardly be unknown to him because they have been called to his attention many times. If his concern for American farmers had any basis other than a partisan interest he would not continue to ignore facts and try to mislead his farmer constituents. Much of his outburst of June 4 is on the same level as the Republican talk, in 1936, about babassu nuts which Mr. Franklyn Waltman, Republican publicity director, so expertly ridiculed.

The gentleman from New York uses a tabulation of agricultural exports from this country, "competitive" agricultural imports, and the percentage which the latter are of the former, from 1932 through 1939. He professes to be horrified by the picture which he paints but he need not be horrified if he will only view the picture from the proper perspective. In 6 of the 7 years following 1932, despite the devastating droughts of 1934 and 1936, the agricultural exports of this country were greater than they were in the last year of his party's administration—1932.

The gentleman, in the process of being horrified about the effects of the trade-agreements program, lists 14 agricultural commodities or groups of commodities of which imports increased from 1932 to 1939. Unfortunately, for his inference that trade agreements caused increased imports, the tariff on 6 of these groups of commodities have never been touched—the tariffs on them remain at the levels that were fixed in the 1930 Tariff Act; so imports could not have been affected by the trade-agreements program, except insofar as the program has enhanced the ability of American farm and city consumers to buy these products. The 6 which he enumerates and on which no tariffs have been reduced under trade agreements are vegetable oils, flaxseed, clothing wool, unmanufactured cotton, canned beef, and hides and skins.

The other groups which represented something more than trade-agreement items were cheese, of which less than half comes in under duties reduced under trade agreements; imports of molasses which are controlled entirely by an import quota, and most of it is used by American farmers as an important feed for livestock, possibly even by the gentleman's dairy farmers; less than half of the imports of live cattle in 1939 came in under tariffs reduced under trade agreements. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] does not know this his informers have not performed their duty to him. Furthermore, the farm price of beef cattle in the United States and the farm cash income from beef cattle were higher in 1939 than they have been since 1929. Is this not an important fact omitted by the gentleman? Imports of sugar are controlled by quotas and enter under separate legislation. In addition to tariffs, benefit payments from the United States Government are paid to sugar producers. Why was this fact omitted? Is he in favor of paying the sugar producers less while increasing tariffs for other groups? Imports of nuts represent a negligible proportion of domestic consumption and are of kinds, grades, and varieties which do not directly compete with domestic production; imports of fodders and feeds and corn are made primarily for the benefit of farmers, such as the gentleman from New York has in his district; the only concession on corn was a nominal one granted exclusively to Cuba.

The gentleman seems to find in the fact that foreign countries have bought mostly the industrial goods which they need for their defense, an indictment of the trade-agreements program. He seems to expect that in the reciprocal trade-agreements program there was some aggressive and powerful force by which we should make foreign countries purchase the things we want them to purchase rather than the things they need to save their lives. Of course they have bought machinery, iron, and steel products, the paraphernalia of war, rather than agricultural products. It has been and is the philosophy of the trade-agreements program to facilitate the interchange between this country and other countries, of the things that both countries needed. There is no place in this program for forcing trade at the point of a bayonet. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] must know this, but he carefully avoids admitting it in his partisan attacks upon the trade-agreements program.

I want to revert to his confession of the "error of his ways," which appeared in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 4018. After expressing great fear as to the possible "great flood" of imports which promises to be disastrous in the future, we find a ray of hope after November in the following words:

> Beyond that, they—
> Presumably Republicans—
> can proceed to correct such errors as do exist in the tariff structure by a proper revision to fit American conditions and world conditions which we know will exist at the conclusion of the disastrous wars now raging.

Is that the Republican promise and prophecy of another Hawley-Smoot Act which was such an important factor in causing the world depression, which in turn made conditions fertile for warring dictators?

The administration's proposal for greater commercial cooperation in the Western Hemisphere indicates that it is approaching world problems in a sane and constructive way. It is not so bankrupt of ideas that it can propose nothing but another war-provoking tariff orgy as the proper solution for the ills of the United States and the world.

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask my colleagues to read the two articles which I have inserted in the RECORD today: One by Maj. Al Williams, entitled "Defense Program Not for Defense, Aviator Claims"; and the other a report on our military aid to Great Britain by the Commerce Department, entitled, "British Got Record Total of United States Arms in June." Both of these articles appeared in the Washington News, July 24, 1940.

The question arises in my mind as to the right of the administration to deplete our national defenses in order to help a foreign government. Surely such action is not only unneutral, but is in reality a direct effort by the administration to involve the United States in the present war on the side of the disintegrating British Empire.

No one should fail to realize that our present attitude toward Japan is an administration attempt to force the United States into war against Japan—which, of course, will aline us on the side of Great Britain. There is hardly any doubt of Japan joining the German-Italian alliance, and there is less doubt of the ultimate outcome of this conflict. The British Empire will lose, no matter what we do, and we should, therefore, look after our own defenses instead of jeopardizing our security by rendering aid to the international Jewish bankers, who have been using and abusing not only the British people but their nation as well as every nation in the world. We can only build a strong and sound America on the principles handed down to us by the founders of our Nation; and those principles are set forth in the Constitution of the United States. It is, therefore, time, as I have said before, that Congress awakens to the danger which now confronts our Nation and take such steps that will insure the welfare of our people and the security of our country. The first step is to impeach the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, for depleting and destroying our national defenses.

Congress has appropriated $15,000,000,000 to build defenses of the United States, and not those of foreign nations.

DEFENSE PROGRAM NOT FOR DEFENSE, AVIATOR CLAIMS

(By Al Williams)

Those who scream about the necessity for booming the defenses of the United States and at the same time ship airplanes, aerial machine guns, and mosquito warships to Europe are not going to get by this column.

The things now happening in this country are counterparts of things that have been put across on the peoples of Europe, in one form or another.

Each time I check the progress of our national rearmament program, I am informed by manufacturers of planes, engines, and munitions that they wonder whether we will be rearmed in time. "In time for what?" I ask. "Oh, for South America and the Japanese," they say.

URGES COMPLETE JOB

Well, my answer is that if we are rearming to defend the United States against invasion or aggression (which we are not, in my opinion) then there is time to do a complete job—with the aid of a definite plan. As proof that our "defense plan" is not for defense, I offer this evidence:

First, the administration smashed the 1939 Army Air Corps expansion program, whereby the Army was to have received about 3,000 planes by June 1941. Washington arbitrarily decided to shunt the production from that manufacturing program to the Allies. Those planes were flown from American soil, by hired civilian pilots (Americans), and were fully equipped with machine guns.

The Navy's standard dive bombers, the SBC–4's, were taken from the Navy and flown to Canada.

VERY VALUABLE

These Army and Navy planes are worth their weight in gold to the air-defense preparations of this country. But they were traded, sold, or pawned to foreign nations that had been doing the same thing with their own air-force planes from 1935 to 1939.

Every second line plane (and some of ours were not seconds) would have served for intermediate training of our young fighting pilots. We are woefully short of all types of military and naval planes, but the Army and Navy were stripped. Can you make that jibe with the hysteria about defense of America?

Will we be able to get ready militarily? For defense—yes. We have the time, and we may be able to develop enough potential sock in our forces. But we can't build military, naval, and air forces sufficient to keep pace with those who seem determined to get us into a foreign war.

That would mean developing forces and arming them well enough to fight the Japanese in Asia, someone else in South America, and still continuing to ship munitions to Europe. To manufacture weapons in those quantities we should have to discontinue all commercial business, scrap the career of every American man, woman, and child and turn the United States into a vast arsenal.

The second article to which I have referred; the report of the Commerce Department on our military aid to Great Britain, proves the statements of Major Williams. This gentleman has given timely advice before, similar to that given by Colonel Lindbergh and others. Why does not Congress heed the warnings of these men, who have the country's welfare at heart?

[From the Washington Daily News of July 24, 1940]

BRITISH GOT RECORD TOTAL OF UNITED STATES ARMS IN JUNE

The United Kingdom, bracing itself for "blitzkrieg," imported explosives, firearms, and ammunition valued at $23,000,000 from the United States in June, the Commerce Department revealed today.

These shipments compared with imports of only $300,000 in May and were believed to be the heaviest of their kind for any month since outbreak of war.

TOTAL OF SEVENTY-SEVEN MILLIONS

Arms exports represented nearly 30 percent of the value of all shipments to the United Kingdom in June. Preliminary figures show exports to the British aggregated $77,000,000, compared with $49,000,000 in May, and a monthly average of $51,000,000 during the first 9 months of the war.

Preliminary figures showed this country's world-wide exports in June totaled $344,000,000, a gain of approximately 8 percent over May. While the June shipments were 4 percent below the war peak of $360,000,000 reached last January, they were more than 40 percent larger than the average for the same month of the 3 immediately preceding years.

Exports for Canada and Latin America in June were the highest for any month of the war period and more than offset severely curtailed shipments to the Mediterranean area. Shipments to Canada were valued at $64,000,000, an increase of 8 percent over May. Those to Latin America totaled $71,000,000, an advance of 6 percent. The biggest gain—$4,000,000—was recorded in exports to Argentina.

Although trade with France fell off in the latter part of June, exports totaling $45,000,000—$8,000,000 more than in May—left the United States for France during the month.

What proportion entered French ports prior to the conclusion of the Franco-German armistice is not known.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I say that Congress should investigate as to whether or not the 23 naval ships were released to Great Britain. It is my opinion that they were, as I view the picture on the front page of the Times-Herald of July 25, 1940. If this is true, and I have no reason to doubt the statement—let me now suggest that Congress take charge of this Government and eliminate those from public office who are responsible for the fiasco in which we find ourselves today.

The question may be asked, Has Congress capitulated to the Treasury Department, and is the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, now director and dictator of the United States? Has he superseded the President, or has he been appointed by the President to dispose of our armaments to foreign nations, so that we will be unprotected and open to invasion?

Let us look into the possibilities: Suppose that England, in an hour of stress, negotiated an agreement with Germany that a British empire should be established on the North American Continent, in what position would we be to defend ourselves against such aggression? Let us not forget that this was the dream of Carnegie and Cecil Rhodes that the United States should again become a part of the British Empire, and that is also a desire with which the international bankers are in accord. European trade and intrigue may place us just exactly in that position, and it is with that thought in view I maintain we should build our own defenses and let European nations shift for themselves. Our home is America, and it is our duty to consolidate the American Continent, in order to provide for our own security. We should, as I have said, take over Canada and all British and French islands, with the ultimate object of building an impregnable nation on the North American Continent.

Pertinent Questions of Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to call attention to certain pertinent questions of today.

Was President Roosevelt drafted at the Chicago convention, or did he knowingly and willingly contrive to bring about his third-term nomination? Had the President's 3,500-word radio acceptance speech been prepared in advance, and if so, how long in advance of its delivery? Was the Chicago convention a boss-ridden convention, or was it "a free and open convention?" Is the President's claim that he is the only "experienced man" capable of steering the Nation through the present national crisis based upon facts?

These and many other similar questions are bothering great masses of sincere patriotic citizens today, both Republicans and Democrats. What does the record show?

The record shows a national debt bordering on bankruptcy; unemployment, after 7½ years of New Deal experiments, still around the ten million mark; the farm problem of parity prices still unsolved; our military unpreparedness so serious that it constitutes the major element of our present emergency crisis; a country divided into class-conscious groups, a national disunity brought about largely by name-callings indulged in by the President and his New Deal henchmen, Ickes, Jackson, Hopkins, and others; taxes the highest in the Nation's history; American business and industry shackled and handicapped by bureaucratic maladministration of the N. L. R. A. and punitive taxation. Then, in addition to this list of New Deal failures, we must, in order to get the answer to our questions, consider the President's unsuccessful attempt to pack the Supreme Court, his unsuccessful attempt to reorganize the Federal Government on a basis that would have given the President the power of life and death over all Government agencies; and his unsuccessful attempt to purge life-long Democrats that opposed his Court-packing program.

Judging solely from the record, is the President the only man who can save the country in the present national emergency?

These are pertinent questions that must be answered. We should consult the record in order to arrive at correct answers. A decision must be made at the polls next November. I have faith to believe that the American people will render a proper decision.

A Footnote to the Democratic Convention's Lexicon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, the attached article from the New York Times of July 24, 1940, by Arthur Krock is such an excellent footnote to the Democratic convention as to be eminently deserving of a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the New York Times of July 24, 1940]

IN THE NATION—A FOOTNOTE TO THE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION'S LEXICON

(By Arthur Krock)

A comparison between the contents of the parliamentary manual for the Democratic National Convention of 1940 with the text for 1936 suggests very strongly, if it does not completely prove, that the strategists in charge of the President's renomination drive made every provision to take out of quotation marks not only the "draft" but choice by "acclamation." That they failed is no fault of theirs, or of the President, who gave them the essential assistance of silent approval. The "draft" remained a build-up, and the "acclamation" was another pretense.

The comparison between the two convention manuals, both prepared by Representative CLARENCE CANNON, of Missouri, discloses that the following passage was added to the 1940 book:

"Acclamation is a unanimous viva voce vote and any objector may raise a point of order, but by long custom the chairman puts the question 'to suspend the rules and declare * * * nominated for President of the United States by acclamation.' The motion to nominate by acclamation is sometimes made before roll call starts (1888; 1916) and sometimes after roll call, in which a candidate has secured a nominating majority (1892; 1920)."

This, for the purposes of the record, turned out to be a very useful addition to the convention manual. In the official account it will accordingly appear that Mr. Roosevelt, who was actually nominated by acclamation in 1936, was similarly chosen in 1940, though the procedure in 1940 was the reverse of that in 1936. The official account, thanks to the added paragraph, will recite the record at the expense of both dictionary and facts.

From Philadelphia in 1936 a dispatch to this newspaper, dated June 27, described the actual process of acclamation as follows: "On motion of Governor Berry, of South Dakota, the rules were suspended and the roll call was dispensed with." Senator Robinson, the chairman, said that Philadelphia had "beaten Cleveland," where Mr. Landon, after a roll call and the registry of opposition, had been given a unanimous vote, which was accurately certified as such in the record and in the public accounts.

Aware of the difference, Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts, in seconding Mr. Farley's motion to make the President's third nomination unanimous, used that word and not the other. When a similar motion was made to give a unit ballot to Secretary Wallace, after a roll call in which opposition had been recorded to his selection for second place on the ticket, the word "unanimous" and not the word "acclamation" again was used. But as the President, for the purposes of the strategists had to be "drafted," so the remainder of the game had to be played out if possible. And Mr. Farley assisted this in the following manner:

He had planned, according to the general custom, and in common parlance, to move to suspend the rules before the roll call was tallied and make renomination of Mr. Roosevelt unanimous. But Senator BYRNES, who was the President's floor leader in the "draft," informed him that the word "acclamation" was wanted and had the sanction of the manual. This Representative CANNON confirmed, showing Mr. Farley the most conveniently added passage. So, though Mr. Farley knew that acclamation after a roll call in which votes had been cast for others was not the accurate term as he understood it, or the process of Philadelphia, he obeyed the book.

When informed by this correspondent that the 1936 manual did not include the passage which had been shown to him, Mr. Farley was surprised.

This newspaper then sought to interview Representative CANNON in an effort to discover why the addition had been made. He said the manual is his own work "and not part of the Democratic rules." He said he compiled the book in order to cite precedents and to guide the convention in the interpretation and enforcement of the rules. He had this particular citation in mind this year because there were precedents on which it is based.

There is no such thing, continued Mr. Cannon, as nomination by acclamation under the rules, but in this instance it had been done by the Farley motion to suspend the rules. But why, he was asked again, did not this citation appear in the 1936 book, since the precedents mentioned existed when that book was prepared? Mr. Cannon declined to discuss the matter further.

The incident fits perfectly into the whole artificial structure at Chicago last week, whether or not Mr. Cannon made the addition with this in mind. For reasons which became more and more obvious and inescapable, Mr. Roosevelt was, of course, the overwhelming choice of the delegates and those leaders who had them selected. When they got to Chicago there was literally nothing else they could do unless the President issued a firm refusal to run again. But a "draft" means a spontaneous and unanimous call on a contrary-minded citizen, and none of these three adjectives describes what happened at Chicago. Likewise, "acclamation" means, as at Philadelphia, dispensing with a roll-call, suspending the rules, and giving a unanimous vote for someone.

The strategists proposed this course, and it failed. But by virtue of the convenient addendum to the manual they got the form of what they wanted.

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES HAWKS, JR.
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Walter Lippmann from today's issue of the Washington Post:

[From the Washington Post of July 25, 1940]

TODAY AND TOMORROW—THE PAPER SCHEMES

(By Walter Lippmann)

The paramount question is how soon, if ever, Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Willkie, or both, will begin to tell the people the truth about the national defense. The people are not being told the truth. They are being dazzled and diverted by grandiose authorizations, appropriations, contracts, plans, promises, and commitments. These are the easy things to which politicians invariably resort when they lack the resolution to do the hard and necessary things. Placed as we are in this country today, the supreme problem in foreign policy is to clarify and define the relationship of the United States to the British Commonwealth and to British sea power; the subject is treated by the politicians of both parties as unmentionable. Internally, the supreme problem of national defense is to increase rapidly the rate of industrial production in the munitions industries; since this cannot be done without inconvenience to everyone and without interfering with the vested interests of businessmen, trades-unions, and consumers, the subject is regarded by the politicians as untouchable.

Because we are drifting aimlessly and failing to define our foreign policy or seriously to organize the national defense, we are deceiving ourselves most dangerously by a series of paper schemes in which the second scheme covers up the defect of the first and the third scheme covers up the defect of the second.

The underlying paper scheme, our first and fundamental departure from the reality of America's vital interests, was the neutrality law. Even as amended last autumn, the law prevented the United States from acting to preserve in friendly hands the naval control of our two-ocean frontiers; the neutrality law committed us to the immense gamble and the immeasurable risk of allowing British and French sea power to be destroyed, and of having, therefore, to let ourselves be isolated and compelled to defend ourselves in two oceans with one navy.

The conquest of France and the threat of the conquest of Britain tore a hole in tha paper scheme of the neutrality law. The country reacted immediately. Thereupon, Congress and the administration pasted another piece of paper over the hole. They authorized another navy. But the hole of the paper navy was that it could not be constructed in less than 4 or 5 years, and that was an optimistic estimate. So over this hole in the scheme for a paper navy, another piece of paper has had to be pasted. A great army is to be authorized in order that we may be able to defend by land and air forces those vital positions in this hemisphere which the Navy alone, should Britain fall, is now unable to defend. But the great hole in this scheme for a paper army is that while a million men can be conscripted and given rudimentary drill, they cannot be equipped with modern weapons much before 1942–43.

For American industry and American labor are not now geared to produce these weapons rapidly, nor are serious and effective measures being discussed publicly, much less put into effect, to begin producing these weapons rapidly. Paper contracts are being signed. But the real task of putting the production of munitions ahead of everything else, ahead of private profit, private preferences, ahead of all peacetime reforms and all peacetime restrictions, has not begun. And neither political party and neither candidate has as yet dared to go to the people and tell them truthfully what sacrifices they must make if they are to translate any of these paper schemes into a dependable armed force.

The grim truth about the national defense is that by failing to use our whole diplomatic and economic power to insure ourselves against the conquest and collapse of the British Empire, we are compelled to authorize another navy which cannot be built before it may be needed, to authorize a great army which cannot be equipped before it may be needed, and to make pledges and commitments to our neighbors in this hemisphere which may not be valid if we lack the navy and the army to execute the pledges. And then, because the politicians are afraid to tell the people the truth, they are organizing the productive capacity of the country as if they had years of leisure ahead of them and as if no stringent measures were really necessary.

We are still going down the same road which all the other democracies have taken. We have not learned the plain lesson of their disasters. Our political leaders will not speak the truth for fear of shocking the voters. They will not speak the truth for fear that their opponents will make a demagogic attack upon them. They will not call capital to the colors; they are afraid to disturb the unawakened businessmen. They will not enlist labor for the national defense; they are afraid to ask the necessary sacrifices of hours, wages, and peactime restriction. They will not give the national defense priority over private consumption; they are afraid of the voting consumers.

They do not read the signs of the time; they read the Gallup polls. And they choose invariably those policies which promise much eventually and cost little immediately—as, for example, the promise of a two-ocean Navy and the promise of hemisphere defense. But they avoid the hard measures, such as coming to terms with the British nations because that would run into political prejudices, such as mobilizing capital and labor because that would call for real sacrifice to make real the big schemes.

It is difficult to imagine why any man should now wish to be elected President unless he had behind him an informed and awakened people. Does not experience show, the experience of Mr. Chamberlain and M. Daladier, that to assume responsibility without preparing the Nation for its task is to invite a national catastrophe and personal ruin? Elementary prudence, if nothing else, should make every candidate running for national office this year insist upon making the people realize what they must do to make themselves secure. For to be elected, and not to have told the people what will be necessary, is to accept an awful responsibility without making ready to meet it.

And so, though the immediate political risk of speaking the truth during the campaign is great, the political risk of not having spoken the truth will in the end be ever so much greater.

The Making of a Representative

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR B. JENKS

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent heretofore granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, for the information and consideration of the voters of the First Congressional District of New Hampshire, I desire to include an address on The Making of a Representative, which was delivered on March 16, 1916, by the Honorable Champ Clark, then Speaker of the House of Representatives, before the Washington Press Club.

THE MAKING OF A REPRESENTATIVE—REMARKS OF CHAMP CLARK AT THE WASHINGTON PRESS CLUB THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1916

[Printed in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 17, 1916.]

It is a high honor to be a Representative in Congress, if for only one term, and with the number of terms the honor increases in geometrical rather than in arithmetical proportion. A Member's usefulness to his country should increase in the same proportion. A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

"Poeta nascitur, non fit"—a poet is born, not made—says Horace; but Congressmen—that is, useful and influential Congressmen—are made largely by experience and practice.

The old Charlotte district in Virginia knew this and kept John Randolph of Roanoke in the House till he became a great national figure. Then the Old Dominion sent him to the Senate and General Jackson sent him to St. Petersburg. There are sporadic cases of similar action in other districts.

It is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has the quicker he will get up. If he possesses these qualities, and if his constituents will keep him in the House, he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No human power can keep him down. It is only fair and rational to assume that every Representative's constituents desire to see him among the "top-notchers."

Let us take the present House and see how long the men who hold the high places have served. I cannot name all, but will cite a few as samples.

Mr. Speaker Cannon is serving his fortieth year. He holds the record, or, in pugilistic parlance, "he holds the belt," for length of service in the House in our entire history. In several Congresses he was chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations and then was Speaker 8 years, only one man, Henry Clay, having been Speaker longer.

I am serving my twenty-second year; Minority Leader Mann is serving his twentieth year; Mr. Kitchin, chairman of Ways and Means, his sixteenth; Mr. Fitzgerald, chairman of Appropriations, his eighteenth; Mr. Moon, chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads, his twentieth; Mr. Jones, chairman of Insular Affairs and "father of the House," his twenty-sixth; Mr. Flood, chairman of Foreign Affairs, his sixteenth; Mr. Hay, chairman of Military Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. Glass, chairman of Banking and Currency, his sixteenth; Mr. Adamson, chairman of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, his twentieth; Mr. Stephens, chairman of Indian Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. Slayden, chairman of the Library, his twentieth; Mr. Henry, chairman of Rules, his twentieth; Mr. Lever, chairman of Agriculture, his sixteenth; Mr. Padgett, chairman of the Navy, his sixteenth; Mr. Lloyd, chairman of Accounts, his twentieth; and Mr. Sparkman, chairman of Rivers and Harbors, his twenty-second. There are other big chairmanships, but these will suffice to show that as a rule the big places go to old and experienced Members, for most of the men who rank close to the chairmen are old timers. The same thing holds good with reference to members of the minority. As an illustration, Messrs. Gillett and Cooper, who are serving their twenty-fourth year, are the ranking Republicans on Appropriations and Foreign Affairs, almost certain to be chairmen thereof should the Republicans ever again have a majority in the House, as in that event, in all probability, Mr. Mann will be Speaker, unless he is nominated for President next June.

Go through the whole list and you will find, with few exceptions, that the men of long service have the high places.

New England and the cities of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh have understood the value of long service all along, and, having elected a fairly good man to Congress, they keep him in the harness.

The Member of longest consecutive service is called the father of the House. Five Philadelphians in immediate succession bore that honorable title—Randall, Kelley, O'Neill, Harmer, and Bingham. Then it went to Mr. Dalzell, of Pittsburgh. When General Bingham announced the death of General Harmer, his immediate predecessor as "father of the House," he stated that the five Philadelphia "fathers of the House" had served a total of 147 years, and he served 8 or 10 years after the making that interesting statement.

In the second and third Congresses in which I served, Maine, with only four Members, had the Speakership and the chairmanship of the great Committees on Ways and Means, Navy, and Public Buildings and Grounds—a most remarkable circumstance, giving the Pine Tree State an influence in the House and the country out of all proportion to her population and wealth. These four men—Reed, Dingley, Boutelle, and Millikin—each served in the House 20 years or more. Other States might profit by her example.

No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country.

The best rule, it seems to me, is for a district to select a man with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps him amazingly in doing things.

I can speak freely on this subject without violating the proprieties, for my constituents have kept me here 22 years, and for 20 years have given me nominations without opposition, for all of which favors I thank them from the bottom of my heart. Their generous action and unwavering friendship have enabled me to devote all my time to the public service. I have not been compelled to spend any portion of my time in "mending my fences." My constituents have attended to that. God bless them!

What has been true since the meeting of the First Congress under the Constitution of the United States in 1789 down to the days of Champ Clark is just as true today, as attested by an address entitled "There Is No Substitute for Experience," delivered on May 13, 1940, by our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Texas, Hon. MARVIN JONES, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, who stated, in part, as follows:

SERVICE IN CONGRESS—THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR EXPERIENCE

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly at this time in the interest of continuity of service in the Congress. As I am retiring from Congress at the end of the present term, I can speak without any thought of personal gain in the matter.

If a man is honest, if he has average or above-average ability and is industrious, then in fairness to him, in the best interest of his district and State as well as the Federal Government, his party at least should serve itself and honor him with renomination.

It has often been said that there is no substitute for experience. Under any system, ability plus experience is better than ability without experience. In no other field of service is this more clearly true than in the Congress of the United States. In addition, length of service gives one the advantage of seniority. Under the rules of the Congress, the majority-party Member who has served longest on any committee becomes the chairman of that committee.

Let me use my own State of Texas as an example of what continuous service of Members in Congress can mean. One of the finest and most beneficial traditions in Texas is that of returning her Representatives to the Congress. Much has been said in recent years of the power and prestige of the Texas delegation in the Congress. While I would not for 1 minute disparage the ability of my distinguished colleagues from Texas, I know from long years of experience and observation that such power and prestige as our delegation may possess comes more from years of service by the individual Members than from any other cause or causes. Other delegations get their effectiveness from the same source—long years of service and experience by its Members in the Congress.

In the House of Representatives we have 47 standing committees. Texas, with 21 Members in the lower House, holds 5 of these chairmanships. She is exceeded only by the Empire State of New York, which has 45 Members in the lower House and holds 6 chairmanships. Texans acquired these positions largely through years of service. SAM RAYBURN, majority leader from Texas, has served in the Congress for 27 years. HATTON SUMNERS, of Texas, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has served in the Congress for 27 years. It has been my privilege to be chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. I have served in the Congress for 23 years. JOSEPH MANSFIELD, of Texas, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, has served in the Congress for 23 years. FRITZ LANHAM, of Texas, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, has served in the Congress for 21 years. ALBERT THOMAS, of Texas, chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 3, is an exception to the rule, having served in the Congress only 4 years. Senator CONNALLY, of Texas, has served in the Congress for 23 years. Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas, has served in the Congress for 37 years. Both Senators have outstanding records and are chairmen of important Senate committees. Then, our distinguished Vice President, JOHN GARNER, of Texas, has served in the Congress for 38 years. Two Texans hold positions next to the chairmanship—LUTHER JOHNSON on Foreign Affairs and EWING THOMASON on Military Affairs. Other Texans hold high positions on major committees. These positions are held by Texans because Texas has kept these men in Congress.

The same story is true of the Nation generally.

ADOLPH J. SABATH, dean of the House and chairman of the Committee on Rules, has served 33 years. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has served 31 years. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has served 29 years; CARL VINSON, chairman of Naval Affairs, 27 years; HENRY B. STEAGALL, chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, 25 years; CLARENCE F. LEA, chairman of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 23 years; MILTON A. ROMJUE, chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads, 21 years; JOHN E. RANKIN, chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, 19 years; SOL BLOOM, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, 17 years. This is true of all the important chairmanships in the House.

These men are all highly respected and greatly beloved. Their experience in the Congress makes their services invaluable.

Before leaving the subject of seniority as a prerequisite to the important positions of committee chairman, let us note the average period of service in the Congress of the committee chairmen from other States. The six chairmen from the State of New York have served an average of 12 years; the four committee chairmen from Missouri an average of 13 years; the four committee chairmen from Illinois an average of 16 years; the three committee chairmen from North Carolina an average of 21 years; and the three committee chairmen from California have served an average period of 12 years.

I think it might be well, also, to examine some individual committees over a period of years to see how important continuous service in the Congress has been. Let us examine 4 of the most important committees of the House for a period covering the last 40 years. During the last 40 years 8 men have served the Ways and Means Committee as chairman. These 8 men have averaged serving in the Congress for a period of more than 22 years each. Their average period of service before becoming chairman of the committee was 17 years. During the last 40 years 8 men have served the Judiciary Committee as chairman. These 8 men have averaged serving in the Congress for a period of more than 18 years each. Their average period of service before becoming committee chairman was 12 years. During the last 40 years 10 men have served the Rules Committee as chairman. These 10 men have averaged serving in the Congress for a period of 25 years each. Their average period of service before becoming chairman of the committee was 18 years. During the last 40 years 12 men have served the Appropriations Committee as chairman. These 12 men have averaged serving in the Congress for a period of 22 years each. Their average period of service before becoming chairman of the committee was more than 16 years. * * *

The most able American writers on government have expressed themselves in similar vein. In James Albert Woodrum's book The American Republic and Its Government, published in 1916, we find this statement:

"The most distinguished congressional leaders are those who have sat for long terms by successive reelections."

Frederic A. Ogg and Ray P. Orman, in their able text, Introduction to American Government, in speaking of Members of the House, state:

"Nowadays it is widely conceded that the term is not too long, but too short. The average person elected to the House for the first time has no acquaintance with the assembly's methods of doing business, has had no legislative experience—except possibly in a State legislature or a city council—and has only a superficial knowledge of the public affairs with which Congress is called upon to deal. Elected for only 2 years he cannot progress far toward becoming a useful Member, much less a leader, before his term expires."

Munro, in his book, The Government of the United States, published in 1923, says:

"Seniority in service determines the chairmanship of important committees. * * * There are few walks of life in which experience counts for more than in politics. No one comes to Congress with an intuitive knowledge of what to do. The new Member is handicapped by the complexity of the rules and by a natural disinclination to push himself too far forward until he has acquired a sure footing."

While these things were true yesterday they are even more true today. While continuous service and experience were valuable in the legislative service of yesterday it is more valuable in the legislative service of today. Legislative experience becomes important in exact proportion to the expansion of business and the consequent activity of government to fit our expanded commerce. At the turn of the century most of the business and commerce of the country were within the limits of the respective States. Now much of it crosses State lines and has become a subject with which the National Government must deal.

Perhaps this increased responsibility, this growing complexity, is responsible for much of the complaint that one hears throughout the country in recent years that Congress has delegated to executive agencies too much of its power, too many of its prerogatives. Fear has been expressed that a proper balance as between the three branches of our Government no longer exists, that the system of checks and balances so wisely designed by our founding fathers is being destroyed, that the legislative branch of our Government is being dominated and controlled by the executive branch. The only way in which Congress can retain all of its powers, the only way in which it can escape domination by the executive branch of the Government, the only way in which it may serve successfully as a proper check upon the other branches of the Government is to retain at all times a large membership of experienced legislators.

A great American laid down a proper test for officeholders in a democracy as follows: Is he capable, is he honest, is he faithful to the Constitution? If a Member qualifies by this yardstick, then for all the reasons above discussed, and for many more, he should be reelected and reelected to that greatest legislative body in the world—the American Congress. [Applause.]

Under the rules governing the House of Representatives, seniority—length of continuous service—is an important factor in the opportunity for usefulness of any Member of Congress to his district, State, and the Nation.

With the exception of the last 6 days, I served as the Representative of the First Congressional District of New Hampshire throughout the three sessions of the Seventy-fifth Congress (January 5, 1937–June 9, 1938) and I am now completing my second term (January 3, 1939–January 3, 1941) as the Representative of that district.

During my tenure as a Member of Congress, I have served on the Committees on Labor, Naval Affairs, the Post Office and Post Roads, and War Claims.

The importance and prestige of the State of New Hampshire, like that of any other State, can grow and expand in the National Legislature only through the continuous and uninterrupted service of its Representatives in Congress.

The 1940 Drought Conditions in Nebraska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the Members of this House have noticed the reports in the Washington papers of the intense heat in Nebraska. I think that the Congress should know that in addition to this intense heat many communities in Nebraska are suffering from a severe drought. This is not a drought of 1 year's duration. In some instances it is the seventh consecutive crop failure due to drought conditions.

I have taken this matter up with the Administrators of the Federal Works Agency, the Surplus Marketing Administration, the Farm Security Administration, and the National Youth Administration. I have also submitted to them a memorandum briefly setting forth certain facts pertaining to the situation in Nebraska. I feel that Congress should have those facts also. I therefore wish to include in my remarks that memorandum.

GENTLEMEN: Pursuant to the conversation had with you recently I would like to submit these facts concerning the drought situation in Nebraska. I trust that it may have sympathetic consideration and that whatever is done may be done without too much delay.

The drought conditions in Nebraska are no less than terrible. It is true that there are spots that have had a fair crop this year, but many, many of the communities were faced with a complete and total crop failure. No one really knows how much actual poverty and want and distress prevails throughout the State. Three or four years ago the situation was bad, but these crop failures have been consistent. Some of these communities are now facing their seventh failure. The drought, dust storms, grasshoppers, intense heat, and in some portions floods have created hardship among the people that can no longer be borne.

Last year a number of the Nebraska counties were designated as drought-stricken counties. This year the same situation prevails and in some counties it is more pronounced.

Billions of dollars are being spent on national defense. We have no quarrel with this, but I wish to call your attention to the fact that out in the plains country of the Middle West there will be little expenditures of any great extent for national defense that will furnish employment and relieve the distress. The result is that this territory needs more assistance while some territories benefited by the defense program will need less.

The point I wish to make is that there are hundreds, yes, thousands, of families who have never been on relief that are actually hungry and in need of many things. Many of these people are too proud to let their condition be known. The most of them were during the predepression days what was known as the middle class. They have always been self-sustaining, but they are now completely without resources. Upon this so-called middle class has fallen the heaviest burden of the prolonged drought, crop failures, and depression. I appeal to you to direct some new and different attention to this group.

I believe that representatives of the various agencies should call upon the local officials in each county of the drought territory and ask their cooperation to resurvey the problem. I am satisfied that you could get fine, honest, sincere, and conscientious people who would be willing to serve on these lay committees without pay. These local committees, accompanied by representatives of your agencies, should investigate every township.

If upon investigation there are families who have never received any help whatever and need help it should be given to them. If there are wasteful people receiving help and spending money for nonessentials that situation should be corrected. I am convinced, however, that you will find the vast majority of Nebraskans honest people.

There has been criticism of relief and the administration of that relief. But all America wants the worthy destitute and poor adequately taken care of. I believe the situation in many parts of Nebraska is tragic and I feel that an effort should be made to ascertain what the need is and supply that need. I do hope that you will see fit to make use of local communities and that this problem will have your immediate attention.

Very respectfully yours,

CARL T. CURTIS, M. C.

Hon. Marvin Jones

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, in a little while we in this Congress and the American farmers are to lose one of the greatest exponents and defenders of the causes that activate American agriculture that has ever come before the American people.

At the same time the Committee on Agriculture is to lose the greatest chairman it ever had. An estimable, courteous, honorable scholar and statesman is to answer the roll in the House of Representatives for the last time.

The judiciary is about to wrap about the shoulders of our beloved friend, the gentleman from Texas, MARVIN JONES, the robe of a judge of the United States Court of Claims. Every man in this House rejoices in the honor that has come to him.

Mr. Speaker, while the legislative branch of our Government thus loses one of its most useful, trusted, and brilliant leaders, I cannot help but feel that the judicial branch is to receive one of the most beloved, impartial, dispassionate, honorable, equitable, and upstanding men who has ever been appointed to the bench of our country. I know that some day he will grace the bench of the Supreme Court itself.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter I have written to our beloved colleague from Texas, the Honorable MARVIN JONES, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of this House, expressing my own and I believe the sentiments of every Member of this body at the termination of his work among us.

God bless and keep MARVIN JONES.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 24, 1940.

The Honorable MARVIN JONES, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MARVIN: Believe me when I say that your every friend in both Houses of Congress was made happy when, sometime ago, the President summoned you to serve as judge of the Court of Claims of these United States.

Your colleagues in this House were not surprised, however, when shortly after your appointment to that high office the President saw fit to ask that you temporarily retain your seat in Congress, both to aid and direct the then-pending agricultural legislation before the House. One and all felt, as did the President, that great as are the virtues that characterized you for high office in the judiciary, still more pressing were the problems having to do with the well-being of our farmers which confronted the Congress.

It is universally conceded that nowhere in all the land was there a legislator so thoroughly grounded in the problems of the American farmers' legislation as your own good self. Much as I respect the abilities of my good friend who will succeed you as the chairman of the powerful Committee on Agriculture, I repeat with the sage of old:

"Let others hail the rising sun!
I bow to him whose work is done."

We are now fast approaching the end of the third session of the Seventy-sixth Congress. We who sit in this body realize that we are about to lose to our Committee on Agriculture and to the entire Congress the greatest chairman who ever presided over the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives.

I want you to believe that I do not speak these words out of any sense of loyalty to you, long my personal friend. Rather I would have you know that I speak them solely in truth and in candor. Moreover, I would have you know that in doing so I bespeak the sentiments and feelings of every Member of this House, sitting in all parties and on both sides of the aisle.

The manner in which you have conducted your committee, as well as your leadership on the floor, prove well that MARVIN JONES has never been a blind partisan nor blindly sectional on any question of American agriculture. Howsoever long it may be my privilege to represent my district in this body, I know I shall always treasure the friendships I made in this House. In you I found the friendship of a gallant, courteous American, a true Southern gentleman, one who will here be remembered as one of the finest, squarest, and most honorable men whose name has ever illumined the pages of the history of our country.

Even though your appointment was long since confirmed by the Senate of the United States, you have continued to serve in this House at the request of the President, and at a personal sacrifice to yourself. Happy am I to have seen you realize the goal which you set out to achieve in behalf of our farmers. We all hate to see you leave this Chamber, much as you merit the surcease from the arduous labor, as well as the high honors and higher duties to which you have been called.

Need I point the economic repercussions upon our farmers which must inevitably flow out of the bloody strife now carried on beyond the oceans which wash our every coast line? I cannot help but feel that with the exports of our surplus agricultural products further threatened by the economic, as well as political, penetration, which will surely follow the drone of bombers as they roar out of their hangars, that we will need the wisdom of your counsel more today in this Congress than ever before.

This Nation, like every other nation, is crying out for more men like MARVIN JONES. They need them to serve their people in every capacity of life. Today, as never before, we in America especially need:

"Tall men, sun crowned, who lived above the fog,
In public duty and in private thinking!
Men whom the lust of office does not kill.
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy.
Men who possess opinions and a will.
Men who have honor! Men who will not lie."

Such a man you have proven yourself on every occasion. In all the years you have walked among us, you have taught us, not by words alone, but by deeds and in action, that we were but the servants of our people, their representatives here in Congress to do their every bidding, and solely for the common good.

The world knows full well, that the door of your office has been, ever and always, open to men of every political faith, creed, or opinion. Patient, tolerant, and always helpful, it has made little difference to you whether the one who came to seek your help was a black, who farmed a few acres of cotton in the forks of our Alabama creeks, or the accredited representative of a militant organized American agriculture.

Your colleagues in this House have long known that to you, farming is but a principle of living—a mode of life. We further know that your duty in this Congress, as you saw it, has always been to the dirt-root farmers of America. Your accomplishments, in behalf of American agriculture, will forever stand as living symbols of your devotion to their cause.

Through all the years that will come, you will be remembered in every little cabin in the cotton of our great Southland. In the great cornfields of the Mississippi Valley they know you for your indefatigable labors. The fruits of those labors will long be reflected in the happiness and the greater abundance that will come to those who harvest the grain on the far-flung prairies of our great western country.

Your name, standing there as a pillar of cloud by day, and of fire by night, will be spoken every hour of each succeeding day by every man who gains his livelihood from the soil.

As a result of your agricultural leadership, our farmers have won a long list of notable victories. Among these were the fight for the conservation of our soils, the achievement of a parity of price to our farmers, and the reduction in the rates of interest on farm loans. Your never-ending battle for reduced freight rates on agricultural commodities, your struggle to liberate, if not eradicate, the blight of the currently obnoxious system of tenancy and sharecropping, your struggle for the establishment of the regional laboratories to find new uses for our surplus agricultural products, these and a score of other beneficencies achieved in behalf of American agriculture have pointed the way to a new life to the people of our farm sides.

Though you step out of the legislative to assume your new duties in the judicial branch of our Government, you will long be remembered in this Chamber for your gracious manner, your kindly counsel, your wisdom, justice, equity, square dealing, and innate sense of decency. These have endeared you to your every colleague.

Be assured, friend MARVIN, that we are going to miss you mightily. The little office, where you long burned the midnight oil, is going to miss you. Your committee and your every colleague is going to miss your leadership.

When the sun goes down on that last day you sit with us in regular session, and when, with your accustomed books and papers under your arm, we see you walk down the little path leading from the Nation's Capitol to the House Office Building, every Member of this Congress, Republican and Democrat alike, will say in truth:

"Before God, there walks a man."

I am hoping, however, MARVIN, that you will come back often, not only to give us your advice, but to have you near will be an inspiration to work harder and do more, not only for the farmers, but for all of the people of this Nation.

That God may bless and keep you, now and always, is the sincere wish of Your friend and admirer.

Chattanooga Honors Mayor Ed Bass Upon His Completion of 25 Years of Service to His City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, during these turbulent and changing times, it is so infrequent that an official of a sizable and expanding city renders 25 years of continuous service and after that time is honored by his fellow citizens, that I feel an occasion of this kind is worthy of recognition in the official record of Congress. This is the case of Hon. Ed Bass, the mayor of Chattanooga.

During this 25 years Chattanooga has grown from a city of 65,000 to one of more than twice that population. There have been many bitter issues and sharp disputes during these 25 years. At times substantial groups of citizens have complained that Mayor Bass was not progressive enough. At other times citizens have complained that he was too progressive. The fact that Mayor Bass has survived politically, and has stayed in the public eye, and has now been paid a spontaneous tribute by the citizens of his city, speaks highly of his efficiency, honesty, and diligence as a public servant. During all these controversial years no one has questioned the integrity and ability of Chattanooga's mayor.

In an address of response to the hundreds of Chattanoogans who met to honor him on the start of the twenty-sixth consecutive year in the city's service, Mayor Bass said, "It is a proud moment to receive an honored trust, but it is a prouder moment to have those who trust you tell you that you have kept the faith." This is indeed an attitude and position that men in public life should attempt to deserve, and it would be a happy moment in the life of any public official to be able to make this statement after 25 consecutive years of public service. The Chattanooga papers all carried tributes to the mayor on their editorial page. I ask unanimous consent to include herein a short statement appearing in the Hamilton County Herald, published by Hon. Will Shepherd, which succinctly describes Chattanooga's tribute to its honored and distinguished mayor.

BEAUTIFUL TRIBUTE TO MAYOR ED BASS

(By Will Shepherd)

It's mighty nice when a man serves in public office over a course of 25 years and upon such an anniversary to witness an extemporaneous outpouring of his people eager to do him honor. That was exactly Mayor Bass' experience Wednesday noon at the Patten Hotel when well over 300 of his friends, all of a single mind and accord, assembled themselves together for the purpose of paying him honor. It was indeed an extemporaneous and voluntary outburst of admiration and respect that the citizenship of this city paid to its faithful servant, after a service of a quarter of a century. The affair was unique in its character. The announcement was merely made that the chamber of commerce proposed to sponsor a luncheon in honor of Mayor Bass upon the completion of his twenty-fifth year as a city official. That, and nothing more; no effort was made to ballyhoo a great crowd. Luncheon tickets were placed on sale at the Patten and at the chamber of commerce, which is the usual and regular routine for such affairs. The people responded far beyond the expectations of the chamber of commerce. All seats in the ballroom of the hotel were quickly taken. The luncheon crowd overflowed to the red room and filled that space, and even many people who desired to have a part in the commemoration were turned away and failed to even get into the room.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

ARTICLE BY R. E. PRESCOTT

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in one of the small towns of my district there lives a man named R. E. Prescott. He owns, publishes, and edits the Alcona County Herald. This publication serves the need of the lively little town of Lincoln, Mich., and the people of the surrounding countryside. Its editorial column is quoted freely by great metropolitan newspapers.

Mr. Prescott, who writes under the pseudonym "Peck," is not only an editor. He is also poet, philosopher, and historian. He is a disciple of Isaac Walton. He loves the lakes and the streams of the country in which he lives. He deliberately buried a highly successful newspaper and literary career because he loved the great out-of-doors and the denizens thereof. He is a keen student and analyst of world affairs, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including herewith an editorial by this distinguished gentleman.

AS WE SEE IT UP IN THE STICKS—WILL HISTORY REPEAT?

(By "Peck")

Again the war lords come to grips and grim destruction rages to write a tragic paragraph in history of the ages. Steel monsters belch forth flame and shell, death's wings the air lanes scour, and thousands die to gratify inhuman lust for power.

And fleeing helplessly before the dread invaders' might go women, children, aged folks. Unbroken day and night an endless stream flows ceaselessly, bowed down in fear and sorrow. Death's hordes pursuing them today, hope vanished for the morrow.

Shell pits, bestrewed with war's debris, in valley and on hill. Stark, mangled corpses dot the land, the grist of war god's mill. Red smoking ruins mark the sites of city and of town. The light of reason flickers out and darkness settles down. Unbridled passion reigns unchecked, by dogs of war released, the only law the ethics of the vicious jungle beast, and groans of dying mingle with exultant victors' cheers, as Mars sets back the hand of time at least a thousand years.

Do times like these which try men's souls, and all but hope is gone, portend the end or are they but the dark before the dawn? Will gains humanity has made be held as heritages, providing peace and happiness for those of future ages? Must human freedom's cause succumb to reign of blood and steel and peoples writhe in slavery beneath dictator's heel?

On Flanders' field white crosses stand and crimson poppies grow where brave men fought and died in vain two short decades ago. Again upon old battlefields the tramp of marching feet awakens echoes of the past. Will history repeat, and light of liberty emerge from darkness of the night and through deep carnage and travail defeat brute force and might?—R. E. Prescott in Detroit Free Press.

Never in the history of the United States has the Fourth of July held more significance than in the year of our Lord 1940.

A quarter of a century ago, after an election in which the slogan "He kept us out of war" was a deciding factor, we allowed ourselves to be shanghaied into a European conflict to "make the world safe for democracy."

Slogans may win elections. They don't win wars.

For our altruism then we were repaid with thousands of white crosses on foreign battlefields, thousands of blinded, maimed, and crippled veterans, a pension roll of millions of dollars yearly, the repudiation of billions of dollars in foreign loans, and the bitter enmity of all—foes and allies alike.

Will history repeat?

During the past few months we have seen governmental policy shift from determined neutrality to active participation in everything but the actual hostilities on European battlefields; we have heard an ambassador openly advocate war and as Chief Executive assume the prerogatives of Congress and promise, at present, everything but soldiers to the Allies.

Meanwhile propaganda machines and high Government officials have worked overtime to create a war hysteria. So far has this gone that Senator WHEELER, stalwart Democrat though he is, threatens withdrawal from his party.

And those who counsel calmness and caution are branded as "fifth columnists" and Nazi sympathizers.

A vast majority of the people of the United States are in sympathy with the Allied cause and approve of giving them every material aid; a vast majority favor, at whatever sacrifice it may entail, the expenditure of any amount of money necessary to make this country so strong on land, sea, and in the air that no nation or combination of nations will dare to invade it. This is shown by national surveys of public opinion.

But, whatever their sympathies, a vast majority of the people are opposed to the militarizing of American manpower and resources except in the defense of American homes on American soil, and are unalterably opposed to sending our youth abroad as sacrifices to the imbecility of a European diplomacy which permitted, unopposed, the building of the Frankenstein monster which now threatens their destruction.

With the so-called democratic nations of Europe crumbling one by one under the merciless wheels of the totalitarian Juggernaut; with hotbeds of nazi-ism, fascism, communism, and other foreign "isms" openly flourishing in other nations of this hemisphere, and only thinly veiled in this country, thanks to tacit if not open encouragement by the Government; with the national debt already exceeding constitutional limitations, and much of this huge debt contracted in profligate spending upon nebulous social experiments and the building of a political empire, and deficit financing, even for peacetime needs, the accepted method of operation; with war more than a possibility and the country's defenses—neglected while we chased social rainbows in a madly rearming world—tragically inadequate—not what we have "on order," but what we have—this country needs practical, cool heads and steady hands at the helm of the ship of state if we are to remain solvent and stay out of war.

And, facing bitter facts, we haven't got them—now.

The National Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

LETTER FROM NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter signed jointly by the President of the National Guard Association of the United States and the President of the Adjutant Generals' Association of the United States, and sent to the Honorable Henry L. Stimson under date of July 9, 1940. The National Guard is an important component of the Army of the United States. The members of the National Guard deserve great credit for preparing themselves for filling the important place as a part of our first line of defense. It is to be regretted that any reports in any way reflecting upon the Guard should have been circulated. The letter gives the lie to such reports, and reassures us as to the condition of readiness and willingness of the National Guard to do whatever may be imposed upon it in our national-defense program. The letter follows:

NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., July 9, 1940.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It has come to the attention of the executive council and legislative committee of the National Guard Association of the United States and the executive committee of the Adjutants General Association of the United States, assembled in executive session this date in Washington, that many unfounded, false, and malicious reports have been circulated concerning the state of mind and readiness of the National Guard to take its proper place in accordance with its purpose, its oath, and its desire.

Deliberate misrepresentations, savoring of "fifth column" activities, as to the attitude of the officers and men of the National Guard toward emergency plans for the defense of this country have been made.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding on your part or in the minds of the people of the United States, or the National Congress, or in any other agencies concerned, as to the attitude of the National Guard, the aforementioned organizations representing the National Guard of the United States do here state in the most emphatic manner possible that the National Guard stands ready and willing to enter into the service of the United States, as provided in the National Defense Act, today, tomorrow, or at any time the President of the United States sees fit to use the National Guard in the defense of this country.

The National Guard does here and now reaffirm its traditional position on matters pertaining to national defense and desires to pledge to you and the War Department its fullest and most complete cooperation for the development and training of the land forces of the United States, of which it is a component, to meet the emergency that now confronts our country and our people.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER A. DELAMATER,
Brigadier General, New York, President, National Guard Association of the United States.

CHAS. H. GRAHL,
Brigadier General, Iowa, President, Adjutants General Association of the United States.

Alaska Legislation in Seventy-sixth Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, it now appears plain that Congress will remain in session for a considerable length of time. Matters now before this body vitally affecting the national defense require thorough consideration and will probably result in legislation.

Accordingly, although this session of Congress is evidently not nearing its end, it seems desirable to make a statement of the legislation enacted or considered by the Seventy-sixth Congress having particular reference to the Territory of Alaska.

Since March 4, 1933, I have enjoyed the high honor of representing the people of the Territory of Alaska in the House of Representatives. Recently I made an examination of the records of the several Congresses in which I have served as to legislation for Alaska. I find that since March 4, 1933, Congress has enacted 106 special laws concerning Alaska, covering a wide range of subjects. This list does not, of course, include general laws of Congress concerning the States as well as the Territory of Alaska, from which Alaska has largely benefited, such as the several rivers and harbors and flood-control acts which resulted in so much good to the Territory, and the general appropriation acts, both regular and emergency, in which Alaska has shared with the rest of the Nation.

During the present Seventy-sixth Congress there have been enacted 16 individual bills for Alaska, a list of which follows:

INVESTIGATION OF ALASKA FISHERIES

House Resolution 162 provides for an investigation of the fisheries of Alaska. That investigation, which was a thorough one, considering limitations of time, has already resulted in distinct benefit to the fishermen and the fishing industry of Alaska, and there is promise for additional benefits in the future.

RIVER-BOAT EMPLOYEES OF THE ALASKA RAILROAD

H. R. 2178 amends the Alaska Railroad Retirement Act by providing retirement compensation for those employees of the Alaska Railroad who are employed on the river boats, owned and operated by the Alaska Railroad, thus granting retirement rights to a number of deserving employees of the railroad. Public Law No. 320.

KETCHIKAN WATER SUPPLY

H. R. 2413 places in reserve the water-supply basin or area of the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, thus protecting it from contamination. Public Law No. 240.

ALASKA RAILROAD RETIREMENT

H. R. 2642 amends the Alaska Railroad Retirement Act by providing for designation of beneficiaries. Public Law No. 323.

POWERBOAT SERVICE ALONG ALASKA PENINSULA

H. R. 2748 (S. 882) makes special provision for powerboat service along the Alaska Peninsula between Seward and Unalaska and thence to Bristol Bay and Good News Bay by enabling the Postmaster General to require that the boat carrying mail be also of sufficient capacity to transport a reasonable number of passengers and a reasonable amount of freight. The purpose of the bill was to take care of a very serious condition arising from the award of a mail contract to a small boat which was not large enough to take care of passenger and freight traffic. After the enactment of the bill Congress appropriated $125,000 for the purpose and it is anticipated that the improved service will be put into operation at an early date, thus furnishing facilities for needed transportation to the residents of the Alaska Peninsula, Aleutian Islands, Bristol Bay, and Good News Bay area. Public Law No. 363.

SALE OF TIMBER ON SCHOOL LANDS

H. R. 3025 provides authority for the sale of the timber and mineral products on school lands in Alaska. Public Law No. 314.

RIGHT-OF-WAY THROUGH CHILKOOT BARRACKS

H. R. 3795 grants a right-of-way for a pipe line through Chilkoot Barracks for distributing oil needed for the town of Haines, Alaska. Public Law No. 348.

ALASKA TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE

H. R. 4776 does three things: (1) Changes the date of meeting of the Alaska Territorial Legislature from the second to the fourth Monday in January of each odd-numbered year; (2) authorizes special sessions of the legislature to continue in session 30 days instead of 15 days as heretofore; and (3) authorizes the Governor to call such special sessions of the legislature upon 15 days' notice instead of 30 days' as formerly, and also authorizes that notice of such special session shall be given by telegram or radiogram, as well as by letter or other writing. Public Law No. 457.

REFUND OF BONDED MUNICIPAL INDEBTEDNESS

H. R. 5919 authorizes the cities of Alaska to refund their bonded indebtedness and thus secure the benefit of lower rates of interest. The city of Juneau has already taken advantage of this act and refunded certain of its bonded indebtedness on such advantageous terms that the interest savings alone will over the course of years equal the total amount of the indebtedness thus refunded. Public Law No. 403.

POSTMASTERS TO ADMINISTER OATHS

H. R. 6114 authorizes postmasters in Alaska to administer oaths in certain cases. This legislation is of great advantage in the more thinly settled parts of Alaska where notaries public or other officers authorized to administer oaths are not available. Public Law No. 294.

TRANSFER OF FUNDS TO TOWN OF WRANGELL

H. R. 7612 authorizes the transfer from fund "C" of the District Court of the First Judicial Division of the Territory of Alaska of the sum of $6,092.76 to the town of Wrangell. Under the Federal tax laws applying in Alaska certain taxes collected within any incorporated town or city are paid into the treasury of such town or city and is therefor available for use by the town or city for municipal purposes. However, in the event the taxpayer fails to pay the tax due there is no provision in the law for the collection of the tax, but the law provides instead that the taxpayer may be indicted and tried in a criminal action for nonpayment of the tax and, if convicted, the fine imposed shall be equal to the amount of the tax. However, the fine so imposed does not go to the town treasury where it would go if paid as a tax, but is instead paid into fund "C" of the district court. A certain fish-packing company situated in the town of Wrangell failed to pay its license tax in the amount mentioned and was thereupon convicted in the district court for nonpayment of the tax and a fine in that amount was imposed upon the company, which it thereafter paid to the district court. Justice and equity required that the money be transferred to the town of Wrangell in lieu of the unpaid tax. Hence, the legislation. Public Law No. 458.

PAYMENT OF FUNDS COLLECTED BY DISTRICT COURTS FOR NONPAYMENT OF LICENSE TAXES

H. R. 7634 (S. 3491) is a general law to cover such conditions as are described above with respect to H. R. 7612 and authorizes in every such case that the funds paid into the district courts as fines in criminal cases for nonpayment of license taxes shall be paid to the several towns or cities of Alaska, to which such taxes are due. Public Law No. 618.

CLERICAL EMPLOYEES OF THE ALASKA RAILROAD

H. R. 8046. When the Alaska Railroad Retirement Act was passed the clerical employees were exempt from the retirement benefits thereof and were given instead the benefits of the Civil Service Retirement Act. That led to confusion and by the bill, H. R. 8046, all of the Alaska Railroad employees, including the clerical employees, are now enjoying the superior advantages of the Alaska Railroad Retirement Act. Public Law No. 680.

EXEMPTION OF TROLLERS FROM WEEKLY CLOSED SEASON

H. R. 8172. This act exempts trollers of Alaska from the provisions of the weekly closed season. Trollers by reason of the very nature of their work are obliged to be absent from the fishing grounds for at least 36 hours a week in any event, a period equal to the weekly closed season. Moreover, they are frequently off the fishing grounds for days at a time on account of weather conditions. The application of the weekly closed season compelled all trollers to be in port between 6 o'clock Saturday night and 6 o'clock Monday morning. This led to congestion and much inconvenience and served no useful purpose. By the provisions of H. R. 8172, they are now exempt from the weekly closed season provisions of the law, but the Secretary of the Interior still has the authority by regulation to declare and enforce any closed seasons which may be necessary for conservation of salmon. Public Law No. 709.

PREVAILING RATE OF WAGES

H. R. 9021 (S. 3650). This bill extends to Alaska the provisions of the Davis-Bacon Act requiring that the prevailing rate of wages be paid on all public works in the territories of Alaska and Hawaii. Public Law No. 633.

R. O. T. C. AT UNIVERSITY OF ALASKA

H. R. 9391 authorizes the formation and training of a Reserve Officers' Training Corps infantry unit at the University of Alaska with a minimum of 50 members instead of a minimum of 100 members as required by general law. The bill supports the program for national defense by permitting the University of Alaska to participate in the training of Reserve officers. Public Law No. 714.

EXEMPTION OF SMALL BOATS FROM CREW-REQUIREMENTS TREATY

H. R. 2641. This bill was not enacted but an almost identical bill introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, Representative AMBROSE J. KENNEDY, was passed instead. Under a treaty known as Draft Convention No. 53, all vessels, unless exempted by local law, were required to carry licensed captains, mates, engineers, and assistant engineers. The treaty, however, further provided that any country might by law exempt from the provisions of the treaty vessels under 200 tons. It would be obviously impossible to require every small fishing vessel to carry a licensed captain, mate, engineer, and assistant engineer and, therefore, the passage of the legislation mentioned was necessary. I am listing this among the Alaska bills passed because it is so vital to the welfare of the fishermen of Alaska and because of the fact that I introduced and urged for passage one of the several similar bills covering the same subject. It is not included, however, in the total number of bills enacted during the Seventy-sixth Congress for Alaska only.

OTHER LEGISLATION PENDING

A number of other bills especially affecting Alaska are now pending before Congress and it is hoped to secure passage of many, if not all, of them before Congress adjourns. A list of such bills follows:

VALIDATION OF MATANUSKA HOMESTEADS

H. R. 3695 is a bill to validate certain sections in the Matanuska Valley reserved by law for school purposes and the reservation instead of other unsettled sections. In 1934 when the Matanuska Valley farm settlement was established, several school sections were settled upon by oversight. The land has now been cleared and houses built and it would be obviously a hardship to require the settlers to move to new land. There is ample land in the Matanuska Valley which can be reserved for school purposes in place of the tracts upon which settlement has so been made. This bill passed the House on July 31, 1939.

ADDITIONAL LAND FOR MATANUSKA VALLEY SETTLERS

H. R. 6658 is a bill authorizing the assignment to settlers in Matanuska Valley of additional tracts of land. In the beginning these settlers were limited to 40 acres each. This has been found to be insufficient and it is now desired to grant them additional land. This bill passed the House on February 7, 1940.

RESERVES FOR CEMETERIES

H. R. 7252 is a bill to authorize reservation of small tracts of land for cemeteries in Alaska. This bill also passed the House on February 7, 1940.

AMENDMENT OF ALASKA GAME LAW

H. R. 8474 seeks an amendment to the Alaska game law in one particular only. At the present time the Alaska game law under certain conditions permits the taking of game animals and birds out of season by Indians, Eskimos, prospectors, or travelers when in absolute need of food and other food is not available. Complaint has been made that natives, under the law as written, cannot take a game animal or bird out of season for food if they have any food whatever on hand, no matter how small the quantity may be. While such a construction of the law is not reasonable, one remedy is to amend the law by striking out the word "absolute" so that the law will permit the taking of game animals or birds out of season by Indians, Eskimos, prospectors, or travelers when they are in need of food and no other sufficient food is available, and that is being attempted by the bill. The bill has been favorably reported in the House by the House Committee on Territories.

SLUM CLEARANCE AND LOW-COST HOUSING

H. R. 8884 (S. 3686). This is a bill to permit the Territory of Alaska to create an authority for slum clearance and low-cost housing. It would permit Alaska to participate in the United States housing program. The United States Housing Act includes the Territories as well as the States but, under our Organic Act, the Territorial Legislature has no power to create an authority to engage in slum clearance and low-cost housing and, therefore, Alaska cannot at present obtain the benefits of the United States Housing Act. The bill has passed the Senate and is now pending in the House, having been favorably reported to the House by the House Committee on the Territories.

PETERSBURG WATER SUPPLY

H. R. 9173. The purpose of this bill is to reserve from settlement the water-supply basin which furnishes water to the town of Petersburg and thus prevent possible contamination of the water-supply source of that town. It is identical in purpose and similar in context to the bill which was passed for the protection of the water supply of the city of Ketchikan.

SITKA PUBLIC UTILITIES

H. R. 9571 (S. 3940) seeks to authorize the town of Sitka to purchase, improve, and extend certain public utilities, namely, the electric-current plant and water-supply system, and for that purpose to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $200,000 in addition to its present indebtedness. Identical bills have been favorably reported by House and Senate committees and are now pending on the House and Senate calendars. Barring unforeseen difficulties the bill should be passed at an early date.

OTHER PROPOSED LEGISLATION

The bills above listed do not, of course, include all of the bills which I have introduced and the passage of which I have urged for the benefit of Alaska. Some of them and particularly those seeking larger powers of self-government for Alaska with respect to the fisheries and to the fur and game, the bill H. R. 3368, which looks to the abolition of all fish traps in Alaska, the several bills, H. R. 7987, H. R. 7988, and H. R. 8115, which seek to prevent discrimination against the employment of Alaskans in the fisheries of the Territory, and the bill, H. R. 7542, the object of which is to prohibit the seizure of boats and gear of fishermen for alleged violation of law unless and until the owners or operators of the boats and gear are convicted in court for the criminal offense involved, are among the most important of the measures proposed for Alaska. Only one of these several bills has been favorably reported by a committee of Congress and, the outlook for passage of any of them at this session of Congress is not favorable. One bill, namely, H. R. 7542, concerning forfeiture of boats and gear, passed the House by unanimous consent but was to all intents and purposes killed in the Senate upon the adverse report of the Secretary of the Interior, who asked that consideration of the subject matter of the bill be delayed for this year so that the Department of the Interior, which had recently been assigned supervision of the fisheries of Alaska under one of the reorganization orders, might gain further experience in the administration of the Alaska fisheries before any such legislation should be attempted. The subject of another bill, H. R. 3024, to prohibit in southeastern Alaska the conversion of herring into oil, meal, or fertilizer has been taken care of by regulation.

The work of the Delegate from Alaska not only embraces the enactment of desirable legislation but also the defeat of measures proposed by others which are inimical to the welfare of Alaska. A part of my time in the past 2 years has been devoted to the latter type of activity. Well-intentioned people who do not understand the Territory frequently desire to have legislation enacted which may be superficially attractive but in the long run would do Alaska infinite harm. At the moment I can recall three such legislative measures, which, if enacted, would have been harmful to the Territory, the passage of which I have been able to prevent.

One is the bill for the protection of the bald eagle, doubtless a highly desirable piece of legislation for the States but not desirable for Alaska where, unless the number of eagles is kept down, they will destroy many young foxes and thus add to the burdens and difficulties of the Alaska fox ranchers. But by suitable opposition to having Alaska included in this legislation the Territory was exempted and the law as passed does not apply to Alaska.

The second measure to which I refer is that wherein it was sought to withdraw from entry, with certain exceptions, all lands lying within 80 rods of navigable or other waters of Alaska and to empower the Secretary of the Interior to lease such lands on such terms as he might deem appropriate for periods not to exceed 20 years. The passage of this bill would, in my judgment, have done much to slow up the settlement and development of Alaska, for no sensible man would care to make any considerable investment of funds on lands held only by such a lease as the bill sought to authorize. By opposing this bill vigorously it was possible to prevent even its consideration by the House Committee on Public Lands, to which it was referred.

The third legislative proposal that I have in mind in this connection is the very attractive one which was designed for the development of Alaska by the settlement therein of European refugees who were to be admitted to the United States for that purpose over and above the present quota restrictions. It was called a bill for the development of Alaska, although it might more accurately have been called a bill for the relief of some of the persecuted peoples of Europe. Acting, I believe, in harmony with the overwhelming sentiment of the people of Alaska, I felt obliged to oppose the bill because it would have established in Alaska a unique class of alien residents who would have been authorized and encouraged to settle and live in Alaska but who would have been barred from entry into the States unless they should become citizens of the United States at some indefinite future time. Under this plan Alaska would have taken on some of the aspects of a concentration camp. While there was a chance that the Territory would gain substantially under the bill proposed, there was an absolute certainty that thereby Alaska would have been set off from the United States and a barrier erected between the Territory and the States. Hearings were had on one of the measures introduced before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, but up to this time no report has been made by that subcommittee to the full committee and so I think it probable that no further action will be taken on the measure at this session of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the question has several times been asked as to the expenditures of the Federal Government in Alaska and particularly the extent of the national defense program in the Territory. From several appropriation bills and from other sources of information I have compiled a list of the principal appropriations and allocations for Alaska made during the Seventy-sixth Congress. That list is as follows:

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES IN ALASKA

The following is a list of the principal appropriations and allocations for Alaska made by the United States Government for the 2 fiscal years commencing July 1, 1939, and to end July 1, 1941, and embracing appropriations made by the Seventy-sixth Congress. In some instances, such as with respect to emergency funds, where no exact or separate appropriations are made for use in Alaska during any fiscal year, or where complete data are not available at this time, the figures cover expenditures for 1939 and 1940. Many of the smaller items, which would probably aggregate several hundred thousand dollars, have not been included. Nor have there been included the anticipated appropriations of $109,000 for a small boat harbor at Sitka and $70,000 for harbor improvements at Kodiak.

Rivers and harbors and flood control:
Juneau small-boat harbor	$232,000
Valdez small-boat harbor	68,000
Skagway harbor and flood improvement	105,000
Nome safety-harbor improvement	185,624
Lowell Creek (Seward) flood control	197,000
Tanana River-Chena Slough flood control	565,000
Fire prevention on public lands	64,500
Bureau of Fisheries	649,860
Game conservation and administration	285,798
Natives of Alaska, schools, hospitals, etc	3,176,420
Purchase of reindeer, etc	795,000
U. S. Geological Survey	120,000
Roads outside of national forests	1,130,000
Roads in national forests	968,000
Care of insane	411,880
Post Office Department—Excess of expenditures above receipts (estimated)	1,600,000
Civilian Conservation Corps	1,595,283
Works Progress Administration	476,170
Department of Justice, courts, etc	1,133,187
Public Works Administration—Grants (loans $748,864)	903,189
Agricultural experiment station work	48,750
Agricultural Extension Service	45,336
Legislative expenses	50,000
Alaska railroad-retirement and disability fund	175,000
Forest Service	261,780
Coast and Geodetic Survey vessel for Alaska	1,425,000
Treasury Department (approximate)	1,827,393
National defense:
Sitka Navy air base	2,900,000
Kodiak Navy air base	8,750,000
Kodiak Navy air base	2,012,000
Unalaska Navy air base	2,963,000
Fairbanks Army air station	4,000,000
Anchorage Army air base	12,104,060
Anchorage military post	6,379,225
Alaska gas and bomb storage construction	630,000
Land purchase, Anchorage	85,000
Total	58,318,455

At least a fair beginning has been made upon the construction of national-defense works and facilities in Alaska. No one who really grasps the importance of Alaska in the national-defense program will say that nothing more will be required. In fact, much more will be required and among that "much more" is the construction of a number of air fields and the long-proposed highway to Alaska. Before the present national emergency arose, the construction of the highway to Alaska was most desirable for economic reasons intimately relating to the development of the Territory. The present recognized need of adequate defense for Alaska makes the building of the international highway of the greatest consequence as a part of the national-defense program. In the event that our fleet is obliged to go to the Atlantic and we thus lose control of the Pacific to some hostile force, with a highway from the States to the Territory we would still have available an overland route to supply our defense forces in Alaska, as well as the civilian population.

Aside from considerations of national defense, as well as a part of the national-defense set-up, roads and air fields are needed for Alaska. An internal system of roads and a comprehensive system of air fields would do much for the development of the Territory and much to increase its population. The complete program for Alaska that I continue to advocate is the construction of such a system of roads and air fields within the Territory and the immediate building of the highway to connect the United States with Alaska. If that plan is carried out there will never be any occasion to invite, or urge, or stimulate the settlement of Alaska for, with travel facilities available, plenty and plenty of our citizens will come to the Territory to reside permanently.

Selective Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 29, 1940

LETTER AND STATEMENT BY ALBERT W. JOHNSON

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, because of illness and death in my immediate family I have been unable to give my personal attention to an important letter and statement which have been received in my office. If it had been possible I should have asked that they be entered in the hearings held by the Committee on Military Affairs on universal compulsory military training. I now ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from Judge Albert W. Johnson, together with a statement he has prepared on the necessity for universal compulsory military training in the United States. This statement represents Mr. Johnson's views on this subject, and I present the statement at this time merely because I was not able to present it during the hearings.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES COURTS,
MIDDLE DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Lewisburg, Pa., July 17, 1940.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS:
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR DAVIS: I enclose herewith copy of my article on universal compulsory military training. This, as you will notice, is somewhat comprehensive in covering all or most of the reasons in favor of such training. These reasons have been stated from time to time separately or partially but I have never seen a statement or argument containing all the reasons combined. Many of the very best reasons for such training are frequently or generally overlooked, and I felt it my duty to write them out in a somewhat logical and connected order.

I should like to have this article read into the record of the Committee on Military Affairs having now for consideration the Burke-Wadsworth bill now pending before Congress. Will you please see that this is read before the committee and placed upon the record. I was in the committee room when I was in Washington a few days ago and I noticed different witnesses, men and women, reading their testimony or statements before the committee and having them placed on the record.

If you think I should come down and read this personally and give any ideas in connection therewith, I shall be pleased to do it. This is a time when we must express ourselves and let whatever light we have shine and not keep it under a bushel.

I am not sending a copy of this article at the present time to the committee but I will let you handle it and will follow your suggestion. If you think I should send a copy directly to the committee with an offer to testify, I will do it. I might state to you that in mingling with the people, I find they are almost, if not entirely, unanimous for universal compulsory military training.

Sincerely yours,

ALBERT W. JOHNSON.

THE NECESSITY FOR UNIVERSAL COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING IN THE UNITED STATES

(By Albert W. Johnson, United States district judge, Lewisburg, Pa.)

Our Nation should at once pass a law providing for universal compulsory military training for all our young men who will be ready to be called out at once when necessary to protect our country, that in the future we may be prepared to defend ourselves and not be required to depend upon the armies and fleets of other nations for our protection. During the short life of our great Nation we have been engaged in six great wars—the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, and the World War—18 years in all, one-ninth of our national life, not to count all minor wars, all of which have been unnecessarily costly in blood and treasure on account of the lack of preparation.

We must establish at once an efficient, well-equipped, and powerful army and air force superior to any nation or combination of nations that might attack us and a navy in the Atlantic and also a navy in the Pacific, each superior to any combination against it in either ocean. This is necessary not only in time of peace but also in time of war.

We are now experiencing a world revolution with conflicting ideas of government and civilization. Dictatorial and tyrannical governments are attacking and overcoming free democratic governments. This conflict will continue beyond actual hostilities. All of the autocratic governments are hostile to our democratic government.

The British Empire, now fighting for its existence, is now the only great surviving democracy outside of the United States. If this democracy is destroyed, the United States will stand alone in the midst of a world in arms.

Our democratic form of government is the best in the world, the dream of the ages, a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. One of the chief purposes of our Constitution in establishing the Federal Government was to provide for the common defense. If this Republic is to continue, it must function with the highest efficiency and be able to defend itself against all the world.

I speak from personal knowledge and experience. I have associated from childhood with soldiers from the Civil War on both sides. I followed closely the Boer War in South Africa, the Spanish-American War, the Russian-Japanese War, and the great World War. My father was a member of the Union Army at the age of 17. Two of my sons were in the World War in France, one at the age of 16, and one, a second lieutenant in the Battle of the Argonne; my son-in-law, Carl A. Schug, one of the finest young men I have ever known, was a first lieutenant in the Seventy-seventh American Division, one of the first on the battlefields of France, twice seriously wounded in action, who, after a short but brilliant career as district attorney and lawyer, died as a result of his wounds. Of my 11 children, 8 are boys, all fit mentally, morally, and physically for military service, and 6 are now of sufficient age. The other two, 12 and 14, will soon be old enough for service.

Universal compulsory military training is necessary for the welfare and safety of our Nation. It is necessary for the citizen personally, necessary for the general welfare, and necessary for our national defense.

Such a system and training will create strong and healthy citizens, one of the primary objects of good government. Strong, healthy citizens make a strong, healthy government. This training will teach the citizen to care for his body. If he has any physical defects, they will be discovered and corrected. Good health will not only be preserved during the period of his life as a soldier, but throughout his life as a citizen. In this correction and maintenance of health, the benefit of military training to the Government will be worth more than all the cost.

Military training teaches the citizen efficiency. In the Army everything must be done in order and by plan that there may be the highest accomplishment. The efficiency which the citizen thus acquires will benefit him all through life.

Such training teaches discipline, necessary for success in life. No individual can be strong mentally, morally, or physically without discipline. There can be no successful leadership without it. The discipline that will be acquired through military training will be worth more to our people and the country than all its cost.

This military training will come to many young men at a period in life when they are completing their education. It will supplement their education and occupy millions of young men at a period when many of them may be idle and out of work.

This training will be of tremendous good for our whole country. It will lead to the unity of our people. Where disloyalty arises through ignorance, the citizens will be instructed; where it arises from loyalty to other countries, such disposition will be discovered and corrected.

This military training will increase patriotism. Service of our country inspires patriotism. All will learn more about our country as they are preparing to defend it and thus when they know our country better they will love it more.

Such training is democratic; it will apply to all alike. If our Nation is to live, all must defend it. The fact that we have not always had such service is no argument against our having it now when we need it.

Such universal compulsory military training is necessary now and will likely continue to be necessary in the future for national defense. We cannot depend any longer on the volunteer system. The experience of the last few months proves the inadequacy of that system alone. We must have a large and powerful Army, Navy, and air force. It will require many soldiers adequately trained to equip these three departments and we cannot secure numbers sufficiently large by the volunteer system to meet the demands. This has been seen throughout the history of our Nation.

This universal military training will tend to prevent war. The Nations of Europe and the east are not convinced by argument and right but only by power and force. With our citizens trained and prepared, there will be little danger of war. The present war in Europe resulted because Germany knew that England and France were unprepared. But if war comes our Nation will be invincible. With such training there is not a nation in the world or any combination of nations that can defeat us or destroy our democracy and our liberty. Well-trained American soldiers are equal or superior to the best in the world, but they must be well trained and well equipped. The bravest soldiers in the world untrained and unequipped cannot stand against inferior soldiers well trained, disciplined, and in possession of the best equipment.

Universal military training will save blood and treasure if war comes. Military experts testify to this fact, and all the history of our Nation establishes it.

We are not only beneficiaries of this great democracy, having inherited it from our ancestors who established it at a great cost, but we are trustees to hand it on to our descendants and to all the world. We have no right to take a chance with our country. It is our duty to labor and sacrifice to secure it beyond all doubt.

In conclusion, preparation by universal military training will develop the highest character of citizen, promote the best interests of our common country, and secure its sure defense. In this way we will be more sure that government of the people, by the people, and for the people will not perish from this earth.

Selective Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 29, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR CAPPER, OF KANSAS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address broadcast by me on July 28 on the subject, First Peacetime Conscription Bill in American History.

The Burke-Wadsworth bill, which is soon to be taken up in the Senate, and which I have discussed in this address, sets up the first peacetime-conscription program in the history of our country. I think we should, by all means, give the voluntary system of securing enlistments a fair trial for 1 year before we adopt a compulsory military training program.

The proposed conscription bill seems to have the enthusiastic approval of the Army high command, but I find strong opposition among people of all classes in the State from which I come. They believe, and I believe, that this conscription program will lead us closer all the time to the European war.

I am for an adequate Army and Navy to fight off any aggressive nation, but I do not believe we want the Hitler system of organizing for war.

The people want this country to remain a democracy. I find a growing feeling that compulsory regimentation has no place and can never form a part of a true democracy.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIRST PEACETIME CONSCRIPTION LAW IN AMERICAN HISTORY

Friends in the radio audience, one of the most fundamental and far-reaching changes in the American way of life is coming up for consideration in the Senate within a few days.

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs is reporting favorably a bill, known as the Burke-Wadsworth bill, providing conscription of men for military service in time of peace.

Under the proposal at least a million of our young men each year will be drafted into military service for a year.

Back of this bill, which is written to meet what is declared to be a present emergency, there is a drive to make universal military training for all our youth permanently a part of our governmental system.

My friends, I would be willing to vote for conscription of manpower for national defense if and when this Nation goes to war to defend our own national interests, but conscription in peacetime is another thing. I will admit that when the large number of men required to wage a modern war are needed, the only fair and equitable way to raise the large army is by the selective draft.

But when that is done I insist that wealth also must be drafted. I am opposed, even in wartime, to drafting men without also drafting money.

By the way, it is interesting to know what great men in the past have thought about some of the things that are perplexing us in these days. One of the great American statesmen of all time was Daniel Webster. Upon one occasion he was discussing conscription generally. And Webster declared that government had a much greater right to conscript profits than to conscript lives.

Naturally those who have money and property as a rule are more anxious to conscript the lives of boys than to conscript profits. I am inclined to go along with Daniel Webster on this question.

Incidentally the Senate Finance Committee, of which I am a member, will meet tomorrow to consider a measure providing for levying additional excess-profits taxes to meet the expenditure of some eighteen or twenty billion dollars for the national-defense program, and I think we will do the job this time. I hope we do. I think the collection of an excess-profits tax is the fairest way to help pay the cost of national defense. I am opposed to creating several thousand "war millionaires" out of the national-defense program, whether we go to war or just prepare ourselves against going to war.

But that is aside from the main question now presented to Congress and to the country.

Shall the United States abandon its traditional policy of 150 years; shall we take away the personal freedom of our young men and adopt the policy of militaristic continental Europe and adopt military conscription?

Very frankly, I do not like the idea. It is repugnant to me. It smacks too much of the Hitler doctrine that men are mere vassals of the state—which means, under such a system, mere vassals of the dictator who runs the state. It is a step backward toward barbarism, as I see it.

I, for one, do not propose to vote for conscription for military service unless it is proved to me beyond all reasonable doubt that there is no other way of building up an adequate national defense, and I am not yet convinced that such is the case.

Suppose we try to meet this situation as calmly as the present disturbed state of the world will permit. Setting aside for the moment the consideration of personal liberty involved and our feelings against compulsory military service, and even passing over for the moment the disturbance a year or 2 years of military service would create in the lives of young men in school, young men holding their first jobs, young men who may be trying to get a start in business for themselves.

Laying aside all these considerations, let us consider the necessity in peacetime for military conscription in the United States, because, if it is absolutely necessary for preservation of our Government, then, of course, the other arguments fade into insignificance. In an emergency things that are necessary to be done must be done, no matter what the cost.

Today a number of proposals are being made about increasing the size of our Army. Congress has provided for an Army of 375,000 men. Army heads have told a House committee that they consider an Army of 1,200,000 men an immediate necessity.

The first plan calls merely for a numerical increase in the size of the Regular Army, an increase which The Adjutant General, Maj. Gen. Emory S. Adams—a Kansas man, by the way—has written Senator VANDENBERG, can be obtained by the recruiting service as at present organized.

The other might call for a basic change in structure of our defense forces—in fact, a fundamental change in our democracy. It is in line with this that the drive for conscription is being pressed at the present time.

In support of conscription there are cries that our system of voluntary enlistments has broken down. But there are no proofs in fact that the system of voluntary enlistments has failed. General Adams says that the Regular Army can be increased to 375,000 men by voluntary enlistments in 5 months' time.

It does seem to me also that if the period of enlistment were dropped from 3 years to 1 year, or even cut to 2 years, that it would be easier than ever before to get voluntary enlistments. Many a young man would enlist for a year who would hesitate to sign away 3 years of his life. I say we ought to try to fill our requirements, whatever they may be, by voluntary enlistments.

Now I will not deny that if the traditional and personal freedom method of filling the ranks of the Army by voluntary enlistment fails, and we have to raise the larger army, then we will be forced to go to compulsory military service.

But I do not see where voluntary enlistments have failed. Nor am I entirely satisfied that every effort has been made to speed enlistments. Most of the Army heads believe in compulsory service and might not be averse to having the voluntary system proved a failure.

It might be not amiss to remember that some 22 years ago 1,300,000 voluntary enlistments in the United States Army were made up until voluntary enlistments were stopped in August 1918.

I repeat, let's have it proved that we cannot enlist an army by the voluntary method in peacetime before we rush into compulsory conscription.

I have received a number of letters opposing military conscription. Supt. J. W. Murphy, of the Augusta City Schools of our State, says:

"It seems to me we can find a better way to get ready for any invasion that might occur without taking young men who have jobs and are just beginning their careers. Universal compulsory military training has been the curse of the Old World nations which have adopted it and will be the curse of the United States if we follow the example of these dictator-ruled nations of Europe."

"Compulsory military training is the extreme of tyranny and the destruction of individual liberty," says Superintendent Murphy. I think he is about right.

And I get this expression from the Reverend Walter Lee Taylor, of the Presbytery of Neosho, Fredonia, Kans.:

"The forcible seizure and militarizing of men in peacetime is simply not the democratic way of building up the true strength of democracy. It will make those who love democracy distrust the Government; it will make those who cherish the right to life and liberty fear the Government; it will make those who fearlessly adhere to the principle of freedom of conscience hate the Government as they would an alien enemy."

"Moreover, the passage of this bill," he says, "is unnecessary as it calls for a peacetime army of 2,000,000 men, which is three times the number Army officials have declared would be needed for the defense of the country. There is no justification for the passage of this bill unless our Government is secretly planning to invade a foreign country."

And I also want to quote this very sensible statement in a letter I received today from a sound businessman and patriotic citizen, R. W. McLeod, vice president and cashier of the First National Bank, of Smith Center, Kans.:

"If you have read Hitler's Mein Kampf you will notice in the Nazi platform set forth in this book 25 articles, 11 of which already are employed in the United States, and if compulsory military conscription is permitted to pass that will be the twelfth.

"This brings us to military conscription. I do not believe there is a loyal American," says Mr. McLeod, "who would hesitate to sanction conscription in time of need. While there is considerable hysteria at the present time, I do not believe that the House and Senate of the United States should lose their heads and vote conscription in time of peace. Above all, if the Army needs enlarging, they could at least raise the pay of a soldier to equal that of the W. P. A. laborer, and no doubt the Army would have more men in 2 months than they could have any need of."

And I get this statement of the case from Arthur W. Calhoun, of Sterling, Kans.:

"It is time for a stand on behalf of some elementary human rights. If liberty and democracy can be saved only by killing them in advance, then the dictators are the people that have the answer and there is nothing to be done about it."

And this comes to me from the Reverend Robert W. Scott, of the First Presbyterian Church, Coffeyville, Kans.:

"Such a bill makes a totalitarian state of our country, giving dictatorial powers to the Government. This is un-American.

"Above all times should we now think clearly and cautiously lest in the very emotion of thinking we are saving liberty and freedom we use conscription and make this a Fascist nation, giving the Government an iron hand, and put on our children a burden they never will be free from."

Now, the quotations I have just read, my friends, are typical of hundreds of letters I am getting, protesting against passage of the conscription bill.

And now I would call your attention to the following petition presented this week to the Senate from the Committee of One Million—it has 1,000,000 signers so far—and I quote:

"We, the undersigned, join with the mothers of America in petitioning the Congress of the United States to exert every effort possible, and within reason, necessary to keep America out of all foreign wars.

"We favor a national defense second to none; we are willing to make any sacrifice necessary in money and men to defend America, but we, the undersigned, are opposed to giving our money and our men to settle the political quarrels of foreign nations."

I say tonight to my Kansas friends that petition has my 100-percent approval. I will not vote to send American boys to fight in foreign wars.

And, in closing, I quote the statement of principles of this Committee of One Million:

"1. To rebuild the spirit of America.

"2. To wipe out to the last vestige communism and fascism in all its forms.

"3. To redefine the American national character.

"4. To instill a new spirit in American youth, dedicated intellectually and physically to the maintenance of American institutions.

"5. To issue a call to farmers and laborers to resist what is now known to be an international plot to make them part of a world revolution.

"6. To rededicate the citizenry of America to the family altar and to the spirit of the church.

"7. To secure the maintenance of a well-defined standard of American living."

And now, in closing, my friends, tell me what you think Congress should do on this military conscription bill.

ARTICLES FROM THE PORTLAND OREGONIAN

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, the people of my section of the country are unusually fortunate in having on the Republican ticket, as candidate for Vice President, a westerner who knows the West and who has represented the best interests of the West during many years here in the United States Senate. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two unusually fine articles from the Portland Oregonian by Richard L. Neuberger on Senator CHARLES MCNARY.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg.]

MCNARY IS STRONG IN THE NORTHWEST—WILLKIE'S RUNNING MATE HAS MANAGED TO REMAIN SENATOR IN DEMOCRATIC TERRITORY—CHAMPION OF THE FARMER

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

SALEM, OREG., July 6.—The nomination of sandy-haired CHARLES LINZA MCNARY, 66-year-old senior Senator from Oregon, for Vice President of the United States has animated Republicans in this part of the country. They believe a strong Democratic trend is about to be reversed. Not since 1928 has a Republican national ticket won a single electoral vote in the 11 States which comprise the area from the Rocky Mountain States westward.

Senator MCNARY's presence on the 1940 ticket is relied upon to end this Democratic sovereignty. The Vice-Presidential nominee has long been known in the West as a champion of increased farm relief, Government power and irrigation projects, peace, and high tariffs. He has occupied his seat in the Senate for 23 years, the longest tenure of any present Member of Congress from the Pacific Northwest. When Gov. Charles A. Sprague, of Oregon, endorsed Wendell L. Willkie at the start of the Republican National Convention, he stipulated that Mr. Willkie's running mate should by all means be a "progressive." This was interpreted to refer to Senator MCNARY, who has supported many of the New Deal's social and economic reforms.

Public ownership of electric power plants is a critical issue in this region, and new dealers were prepared to unlimber a heavy attack on the record of Mr. Willkie as a utility executive. The addition of Senator MCNARY to the ticket has complicated this strategy because he has been active in promoting the Columbia River power development program, having been the principal sponsor of the $75,000,000 Bonneville Dam.

WILLKIE CHOSE HIM

Democrats now are contending that Senator MCNARY was put on the slate to "camouflage" Mr. Willkie. Republicans, on the other hand, maintain that the inclusion of Senator MCNARY demonstrated that Mr. Willkie is not as "prejudiced" on the power question as his adversaries would make out. Friends of Senator MCNARY in Oregon say he was Mr. Willkie's personal choice for second place on the ticket.

The selection of Senator MCNARY has certain obvious advantages in the West. This section of America, at least until lately, has inclined toward isolation with respect to foreign affairs. It has approved such vast Federal hydroelectric projects as Boulder, Bonneville, Fort Peck, and Grand Coulee. And lumber companies and lumber workers have heatedly denounced Secretary Hull's trade treaties.

On all these points, Senator MCNARY is believed to agree with western sentiment more than does Mr. Willkie. The Presidential nominee has been sympathetic with many phases of the trade program, although Senator MCNARY has insisted it is damaging both agriculture and the lumber industry. Senator MCNARY opposed repeal of the arms embargo, whereas Mr. Willkie has favored aid short of war for the enemies of Hitler.

Senator MCNARY's greatest following is among farmers. He is a farmer himself and lives on the Willamette Valley ranch where he was born in 1874. He is one of the country's most successful raisers of filberts.

LOYAL TO SENATOR

Independent voters have usually decided elections in the West, and many of these people are adherents of Senator MCNARY. Whether the Republican Party has been in sickness or in health, he has survived personally. He has had absolute loyalty from the rural areas ever since he sponsored the McNary-Haugen farm debenture bill 15 years ago. Plans at present are that Senator McNARY shall be notified formally of his nomination at his farm, 6 miles north of Salem.

Some observers in the Pacific Northwest contend that Senator McNARY's acceptance of the Vice-Presidential nomination is an indication that President Roosevelt has decided not to run. They base their argument on several facts, chief among which is the friendship between the Republicans' Senate leader and the President. They insist that Senator McNARY would not have consented to run had he thought the fortunes of war would pit him against a ticket headed by Mr. Roosevelt.

MCNARY FOLLOWS WASHINGTON AND JEFFERSON IN HOME CHOICE WITH "FIR CONE," NEAR SALEM, TYPICAL COUNTRY BEAUTY SPOT

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

SALEM, July 13.—Homes in the green countryside are in the American tradition for distinguished men in public life. Washington had Mount Vernon; Thomas Jefferson conceived the idea for the Declaration of Independence at Monticello; and Andrew Jackson owed fealty to the Hermitage.

This custom has endured. In contemporary times, President Roosevelt returns often to Hyde Park; Justice Owen Roberts, of the Supreme Court, has a farm in Pennsylvania; Senator BURTON K. WHEELER owns a retreat in Glacier National Park; and CHARLES LINZA MCNARY, senior Senator from Oregon and Republican nominee for Vice President of the United States, is almost boyishly proud of his 300-acre farm, Fir Cone.

TEN CHILDREN IN FAMILY

A few miles from Salem, on the Mission Bottom Road, is a mail box with the legend "CHARLES L. MCNARY, route 2, box 90." This marks the entrance to Fir Cone, the place the Senator's pioneering grandfather, James McNary, homesteaded 95 years ago. It was a dense wilderness when the frontiersman staked it out. With him was his 9-year-old son, Hugh Linza McNary, who later married Margaret Claggett, the daughter of Charles Claggett, who drove an ox team across the plains in 1850.

Hugh McNary and Margaret Claggett had 10 children, and one of them was CHARLES LINZA MCNARY, today the master of Fir Cone, where he was born 66 years ago. When Congress adjourns in the summer Fir Cone draws the Senator like a magnet. The bustle and rush of the National Capital have little appeal for him and he is impatient to get home. He told Wendell Willkie this week that Fir Cone is "the finest farm in the United States of America."

The principal crops at Fir Cone are filberts, walnuts, and prunes. MCNARY was one of the first men in the country to raise filberts on any scale. The bulk of the crop is sold to wholesale groceries in Portland. The farm has always been modestly successful financially. Neighboring farmers come to Fir Cone to get pointers. The Senator developed the Imperial prune, which is now the largest prune on the market.

FIR CONE ESTATE

Senator MCNARY takes an active interest in the operating of the ranch, talking over things frequently with his foreman, Ben Peterson. Ben, a Norwegian, has been working for MCNARY for 13 years. He lives in a farmhouse just across the road from Fir Cone, and shares with the Senator the hope that the visitors at the nomination notification ceremony "will not trample down the trees and bushes."

Fir Cone is an estate as well as a farm. Approximately 200 acres are in orchards. The rest is made up complexly. There is an arboretum, in which MCNARY has collected tree specimens from all over the Nation. Some day he may deed this to the State of Oregon. In a dense grove is a tennis court, and not far from the court is a rolling green where the Senator practices his putting and niblick shots.

M'NARY BEAN COOKER

Claggett Creek, named for Senator MCNARY's maternal grandfather, gurgles through the farm. Rainbow trout lie in its reaches. A lonely stump near the creek is cherished in the memory of the Senator, for from it his best friend, the late Senator Jim Couzens, multimillionaire New Deal Republican from Michigan, caught his first fish. Jim Couzens, on his visits to the West, used to say there was no place as picturesque or restful as Fir Cone.

The white-shingled bungalow at Fir Cone, built in 1926 at a cost of around $6,000, is low and rambling in typical frontier style. The big living room, 18 by 24 feet, is dominated by a huge fireplace. In it usually hangs a big iron kettle, in which Senator MCNARY likes to cook beans. He mixes the beans himself, putting in pork and molasses, and then ladles out the dish to his visitors.

Bookcases around the room hold innumerable volumes, many of them about Oregon history. On the table are some of the books Senator MCNARY has been reading recently—Hamilton and Jefferson, by Claude G. Bowers; Since Yesterday, by Frederick L. Allen; Our Times, by Mark Sullivan; and (aloud to Charlotte), The Sunbonnet Babies.

Miss Charlotte McNary, the adopted daughter of Senator and Mrs. McNary, is 5 years old. She and the Senator's wife escaped from the heat and commotion of Washington several weeks ago and came home ahead of the Senator. When her father asked her on the long-distance telephone what she thought of his nomination she replied, with political judiciousness, "I love you no matter what you are, daddy, and I love my pony, too."

The pony's name is "Dandy," and Charlotte rides him all over Fir Cone. He is tethered near her playhouse, which is in back of the bungalow. The playhouse was designed for her by David Lynn, Official Architect of the American Capitol Building. She and her small friends romp in the sand pile near-by, where they bury filbert nuts and then have a magnificent time digging for them.

Mrs. McNary, the former Cornelia Morton, of Chicago, is a descendant of Horace Greeley. She believes her ancestor had the right idea about going west, and she thinks Oregon in general and Fir Cone in particular are unparalleled. Mrs. McNary's father, Maj. Bruce Morton, served on the staff of Gen. Nelson Appleton Miles, the great Indian fighter. A picture of the general is on the living-room table at Fir Cone.

Fir Cone has developed into something of a show place since its squire became a candidate for the Vice Presidency, but it is essentially what James McNary long ago planned it to be—a home. He is fond of the clubby atmosphere of the United States Senate, despite his dislike of Washington, but among places Fir Cone is his first love. He has even registered the name Fir Cone with the copyright office.

EDITORIAL FROM NEW ORLEANS ITEM-TRIBUNE

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the New Orleans Item-Tribune entitled "Valedictory to James A. Farley."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Orleans Item-Tribune]

VALEDICTORY TO JAMES A. FARLEY

James A. Farley will step down as chairman of the Democratic National Committee and resign as Postmaster General, on August 17. His retirement will be followed by emotions on the part of his fellow countrymen very different from those which greeted his entrance 8 years ago.

He was known then only as a New York politician with some ability for organization. He is recognized now as the possessor of talent for organization that amounts to genius not surpassed in American politics. And he is known as a grand guy, a first-rate fighting man, and a supremely good sport.

In the past 8 years the Postmaster General has weathered many a storm. Known contemptuously as the Jobmaster, he made himself a whipping boy to take the beatings for the Roosevelt administration, while the PHD's brain trust looked down their noses at him.

Big Jim bore it all with smiling equanimity. And he learned from experience. He got to know all parts of the United States and their ways of feeling and thinking as few New Yorkers have ever known them. The country came to know him as an upstanding, straight-shooting man, upon whose word men could confidently rely. All Democrats, and hosts of others, came not only to trust this big, bald, New Yorker, but to have real affection for him.

You could have no greater proof that the boy from Grassy Point had made good than a party given for him when the Chicago convention was over. Cynicism is part of the armor of most newspaper folks. Nowhere in the fraternity is it burnished more brightly than among those correspondents who "cover" Washington. Yet these cynics were hosts at a farewell testimonial to Farley where feeling was so genuine and unrestrained that, in the words of the New York World-Telegram, it "brought mist to eyes long dry."

As Mr. Farley quits the political arena many will probably remember Tenniel's great cartoon, Dropping the Pilot. It depicted the young Kaiser Wilhelm II, watching over the rail of the ship, Germania, while the great Bismarck went down the ladder to a small boat waiting to carry him away.

Much has been said already, and more will be, about "the doctrine of indispensability." Some persons may wonder, before the present political drama reaches its climax, if the new dealers managing Mr. Roosevelt's campaign won't discover that Mr. Farley was "the indispensable man," too.

Still others, contemplating the greatly heightened stature of this simple, honest man, will reflect that character is the one thing without which other gifts of the gods are valueless. We salute the passing pilot in words borrowed from James Whitcomb Riley:

"Well, good-bye, Jim; take keer of yourself."

BILLS AND ACTS RESULTING IN CREATION OF PARK

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, recently some question has arisen about the authorship of the measures establishing the Great Smoky Mountains National Park in Tennessee and North Carolina. In order that there may be no further question about it, I have gathered together the several bills and acts of Congress which resulted in the creation of the park. I desire to have this material placed in the RECORD in the order marked. Also a copy of a letter I have written the Honorable Frank Maloney, Knoxville, Tenn., is attached.

I ask permission to have all this material printed in the Appendix of the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[In the Senate of the United States, January 2 (calendar day, January 3), 1925, Mr. Swanson introduced the following bill, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys]

A bill (S. 3835, 68th Cong., 2d sess.) relative to the acquirement of a national park, to be known as Shenandoah National Park

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to determine the boundaries and area of such portion of the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia lying east of the South Fork of the Shenandoah River and between Front Royal on the north and Waynesboro on the south as may be recommended by him to be acquired and administered as a national park, to be known as the Shenandoah National Park, and to receive definite offers of donations of lands and moneys, and to secure such options as in his judgment may be considered reasonable and just for the purchase of lands within said boundaries, and to report to Congress thereon: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act appoint a commission of five members, composed of a representative of the Interior Department and four national-park experts, said four members to serve without compensation.

SEC. 2. A sum sufficient to secure options and to pay the necessary expenses of the commission in carrying out the provisions of this act, including the salary of one clerk to the commission at a rate not to exceed $2,000 per annum, necessary traveling expenses of the members of the commission and $10 per diem in lieu of subsistence, in all not to exceed $10,000, is hereby authorized to be appropriated.

[In the Senate of the United States January 26, 1925, Mr. McKELLAR introduced the following bill, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys]

A bill (S. 4081, 68th Cong., 2d sess.) relative to the acquirement of a national park, to be known as Smoky Mountain National Park

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to determine the boundaries and area of such lands in the Smoky Mountains situated (1) in Johnson, Carter, Unicoi, Washington, Greene, Cocke, Sevier, Blount, Monroe, and Polk Counties, in the State of Tennessee; and (2) in Cherokee, Graham, Swain, Haywood, Madison, Yancy, Mitchell, Watauga, and Ashe Counties, in the State of North Carolina, as may be recommended by him to be acquired and administered as a national park to be known as Smoky Mountain National Park, and to receive definite offers of donations of land and money and to secure such options as may, in his judgment, be considered reasonable and just for the purchase of lands within said boundaries to be established by him and to report to Congress thereon: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, appoint a commission of five members, composed of a representative of the Interior Department and four national park experts, said four members to serve without compensation.

SEC. 2. A sum sufficient to secure options and to pay the necessary expenses of the commission in carrying out the provisions of this act, including the salary of one clerk to the commission at a rate not to exceed $2,000 per annum, necessary traveling expenses of the members of the commission, and $10 per diem in lieu of subsistence, in all not to exceed $10,000, is hereby authorized to be appropriated.

[In the Senate of the United States, January 26 (calendar day, January 27), 1925, Mr. Swanson and Mr. McKELLAR introduced the following bill, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. February 3, (calendar day, February 5), 1925, reported by Mr. Ladd, without amendment]

A bill (S. 4109, 68th Cong., 2d sess.) relative to the acquirement of national parks, to be known as Shenandoah National Park and Smoky Mountain National Park

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to determine the boundaries and area of such portion of the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia lying east of the South Fork of the Shenandoah River and between Front Royal on the north and Waynesboro on the south as may be recommended by him to be acquired and administered as a national park, to be known as the Shenandoah National Park, and to receive definite offers of donations of land and moneys, and to secure such options as in his judgment may be considered reasonable and just for the purchase of lands within said boundaries, and to report to Congress thereon.

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby further authorized and directed to determine the boundaries and area of such lands in the Smoky Mountains situated (1) in Johnson, Carter, Unicoi, Washington, Greene, Cocke, Sevier, Blount, Monroe, and Polk Counties, in the State of Tennessee; and (2) in Cherokee, Graham, Swain, Haywood, Madison, Yancey, Mitchell, Watauga, and Ashe Counties, in the State of North Carolina, as may be recommended by him to be acquired and administered as a national park, to be known as Smoky Mountain National Park, and to receive definite offers of donations of land and money and to secure such options as may, in his judgment, be considered reasonable and just for the purchase of lands within said boundaries to be established by him, and to report to Congress thereon. The Secretary of the Interior may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, appoint a commission of five members, composed of a representative of the Interior Department and four national-park experts, said four members to serve without compensation.

SEC. 2. A sum sufficient to secure options and to pay the necessary expenses of the commission in carrying out the provisions of this act, including the salary of one clerk to the commission at a rate not to exceed $2,000 per annum, necessary traveling expenses of the members of the commission, and $10 per diem in lieu of subsistence, in all not to exceed $15,000, is hereby authorized to be appropriated.

[In the Senate of the United States, February 3 (calendar day, February 5), 1925, referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and ordered to be printed]

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Simmons to the bill (S. 4109) relative to the acquirement of national parks, to be known as Shenandoah National Park and Smoky Mountain National Park, viz: On page 2, line 12, following the word "Watauga", insert the following: "Avery, Caldwell, Burke."

[Public—No. 437—68th Cong.—S. 4109]

An act to provide for the securing of lands in the southern Appalachian Mountains and in the Mammoth Cave regions of Kentucky for perpetual preservation as national parks

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to determine the boundaries and area of such portion of the Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia lying east of the South Fork of the Shenandoah River and between Front Royal on the north and Waynesboro on the south as may be recommended by him to be acquired and administered as a national park, to be known as the Shenandoah National Park, and such portion of the Smoky Mountains lying in Tennessee and North Carolina as may be recommended by him to be acquired and administered as a national park, to be known as the Smoky Mountains National Park, and in the Mammoth Cave regions of Kentucky and also such other lands in the southern Appalachian Mountains as in his judgment should be acquired and administered as national parks, and to receive definite offers of donations of lands and moneys, and to secure such options as in his judgment may be considered reasonable and just for the purchase of lands within said boundaries, and to report to Congress thereon: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, appoint a commission of five members, composed of a representative of the Interior Department, and four national park experts, said four members to serve without compensation.

SEC. 2. A sum sufficient to secure options and to pay the necessary expenses of the commission in carrying out the provisions of this act, including the salary of one clerk to the commission at a rate not to exceed $2,000 per annum, necessary traveling expenses of the members of the commission, and $10 per diem in lieu of actual cost of subsistence, in all, not to exceed $20,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated.

Approved, February 21, 1925.

[In the Senate of the United States, April 19 (calendar day, April 23), 1926, Mr. Swanson (for himself and Mr. Glass, Mr. Simmons, Mr. Overman, Mr. McKellar, and Mr. Tyson) introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys]

A bill (S. 4073, 69th Cong., 1st sess.) to provide for the establishment of the Shenandoah National Park in the State of Virginia and the Great Smoky Mountain National Park in the States of North Carolina and Tennessee, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That when title to lands within the areas hereinafter referred to shall have been vested in the United States in fee simple there shall be, and are hereby, established, dedicated, and set apart as public parks for the benefit and enjoyment of the people, the tract of land in the Blue Ridge, in the State of Virginia, being approximately 521,000 acres recommended by the Secretary of the Interior in his report of April 14, 1926, which area, or any part or parts thereof as may be accepted on behalf of the United States in accordance with the provisions hereof, shall be known as the Shenandoah National Park; and the tract of land in the Great Smoky Mountains in the States of North Carolina and Tennessee being approximately 704,000 acres, recommended by the Secretary of the Interior in his report of April 14, 1926, which area, or any part or parts thereof as may be accepted on behalf of the United States in accordance with the provisions hereof, shall be known as the Great Smoky Mountains National Park; Provided, That the United States shall not purchase by appropriation of public moneys any land within the aforesaid areas, but that such lands shall be secured by the United States only by public or private donation.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to accept as hereinafter provided on behalf of the United States title to the lands referred to in the previous section hereof and to be purchased with the $1,200,000 which has been subscribed by the State of Virginia and the Shenandoah National Park Association of Virginia and with other contributions for the purchase of lands in the Shenandoah National Park area, and with the $1,066,693 which has been subscribed by the State of Tennessee and the Great Smoky Mountains Conservation Association and by the Great Smoky Mountains (Incorporated) (North Carolina) and with other contributions for the purchase of lands in the Great Smoky Mountains National Park area.

SEC. 3. That the administration, protection, and development of the aforesaid parks shall be exercised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior by the National Park Service, subject to the provisions of the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes," as amended: Provided, That the provisions of the Act approved June 10, 1920, known as the Federal Water Power Act, shall not apply to these parks: And provided further, That the minimum area to be administered and protected by the National Park Service shall be for the Shenandoah National Park area 250,000 acres and for the Great Smoky Mountains National Park area 300,000 acres: Provided further, That no general development of either of these areas shall be undertaken until a major portion of the remainder in such area shall have been accepted by said Secretary.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Interior may for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act employ the commission authorized by the act approved February 21, 1925.

[Public—No. 268—69th Cong.—S. 4073]

An act to provide for the establishment of the Shenandoah National Park in the State of Virginia and the Great Smoky Mountain National Park in the States of North Carolina and Tennessee, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That when title to lands within the areas hereinafter referred to shall have been vested in the United States in fee simple there shall be, and are hereby, established, dedicated, and set apart as public parks for the benefit and enjoyment of the people the tract of land in the Blue Ridge, in the State of Virginia, being approximately 521,000 acres, recommended by the Secretary of the Interior in his report of April 14, 1926, which area, or any part or parts thereof as may be accepted on behalf of the United States in accordance with the provisions hereof, shall be known as the Shenandoah National Park; and the tract of land in the Great Smoky Mountains in the States of North Carolina and Tennessee, being approximately 704,000 acres, recommended by the Secretary of the Interior in his report of April 14, 1926, which area, or any part or parts thereof as may be accepted on behalf of the United States in accordance with the provisions hereof, shall be known as the Great Smoky Mountains National Park: Provided, That the United States shall not purchase by appropriation of public moneys any land within the aforesaid areas, but that such lands shall be secured by the United States only by public or private donation.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to accept as hereinafter provided on behalf of the United States title to the lands referred to in the previous section hereof and to be purchased with the $1,200,000 which has been subscribed by the State of Virginia and the Shenandoah National Park Association of Virginia and with other contributions for the purchase of lands in the Shenandoah National Park area, and with the $1,066,693 which has been subscribed by the State of Tennessee and the Great Smoky Mountains Conservation Association and by the Great Smoky Mountains, Inc., N. C., and with other contributions for the purchase of lands in the Great Smoky Mountains National Park area.

SEC. 3. That the administration, protection, and development of the aforesaid parks shall be exercised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior by the National Park Service, subject to the provisions of the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes," as amended: Provided, That the provisions of the act approved June 10, 1920, known as the Federal Water Power Act, shall not apply to these parks: And provided further, That the minimum area to be administered and protected by the National Park Service shall be for the Shenandoah National Park area, 250,000 acres, and for the Great Smoky Mountains National Park area, 150,000 acres: Provided further, That no general development of either of these areas shall be undertaken until a major portion of the remainder in such area shall have been accepted by said Secretary.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Interior may for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act employ the Commission authorized by the act approved February 21, 1925.

Approved May 22, 1926.

JULY 23, 1940.

HON. FRANK MALONEY,
516 State Street, Knoxville, Tenn.

DEAR GENERAL MALONEY: Upon my return from Chicago I find your letter of July 11.

In order that there may not be any further controversy about the matter, I have examined the records and am enclosing herewith copies of same. I am enclosing photostatic copies of the records, listing them in their order:

1. Senator Swanson's bill, introduced January 3, 1925, to establish the Shenandoah Park in Virginia.

2. Senator MCKELLAR's bill, introduced January 26, 1925, to establish the Great Smoky Mountains National Park in Tennessee and North Carolina.

3. The bill of Senators Swanson and McKellar, introduced January 27, 1925, to establish both parks at the same time and to establish a park at Mammoth Cave, Ky.

4. Copy of the bill itself as it passed the Senate and the House and as it was approved by the President, dated February 21, 1925.

5. A bill introduced by Senator Swanson on behalf of himself, Senator Glass, Senator Simmons, Senator Overman, Senator McKellar, and Senator Tyson, dated April 23, 1926, for the further establishment of the park, approved May 22, 1926, nearly a year after the joint McKellar and Swanson bill had been approved.

6. The act approved May 22, 1926, based on such bill.

It is thus seen by indisputable proof from the records that I alone introduced the first bill for the creation of the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, and that a little later Senator Swanson and I joined in a bill to establish both parks in one bill; and that bill, with some amendments, became the law on February 25, 1925. I challenge anyone to find a bill introduced or passed prior to that time.

There was a reason why I introduced the bill individually at the time. That reason was the refusal of Senators Shields, Simmons, and Overman to join me in introducing the bill, although I asked them to do so, on the ground that they believed the bill was unconstitutional. A year later, after much work had been done to carry out the provisions of the original bill, Senators Simmons and Overman changed their minds. Senator Tyson had become a Senator, and a joint bill including the Senators from Virginia, the Senators from Tennessee, and the Senators from North Carolina was introduced and became the law, as shown by the bill approved May 22, 1926.

The Great Smoky Mountains National Park could not have been established, except by Federal enactment, and, as you see, this was done under a bill originally proposed by me.

The reason Senator Swanson and I introduced a joint bill after previously having introduced individual bills was this: We found, after careful investigation, that if these bills were taken up separately we could not get them passed in the Senate, but at the same time we found that if we consolidated the measures and put them all in one bill we would not have great trouble in passing the combined bill in the Senate. Senator Swanson and I being practical and experienced legislators, we joined our forces and established all three parks.

Since that time every measure concerning the park, insofar as I can recall, and I know every appropriation for the park, has been passed at my instance. Why the people of east Tennessee should question these facts I do not know, and especially why you, by reference to a portion of the record, should undertake to deprive me of the authorship, I am certainly unable to understand. In the last few years a number of gentlemen have claimed credit for the establishment of the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, as you know. The foregoing constitute the facts.

I never did a more unselfish piece of work in my life than I did in establishing this park. There were these beautiful mountains which I thought could be turned into one of the most wonderful parks in the world. If anyone ever wrote me about it or suggested it to me I do not now recall it. I thought I could do my State, and especially east Tennessee, a great public service by taking the course I have uniformly taken concerning the park. For nearly 15 years I have seen constant publications in the two Knoxville papers in which authorship of the park was claimed for other people. I did not believe that people generally believed any such statements, I supposed it was political opposition which caused these statements to be made, and insofar as I now know this is the first published claim I have ever made concerning the authorship of the bills which established these parks.

But when you, Chairman of the Great Smoky Mountains Regional Planning Commission, write me as you have definitely asserting that my authorship of the establishment of the park is not only questioned but you undertake to disprove it, I am forced to publish the facts. I sought only to do my State a service. Knoxville is the greatest beneficiary of the park, but all parts of the State, especially east Tennessee, are beneficiaries of these acts. Insofar as I can recall, I have never received a work of thanks from anyone concerning the park. On the contrary, I have seen published time and time again the fiercest criticism of me in connection with the park and statements of claims made by others as to their authorship of this great public undertaking.

It will be remembered that the legislature of Tennessee, on April 10, 1925, some 2 or 3 months after the passage of the McKellar bill in Congress creating the Great Smoky Mountains National Park passed a bill providing for the incorporation of corporations for park purposes and authorizing the acquisition of lands for public-park purposes. This bill was approved by Governor Peay on April 10, 1925. On the same date, April 10, 1925, the legislature passed a bill authorizing the Tennessee State Park and Forestry Commission to buy from the Little River Lumber Co. 76,507 acres of the lands now within the Great Smoky Mountains National Park. This act also authorized the lands thus purchased to be turned over to the United States of America for national-park purposes. This bill was approved by Governor Peay on the same day, April 10, 1925. The purpose of these two acts was to take advantage of the act of Congress, introduced and passed by me, providing for the Great Smoky Mountains National Park.

Frankly, General Maloney, I thought every informed man in the State knew how the Great Smoky Mountains National Park was established.

As to the bill you mention in your letter of July 11, H. R. 9464, concerning which I was never consulted, I shall be glad to look into the matter and see what can be done. If there is any reasonable expectation that you and your friends will be able to buy the right-of-way of which you speak, I shall be very happy to help you in the enterprise if we can find the money here for the construction of the road.

With kind regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

Connecticut Slovak Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 29, 1940

ADDRESS BY EDWARD J. BEHUNCIK AND RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY SLOVAK ALLIANCE OF BRIDGEPORT AND VICINITY, INC.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a patriotic address delivered by Hon. Edward J. Behuncik on the occasion of Connecticut Slovak Day held at Bridgeport, Conn., on July 7, and that following the address of Mr. Behuncik there be published resolutions adopted on that occasion.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Your excellency, Bishop O'Brien, Reverend Fathers Hon. Senator Maloney, Hon. Mayor McLevy, distinguished guests, and fellow Americans of Slovak birth and descent, today we meet as we have in the last 4 years, to celebrate Slovak Day. Our program follows the general pattern of past years.

But because of world conditions and because we wish our position made known to all the purpose of today's festival differs from that of previous celebrations.

We had used this happy and joyful day of recreation to show our fellow Americans that we still respected and held dear the memory and traditions of our native and ancestral land even while we were good American citizens.

Today we likewise plan to have a good time, but we use this occasion to show our fellow Americans that we hold dearer our own United States, that we are true and loyal American citizens who stand firmly united beneath the cne flag that symbolizes our common democracy, a nation of free men and women determined to maintain for ourselves and our posterity the principles of liberty and justice upon which our Government was founded, upon which it stands today, and upon which it will continue to stand so long as we all do our part.

This is no time for words unless they can be translated into action. Therefore this year we, first of all, discontinued our parade with its floats and flags of our ancestral land. Instead we took the initiative to become the first foreign racial group to place a float, which you all saw as you entered the park here today, in the "I am an American" parade on the Fourth of July and we won second prize with our entry. And lest any might think otherwise, we salute but one flag, the only flag you see on this platform—our own Stars and Stripes.

In thus making this a patriotic demonstration to exemplify our true Americanism we opened our program with religious services, because we appreciate and cherish freedom of worship given us by this Government of ours; we opened this portion of the speaking program with a patriotic hymn, because we appreciate and cherish freedom of speech given us by this Government of ours; we have representatives of our city, State, and National Governments discussing common problems in a friendly manner, even though they are all of three different political faiths—because we, with them, appreciate and cherish the right of free assemblage given us by our Government. We listen to the speeches without fear of air raids or uniformed armies because we still enjoy liberty and freedom in this last bulwark of democracy.

It is in this patriotic spirit that I greet and welcome you here as Americans rather than as fellow Slovaks. I trust you will enjoy yourselves with your families, your friends, and your acquaintances with whom you not only have ties of race and blood, but, what is of greater importance, ties of common citizenry in the greatest country of the world.

That you may take an active part in this manifestation of loyalty to our God and our country and of fealty to His and its elected authorities, the resolutions committee has prepared several resolutions to be submitted for your approval which then shall be forwarded to the proper persons and authorities.

Last year you were urged by one of our guest speakers to become citizens and to assist your friends and relatives in becoming citizens. That many of you have done so I know not only from personal experience and knowledge but from other sources as well. To you I extend our sincerest congratulations.

To those of you who are still but prospective citizens, I repeat that advice—show your appreciation for what this country has given you, what it means to you—become fellow citizens by your own free choice. Thus you, too, will be taking an active part in our program.

The committees who served with me have all given greatly of their time and energy to insure the success of this fifth Slovak Day. I wish to publicly thank each one of them for their unselfish sacrifices of time and effort and would have them feel that their work was but a patriotic service in making this the day of reaffirmed allegiance and loyalty to America by the Slovak-Americans of Bridgeport and vicinity. Thank you, ladies and gentlemen of all the committees.

To our distinguished speakers I extend a cordial welcome and express our sincere thanks for giving us of their valuable time and knowledge. I assure them that not only are we willing to state by word of mouth the allegiance we express today but, as always in the past, our groups here and elsewhere in America will ever remain loyal, firm, and true to the best interests of this our native or adopted country. Slovak history in America is one of which all Americans are proud, and here in Bridgeport our record is exceptional. So it shall continue.

On this day, while we still enjoy liberty and freedom, when we in America are not in any crisis of war, we renew our pledge of duty to our country; we humbly and reverently pray that peace to men of good will shall soon return to the world; we beg that Almighty God in His infinite goodness and mercy will assist with holy spirit of counsel and fortitude the decisions of the President of the United States and the deliberations of our Congress, so that peace here can be preserved, national safety and happiness promoted, and the blessing of equal liberty perpetuated. We respectfully and confidently submit to the leadership and wisdom of our great humanitarian President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, our Congress, our State officials, and our municipal authorities.

To our guests I say, come what may when called by city, State, or National authorities to do our part in preparing the national defense, in preserving democracy on earth, and in promoting the return of peace the Slovak-Americans of Bridgeport and vicinity shall not fail, whatever the sacrifice required. I am certain I speak the sentiments of all when I say that our actions here today are but additional proof, if any be necessary, of the statement that "Ellis Island is beginning to share honors with Plymouth Rock" in American history.

[Resolution]

Whereas the trying days through which the entire world is passing are causing sadness and anxiety to all peace-loving Christians; and

Whereas ruthless invasions are being made upon the lives, property, and liberty of innocent and peace-loving populations in Europe, from which we Slovaks, together with other American citizens, have descended; and

Whereas the United States is presently infested with subversive and destructive elements, consisting of nationals of totalitarian countries, which make up the so-called "fifth column"; and

Whereas the sole purpose of these un-American groups is to disturb, undermine, and upset our democratic institutions; and

Whereas the Slovak Alliance of Bridgeport and Vicinity, Inc., is composed of Americans of Slovak birth or descent: Be it

Resolved, That we, members of the Slovak Alliance of Bridgeport and Vicinity, Inc., here assembled to celebrate our fifth annual Slovak Day, go on record denouncing such ruthless invasion of life, liberty, and property of innocent and peace-loving populations; and be it further

Resolved, That we wholeheartedly endorse the splendid stand taken by the President of the United States in his efforts for national defense and the preservation of peace in America; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby reaffirm our allegiance of loyalty to the United States of America and its duly elected authorities; and be it further

Resolved, That we, the Slovak Alliance of Bridgeport and Vicinity, Inc., offer our cooperation and assistance to the President of the United States and to the other departments of our National, State, and municipal governments with the view of aiding our country in whatever capacity we can toward our national defense, and more particularly in combatting "fifth column" activities; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions of loyalty and fealty be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of State of the United States, to the Governor of our State, and to the mayor and the Common Council of the city of Bridgeport.

Dated at Bridgeport, this 7th day of July, A. D. 1940.

Separate Command for Air Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 29, 1940

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, there has been considerable talk in reference to our creating a third division of the national defense. Some high military authorities are of the opinion that we should have the air forces of this country under one specific head, working in coordination with the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the armed land forces. This afternoon I read an extremely interesting article in the columns of the Washington Daily News entitled "A Separate Command Is Nazi Air Secret." I ask that the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News, July 29, 1940]

A SEPARATE COMMAND IS NAZI AIR SECRET

(By Richard C. Hottelet)

BERLIN, July 29.—The German Air Force, which started from scratch 6 years ago, has become indisputably the world's greatest.

Witness Poland, Norway, the low countries, France.

The one factor which, more than any other, made the Reich's "Luftwaffe" what it is today was unified organization—organization so perfect in detail that the German Air Force can function in one capacity or a dozen, in whole or in part, in offense or defense without a hitch and at a moment's notice.

STREAMLINED

The "Luftwaffe" is modern and streamlined in all its parts.

As one of Germany's three armed services, with which it is coequal, the air force has its own commander in chief. With the army and navy, it is subject to orders from Hitler's high command, the supreme unifying and coordinating power.

Non-German experts acquainted with the air force's organization have reported that it functions with an efficiency rare in such large and ramified bodies.

The methods of organization and the routines followed not only are brand new, these experts have discovered, but are also completely flexible so that they may be changed to meet new situations and to allow the greatest possible discretion to the numerous responsible officials.

DEFENSIVE ALSO

The air force is not, as recent history may have seemed to indicate, a purely offensive service. It includes every branch of Germany's defense against air attack, including all antiaircraft artillery. It also has its own signal and medical corps as well as other specialized groups which enable it to operate as a self-contained unit.

The air force may operate independently or in conjunction with the army and navy. Air force units may be detached for service under army or navy command. Discretion for such employment of the air force lies exclusively with the high command.

Although Reich Field Marshal Hermann Wilhelm Goering outranks Admiral Erich Raeder, navy commander in chief, and Gen. Field Marshal Walther von Brauchitsch, army commander in chief, the air force itself enjoys no precedence over the other two branches.

POLISH CAMPAIGN

The past 11 months have illustrated how the air force works. In an operation like the Polish campaign, the army would request a certain number of planes and antiaircraft batteries for local reconnaissance, artillery observation, and protection.

These units would be temporarily detached by the high command and placed under direct command of the army. Meanwhile, the main body of the air force would be operating in its own sphere, bombing enemy lines of communications and air bases and fighting enemy airplanes.

In an operation over difficult terrain and across a body of water, as in the Norwegian campaign, the air force would be closely coordinated with the navy as well as the army.

VERSUS FRANCE AND BRITAIN

In a mixed campaign, involving land as well as water operations, as in the offensive against France and Britain, air power would be used constantly, both independently and in coordination with land and sea forces.

At the outset of the drive, acting in its own realm, the air force would strike en masse against enemy air bases with a view to seizing air superiority at once. If success met this attempt, large units might then be detached for army service to aid ground forces to smash their way deeper into enemy territory.

Always, however, whatever its function of the moment, the air force is cooperating with its brother services in driving toward some specific strategic objective.

FLEXIBILITY FIRST

The air force's antiaircraft batteries were employed against enemy tanks and even warships, as well as against enemy planes. In all instances the greatest flexibility of operation was maintained and there was no adherence to set schemes of action merely for the scheme's sake.

In overseas operations the air force would act independently, raiding enemy industries, harbors, and other military objectives, and in close cooperation with the Navy, bombing enemy shipping or hunting submarines.

An illustration of the air arm's flexibility was the organization of Germany's crack parachute troops. The original idea was Gen. Ernst Udet's, whose job at the time ostensibly was in connection with the technical development of plane engines.

But there was no jealousy or quibbling and, according to one non-German aviation expert, "No one complained that he was overstepping the functions of his office—they all helped."

The Reich is divided into four air fleets (luftfoltten), each of which includes several air districts (luftgaue). In addition, there are special districts covering small areas of greater military vulnerability, such as Berlin, Leipzig, and the Ruhr industrial valley.

The air fleet command is in charge of all operations and all plane bases, communications, and whatever equipment it may need.

SELF-CONTAINED

If the air fleet gets an offensive assignment, it may leave its home base or even depart from Germany lock, stock, and barrel. It then becomes a completely self-contained fighting unit fully supplied with its own fighting, bombing, reconnaissance, staff and hospital planes, and its own antiaircraft batteries, signal corps, quartermasters detachments, and medical units.

In short, it is given the task of bringing operations to a successful conclusion and is supplied with all means of doing so.

One expert summed it up by saying:

"If circumstance demands, the air fleet can have infantrymen, sailors, artillerymen, and engineers assigned to it. Nobody worries about the seeming heterogeneity of organization—the only consideration is that the air fleet is to do a job and do it efficiently."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN G. TOWNSEND, JR.
OF DELAWARE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 29, 1940

ARTICLE BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Gen. Hugh S.

Johnson relative to Louis Johnson, formerly Assistant Secretary of War.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

It should be a relief after covering two conventions to get the odor of intense politics out of your nostrils. It is bad enough in any convention—bad enough at Philadelphia, superlatively bad at Chicago.

The thing that caused both my hackles and my gorge to rise there was the wholesale crucifixion of loyalty. It is the highest human attribute, but it can be terribly misused. Tales of the berserk fanaticism of the Nazi troops in the Battle of France are eclipsed by the crusader's stories of the old man of the mountain. Hassan, Shiek Al Jabal, and his cult of assassins who would throw themselves over a precipice at their chieftain's nod to demonstrate their loyalty. I am sure it was no myth, because I saw such things at Chicago and know of similar things in our time done by the Moslem Juramentados of Mindanao.

Like sacrifices were demanded and made at Chicago. Men, some the best friends, who have fought unfailingly for the President, sometimes against their dearest convictions, were coldly liquidated by their own commanded action. There are, in Congress, no finer gentleman (in the homely American sense), sweeter characters, or truer men (in any sense) than Senators BYRNES and BARKLEY and Speaker BANKHEAD. They have loyally fought every fight for the President. They were highly entitled to his utmost loyalty in return.

Any of them could have been nominated for the Presidency or Vice Presidency. Any was entitled to it. For the first place, none ever had a chance. For the Vice Presidency all had to take their death sentences in favor of a New Deal Republican at the hand of a New Deal Socialist—neither of whom had ever been elected to anything.

They took their deprivation of the essential right of every American bravely, faithfully, and with a smile—and so did Jim Farley, to whom Mr. Roosevelt owes more than to any human being except his mother and his wife. The bosh about this being a choice in a crisis of the best potential President, I just can't swallow. I have the greatest respect for Mr. Wallace, but that he is better Presidential timber than any of these honorable, experienced, and faithful statesmen is pure hogwash.

Sickened, I returned to Washington for surcease, only to find a new rumor coming from so many informed sources as to give it credence. It was that the new Tory Republic Secretary of War had asked his vigorous assistant, Louis Johnson, to "get the hell out of there."

I have not always seen eye to eye with Mr. Johnson. At first I thought he was politicalizing and new dealizing the Army. My criticism was well-informed but it proved premature.

That job differs from any other sub-Cabinet position. It is charged by statute with industrial mobilization of the whole Nation in an emergency. My observation was that Mr. Johnson did not fully appreciate this vast problem in the beginning. He certainly does now. His work here is not paralleled elsewhere in Government.

It is no task for an amateur. Mr. Johnson has been educated. It would take a new man a year even to get the feel of it. We have no years to spare—not even days.

In 1937, the President recognized this. He persuaded Louis Johnson to remain by a forthright promise to make him Secretary of War.

At Chicago, American Legion leaders started to stage a cyclonic drive to make Johnson Vice President. He was hastily recalled to Washington. Immediately afterward, Secretary Stimson, with his new chair hardly warm, got out the ax. He would not have moved so boldly with no suggestion from the President.

Politics marches on—ruthlessly, respecting nothing, sparing nothing. I would like to go to Tahiti or San Juan de Boc Boc. I have been at the latter place. It has a romantic name but it stinks of sour copra, muddy hogs, and wet carabao. It is a vale of cashmere compared with this atmosphere.

Business Earnings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 29, 1940

ARTICLE BY HARVEY E. RUNNER

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, the American people are very properly interested in knowing about the present economic situation in our country. It is important that they know the facts. In arriving at the facts it is always well to look to a source which is not prejudiced.

The New York Herald Tribune is outspoken in its opposition to the present administration. Therefore, when it features an article predicting industrial gains which may equal any in the Nation's history, such article is worthy of study by everyone interested.

I ask unanimous consent that the article appearing in the Herald Tribune of yesterday, written by Harvey E. Runner, of the staff of that newspaper, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUSINESS AND INDUSTRIAL NEWS OF THE DAY—MIDYEAR REPORTS OF EARNINGS SPREAD OPTIMISM FOR UPTURN—GOOD GAINS SHOWN WITHOUT BENEFITS OF DEFENSE PROGRAM, AND WHEN THAT GETS GOING, IMPROVEMENT MAY EQUAL ANY IN NATION'S HISTORY

(By Harvey E. Runner)

General business perked up from its becalmed state last week as a flood of good news unfolded in the semiannual financial reports of corporation earnings and sales covering operations in the first half of 1940. As compared with the same 1939 period, these reports showed a substantial improvement, which becomes more impressive when it is realized that the gains, in most instances, were made without the benefits bound to come from this Nation's multi-billion-dollar defense program.

But where the influences of the defense forces were at work, mostly in the aviation, automobile, and steel industries, the increases were truly phenomenal, resulting in some companies, like Chrysler Corporation and Glenn L. Martin Co., recording all-time highs in both sales and profits.

The favorable showing generally in the midyear financial statements, whether or not companies have been working on defense orders, was the week's most encouraging development to businessmen. The belief was that if corporations, both large and small, could have made the progress they did in the first half of the year, the possibilities were good that even greater sales and profits could be made in the second 6 months, provided, of course, no deterrents were inflicted on business in the meantime.

FAVORABLE SIGNS ON HORIZON

Meanwhile there were increasing signs that fall business would be good, always remembering, though, that an unfavorable turn for the English in the pending battle of Britain might change the picture. The New York Herald Tribune index of general business continued its upturn, advancing fractionally from 87 to 87.6. A year ago at the same time the index stood at 72.9.

Steel mill operations stepped into a new 1940 high. Iron Age placed the production rate at 89 percent of capacity, a 1.5-point rise from the previous week. British buying continued to be an important factor. Purchasing for new railroad locomotives, freight cars, and other needs also was substantial. Automobile companies, too, began to place orders for new steel. Buying for defense needs has increased, and while now being felt by the industry has not as yet reached the impressive proportions steel men believe will come as the armament program broadens.

Banks report business loans on the rise. Many inquiries are being received, too, which are traceable directly to the defense program. A vast amount of plant expansion remains to be done. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War, sought to speed up the work by naming a five-man advisory committee to cooperate with his department on its forthcoming $500,000,000 defense construction program.

Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury, also eased the way by issuing a ruling permitting amortization of new plant facilities over the period of the leasehold pending more definite legislative action. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been helping companies working on defense orders with loans. At the week end it announced a $92,000,000 loan to Wright Aeronautical to enable the company to build a new plant.

INDUSTRY BACKLOGS SUBSTANTIAL

Backlogs, especially in the aviation field, are the largest in history, calling for sizable plant expansion. In steel, too, the backlogs are large. Bethlehem Steel Corporation announced that new orders were pouring in at a rate about 40 percent in excess of the company's current operating lever of 99 percent of capacity. On June 30 the company had orders on hand valued at $288,521,487, a new peace-time record, comparing with orders of $184,921,081 as of June 30, 1939.

Significant is the announcement by Eugene G. Grace, president of Bethlehem, that the current backlog does not reflect the national-defense program to any important degree. This is even more true in the case of most companies, especially those operating in fields other than steel and aviation and in some branches of the textile industry.

When the full impact of the billions to be spent for defense is felt by industry, a period of business improvement equal to any in the Nation's history may prevail. According to the latest figures issued by William S. Knudsen, coordinator of industrial production for the National Advisory Defense Commission, Army and Navy contracts were placed at the rate of $41,147,500 each business day from June 6 through July 25.

Continued good demand exists for automobiles, both new and used models. Like the first 10 days in July, reports covering the second 10 days of the month showed sharp increases in sales over the same 1939 period, July gains ranged up to 73 percent above a year ago. Predictions are that final figures for the month will show an average increase of 20 percent for the industry.

Automobile car loadings in the Great Lakes region in July, August, and September will show a gain of 35 percent over the like 1939 period, according to estimates furnished by shippers. At the same time, the report of the Great Lakes Regional Advisory Board forecasts total loading of all classifications of 480,281 cars, a gain of 13.2 percent over the third quarter of last year.

The board's report further stated that the forecast did not include any appreciable amount of activity arising out of the defense program, so that there is thus every possibility that the projected increase will be augmented considerably.

In this connection, it is interesting to note that Mr. Knudsen reported at the week end that present schedules call for the delivery of 25,000 trucks to the Nation's armed services by December 31 of this year. He did not reveal whether this figure included truck deliveries already made. It is known that Chrysler has shipped more than 10,000 trucks so far this year to the Government and has on its books orders for 4,500 more.

Tire sales have reflected the improvement made in the automobile industry. June sales rose 17.5 percent over those of May, becoming the largest for any month since June 1932. Heavy buying in advance of the new Federal tax which became effective July 1 was a factor in the increase. Tire shipments for 1940 are expected to be the largest since 1929, with the possible exception of those of 1939.

HON. W. WARREN BARBOUR

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

LETTER FROM RABBI HARRY S. JACOBS AND REPLY BY HON. W. WARREN BARBOUR, OF NEW JERSEY, AND ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have included in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter under date of July 10 which I received from Rabbi Harry S. Jacobs, of Newark, in connection with the Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill, a copy of my reply to Rabbi Jacobs under date of July 15, and an article from the New York Times of July 9 referred to in the rabbi's letter.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEWARK, N. J., July 10 1940.

Hon. W. WARREN BARBOUR,
Senator from New Jersey.

DEAR SENATOR BARBOUR: I have just received your letter thanking me for my suggestions to you anent keeping our beloved land out of the European conflict. I am indeed deeply appreciative of the courteous consideration you have given to my communication.

These are days of quick-moving events, and thus I hasten to urge another matter to your attention, namely, the soon-to-be-proposed Burke-Wadsworth conscription bill. Although whole-heartedly committed to the fullest national defense, in which you concur, I am opposed to totalitarian methods of conscription to raise an enormous fighting force by un-American and undemocratic methods, which a peacetime draft would signify. I am enclosing herewith a clipping from the New York Times of July 9, 1940, setting forth the views of 240 educators, authors, and clergymen on this matter. The declaration analyzes brilliantly, I believe, the totalitarian trend of the proposed measure. I would urge upon you very strongly to join your strength in opposing this measure and to aid in the public understanding of the danger of this measure to American free institutions, to have it published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under your privilege of extended remarks.

Sincerely yours,

Dr. HARRY S. JACOBS.

P. S.: I was glad to receive your statement concerning Mr. Cromwell's attack on the American Constitution. It was really a shock to read it. You can be assured of my unswerving devotion to your reelection.

H. S. J.

JULY 15, 1940.

Rabbi HARRY S. JACOBS,
178 Mapes Avenue, Newark, N. J.

DEAR RABBI JACOBS: Thank you once more for a most illuminating letter. Certainly I agree with you that there is no justification for introducing totalitarian methods in the United States. On the other hand, the volume of recruiting for the Army has proceeded so slowly that it is already quite evident that we shall have to find some other method of bringing the Army up to its newly authorized strength. It is not proposed to "raise an enormous fighting force by un-American and undemocratic methods," but we simply must build and maintain an Army of reasonable size and see that it is supplied with the best equipment procurable. To do less is to invite invasion of the Western Hemisphere, and I know that you and your associates would not want to see Hitlerism transplanted to America.

Your letter reaches me during a recess of Congress. When the Senate reconvenes I shall ask to have our two letters and the accompanying clipping introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Thank you very much indeed, also, for your generous personal reference. I more than appreciate it.

With kind regard, believe me,

Sincerely yours,

———.

EDUCATORS ASSAIL PEACETIME DRAFT—GROUP OF 240, INCLUDING ALSO WRITERS, CLERGY, AND BUSINESS LEADERS, JOIN IN PROTEST—DICTATOR TREND IS SEEN—IDEA THAT THE INDIVIDUAL IS SUBSERVIENT TO STATE SAID TO UNDERLIE SUCH A PLAN

A "declaration against conscription" which said that peacetime drafting of manpower for military duties "smacks of totalitarianism" and would be highly dangerous to the spirit and traditions of American democracy was issued yesterday by a group of 240 educators, writers, religious leaders, and professional and business men and women.

It was issued through the Committee on Militarism in Education, of which Dr. William H. Kilpatrick, professor emeritus of education at Teachers College, is chairman. Edwin C. Johnson is secretary.

TEXT OF DECLARATION

The declaration, in full, was as follows:

"The American people are today being deluged by propaganda for military conscription in peacetime. Sincere and distinguished as many of the proponents of conscription may be, and plausible as many of their contentions may seem, we, the undersigned, urge the American people and their representatives in Congress to deliberate with sober caution before permitting such an unprecedented innovation to become a part of our national life.

"In our judgment, military conscription in peacetime smacks of totalitarianism, and we are convinced that its adoption would be highly dangerous to the spirit and traditions of American democracy. The reasons upon which we support this conviction are as follows:

"First, the essential idea underlying military conscription is the major premise of every dictatorship and all totalitarianism. It is the assumption that the individual citizen is but a pawn in the hands of unlimited state power. Conscription has always been abhorrent to free men because it is, in effect, a seizure of a man's body, time, and service by force and under threat of heavy penalty.

"For generations millions of Europeans have fled their native countries and become loyal and devoted American citizens in order to enjoy, among other things, our freedom from conscription. Universal military service has been and is today the chief weapon by which dictators suppress free conscience among their people, inculcate them with the false ideals of chauvinistic nationalism, and indoctrinate them with belief in the superiority of brute force over morals and ideas.

"The adoption of conscription among Americans will be the opening wedge for the totalitarian dogma that individual citizens are pawns of the state from birth until death, without any rights which those in positions of power are bound to respect. Americans must not delude themselves with the belief that their democracy will remain unscathed if we adopt the essentially antidemocratic processes which have worked such havoc abroad.

"SELECTIVE SERVICE HELD SOPHISTRY

"Second, we consider that peacetime conscription is in itself a flagrant negation of democracy. We reject as transparent sophistry the contention that conscription under the name of 'selective service' is democratic and that voluntary military service is undemocratic. The 'equality' that conscription makes for is akin to the 'equality' which prevails among regimented galley slaves. It is no more democratic than any other form of involuntary servitude.

"Our American conception of democracy signifies vastly more than mere equality, for it also includes the great concepts of liberty and freedom for the individual. Furthermore, we deny that conscription can be justified by the assertion that it prevails in such democracies as England, Sweden, and Switzerland. The conditions we face in United States are in many respects widely different from and not comparable to those prevailing in European nations.

"For this reason valid conceptions of American democracy and military service must be derived from American history and tradition, not from contemporary European practices. In our view, peacetime conscription and American democracy are quite incompatible.

"Third, the adoption of military conscription in peacetime would be a radical departure from historic American tradition. Never before in American history has it been thought necessary to resort to peacetime conscription for purposes of defense. This fact has been one of the truly glorious traditions of our American democracy; in common with most Americans we take profound pride in it, and we deny that the time has now come to abandon this feature of our national life because of the events in Europe, the gravity of which we well recognize.

"We are confident that the defense purposes enumerated in the Constitution—'to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasion'—can still be met and effectively discharged without resort to peacetime conscription.

"As ardently concerned for the safety of our beloved Republic as any advocate of universal service can possibly be, we reject the suggestion that to preserve American democracy we must embrace the worst feature of the totalitarian regimes. We deny that free Americans must now, in the name of freedom, submit to peacetime conscription and thereby become regimented vassals of the national state.

SEE DISRUPTION IN LIFE

"Finally, we oppose conscription because of the disruption it will cause in our American way of life, and also because we question its necessity and wisdom as a defense measure. The military regimentation of the entire manpower of our Nation will inevitably result in widespread dislocation in business, industry, agriculture, and higher education; and it may prove unnecessary and ineffectual from a military standpoint. Conscription would have been unnecessary in 1917 if we had been raising a force for the defense of our territory rather than an Army of 5,000,000 men for service in Europe.

"Today the asserted need is for substantial expansion in our Army, Navy, and Air Corps. If the personnel need is for higher-trained permanent forces sufficient in number to man expertly the new weapons as they are produced, we contend this need can best be met by voluntary enlistments under pay schedules sufficiently attractive to induce the required numbers to enroll. By such a procedure it may well be that the required enlistments could be obtained before the new weapons themselves are ready.

"This solution for the asserted need would seem to us to be vastly preferable to the alternative of organizing huge forces of partially trained civilians. It would be free of totalitarian semblance, as it would be in keeping with our democratic traditions and conceptions. Moreover, it would be based on a recognition of the military lesson being taught on European battlefields—that comparatively small forces of highly trained soldier-mechanics, properly equipped, can defeat many times their number of partially trained civilian conscripts, regardless of how courageous the latter may be.

"For these reasons, and for others, we appeal to all our fellow Americans who have a zealous regard for the preservation of their democratic institutions to identify themselves with the cause represented in this declaration."

ARTICLE FROM ASHEVILLE (N. C.) ADVOCATE

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting article from the Asheville Advocate, of my home town, Asheville, N. C., which deals with the history of that section, and makes mention of the trek made there several hundred years ago by the explorer and discoverer, De Soto, when he was on his way westward.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMER SEASON IN WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA BRINGS TO MIND MANY INTERESTING NORTH CAROLINA FACTS—AUTOGRAPHED PHOTOS OF MANY MEN IN PUBLIC LIFE ON WALLS OF HOTEL LANGREN SENATORIAL SUITE Annually there are held throughout the State of North Carolina many festivals, all of which have their queens to be crowned, and all queens of which are selected as a result of their poise, beauty, and popularity. There are tobacco festivals, cotton festivals, watermelon festivals, and festivals of all sorts, including last but by far not least, the rhododendron festival which is held in Asheville during the summer season.

The Asheville festival is no doubt one of the most unique of any and annually it is visited by thousands from all parts of the South, with many from the North and other sections of the country.

Rhododendron, providing a beautiful flower from most pretentious branches, is the theme of this occasion, and so widespread has been the publicity in reference to western North Carolina's colorful rhododendron that it is marketed by the mountaineers in many sections of the country through relatives or representatives.

A visit to Asheville, N. C., to this festival accords those who accept of the hospitality of this occasion an opportunity to visit the largest national park east of the Rocky Mountains, known as the Smoky Mountains National Park, one entrance of which is only a couple of hours' drive from the city of Asheville itself. This park as yet has not been accepted by the Federal Government, but arrangements are being made for that formal acceptance when the President of the United States may find it possible to honor the people of North Carolina and Tennessee with his presence at a dedicatory exercise, since part of the park is in Tennessee and part in North Carolina.

Last year more than 600,000 people visited the park, and during the ensuing year more than 900,000 are expected to vision the scenic, beautiful, and heavenly ranges and valleys that wind gracefully through its vast area.

North Carolinians are proud of its history and their heritage. In western North Carolina is to be found Mount Mitchell, said to be the highest peak east of the Rockies. Through these lofty hills and over these towering ranges, then a vast wilderness, the aborigines hunted and fished. In this section years before the white man came there was fought a great battle between two Indian tribes, probably the Cherokees on the one hand and the Shawnees or the Catawbas on the other. It is also a tradition that these lands for a long while were neutral hunting grounds for these tribes, and this is evidenced to a very large degree by the vast findings of flint rocks, arrow points, and in this connection it is said that two of the largest private collections of flints in existence are located in Asheville.

This section of western North Carolina has a historical background dated back to Hernando De Soto, who about 400 years ago is said to have passed through that section by way of Hickory Nut Gap, some 15 miles from Asheville, en route westward, where he died near the banks of the Mississippi River. De Soto, one of the conquerors of Peru, undertook to explore the eastern part of the present United States in search of another Peru and started at Tampa Bay, in Florida. He is said to have marched northward through Georgia, South Carolina, and into North Carolina, and then turned westward into the mountains, where we are told he passed along an Indian trail leading almost squarely through the present city of Asheville.

On the plateau upon which Asheville is constructed and at a site now occupied by the Langren Hotel, stood an inn always welcomed by travelers in the old days, known as the Old Buck Hotel, which was constructed by James M. Smith, one of the pioneers in developing that section of the State. During the War between the States the Confederate post office was located at the Old Buck Hotel, and it was there for many, many years that travelers came. The Old Buck Hotel, around 1910, was razed and on that spot there was erected the present Langren Hotel, in which are located the broadcasting quarters of Radio Station WISE. The Langren is unique in that its genial manager, Col. Jack Enwright, a World War veteran, has set aside a suite of rooms known as the senatorial suite. Upon the walls of these spacious quarters are to be found autographs of more than 75 of the 96 United States Senators.

A large engraved photograph of President Roosevelt occupies a commanding position between two of the windows of the living room overlooking Pack Square, where is the Vance Monument erected in honor of Zebulon B. Vance, North Carolina's War Governor and later United States Senator. Also in these rooms is a facsimile copy of the Declaration of Independence and a facsimile copy of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. North Carolinians, of course, are justly proud of these great documents and they delight in reminding their friends of other States of the Union that the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence was pronounced on May 20, 1775, months prior to the Declaration of Independence in Philadelphia of July 4, 1776. Colonel Enwright, in an interview several months ago, stated that he had set aside these spacious quarters for exclusive use by all United States Senators because from its lofty location a most excellent view of surrounding mountains can be had, and that in their minds the pioneer days which provided thrills in this mountain country even for hardy and courageous adventurers.

The Old Buck Hotel was one of several hotels designed for the traveler who used the stagecoach. Another one of these old structures is said to have stood near King's Mountain, where one of the decisive battles of the Revolutionary War took place, which was participated in by patriots of North Carolina, South Carolina, and the frontiersmen of that territory now designated as Tennessee, and today the old residents who visit the Langren Hotel envision more readily from this historical site the histories told them by their forefathers.

Report of Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 29, 1940

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, there has come to my attention the report of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to insured banks as of June 30, 1940, made public today by Chairman Leo T. Crowley. This document, summarizing activities of the Corporation since January 1, 1934, is a stirring commentary upon the thorough rehabilitation of our banking system that has occurred during those years.

The rehabilitation began, of course, in 1933 with the subscription to preferred capital of banks by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. This program has resulted in gross R. F. C. subscriptions of more than $1,160,000,000 to the capital of upward of 6,100 banks.

Since inception of Federal deposit insurance on January 1, 1934, the entire country has benefited from an era unique in our banking history. We have seen the number of bank failures kept to an absolute minimum, we have seen what hazardous banks there were closed or rehabilitated without material loss to their depositors, we have seen the quality of assets in our banks steadily improve.

These long-sought evidences of financial strength and security resulted from a combination of influences: The confidence inspired in our people by the existence of Federal deposit insurance, the ability of F. D. I. C. to discharge promptly its responsibility to depositors of banks that had difficulties, the elimination of unsound bank assets made possible by R. F. C. capital participation and by F. D. I. C. loans to facilitate mergers, and finally the constant and cooperative efforts of State and Federal bank supervisory officials to correct weaknesses and to encourage sound bank operation.

What these developments mean in terms of dollars and cents and peace of mind to American bank depositors is strikingly shown by Mr. Crowley's report, which, in summary, shows that—

First. With the outlay of about $80,000,000 during the first 6 months of 1940—largest disbursements for any 6-month period since the beginning of deposit insurance—the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation brought near completion its program for the rehabilitation of banks in the system that have constituted a substantial hazard.

Second. From the beginning of deposit insurance on January 1, 1934, through June 30, 1940, the Corporation cleaned up 342 banks having deposits of more than $431,000,000 and 1,111,535 depositors. The Corporation's gross outlay for protection of depositors in these cases amounted to about $220,000,000. Of this amount about $46,000,000, or about 21 percent, is estimated as the eventual loss.

Third. Despite unprecedented expenditures during the first 6 months of 1940, the surplus of the Corporation increased by about $15,676,000, amounting to $180,265,000 as of June 30, 1940.

Fourth. Protection of all but 1,651 of the 1,111,535 depositors was extended in the 342 insured banks closed or merged with the aid of F. D. I. C. loans through June 30, 1940. Total deposits of these banks were $431,000,000, of which 97.8 percent was made promptly available.

Fifth. There occurred during the first 6 months of 1940 a net reduction of 55 in the number of insured banks, 82 banks having been eliminated, while only 27 banks were admitted to insurance.

Sixth. It now appears that the capital and surplus of the Corporation will have increased to about $500,000,000 by the end of 1940. It might soon, therefore, be appropriate to give consideration to a reasonable reduction in the rate of assessment paid by banks.

I ask unanimous consent that the report may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO BANKS INSURED BY THE FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

The Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation submits herewith a report relating to the activities of the Corporation for the 6 months ended June 30, 1940, with additional information pertaining to the operations during the 12 months ended on that date and during the entire period of operation of the Corporation. The report also includes a statement of assets and liabilities of the Corporation as of June 30, 1940, and an analysis of surplus for the 6 months ended on that date.

OPERATIONS

The income of the Corporation amounted to $27,382,078 for the 6 months ended June 30, 1940, of which $22,415,429.30 represented assessments paid by insured banks and $4,966,648.70 represented interest earned, after deducting provision for amortization of premiums, and profits on securities sold. Expenses and losses during this period amounted to $11,706,212.72, including deposit-insurance losses and expenses of $9,973,971.08 and administrative expenses and other charges of $1,732,241.64.

Income for the year ended June 30, 1940, amounted to $52,821,658.74, including assessments paid by insured banks of $43,271,826.35 and $9,549,832.39 representing interest earned, less provision for amortization of premiums and profits on securities sold. Total losses and expenses for the year amounted to $14,343,570.47 represented by deposit-insurance losses and expenses of $10,863,369.56 and administrative expenses and other charges of $3,480,200.91.

The surplus of the Corporation as of June 30, 1940, was $180,264,574.29, resulting from an excess of income over expenses and losses during the entire period of operations. From the beginning of deposit insurance, total income has amounted to $245,985,465.67, including assessments of $187,313,359.81 paid by insured banks and $58,672,105.86 derived from interest earned and profits from sales of securities, after making provision for amortization of premiums. Charges to surplus have amounted to $65,720,891.38. Net deposit insurance losses and expenses amounted to $45,525,603.64, resulting from the difference between total disbursements of $219,930,790.51 actually made or pending to depositors of closed insured banks in settlement of their claims and to merging banks or receivers of closed banks for loans and purchases of assets, including expenses incident thereto, and estimated recoveries of $174,405,186.87. Administrative expenses and other charges have amounted to $20,195,287.74.

CLOSED INSURED BANKS

During the 6 months ended June 30, 1940, 30 insured banks closed or received aid from the Corporation.[1] The 234,400 depositors in these banks, having total deposits of $136,391,000, were protected by insurance or otherwise to the extent of $136,224,000, or about 99.9 percent of their claims. Only 55 depositors in the suspended banks were not fully protected.

During the year ended June 30, 1940, 42 insured banks closed or received aid from the Corporation.[1] The 268,351 depositors in these banks had total deposits of $148,179,000 and were protected against loss to the extent of $147,907,000, or about 99.8 percent of their claims. There were only 82 depositors who were not fully protected.

During the existence of deposit insurance, 345 insured banks have been closed because of financial difficulties.[1] Of these, 3 subsequently were reopened or taken over by other insured banks, and 342, having 1,111,535 depositors, were liquidated or were merged with the aid of loans from the Corporation. These banks had total deposits of $431,098,000, of which $421,592,000, or 97.8 percent, were made available promptly without loss to depositors. Only 1,651 of the 1,111,535 depositors, or less than one-quarter of 1 percent, were not fully protected by insurance offset, preferment, pledge of security, or terms of the merger agreements.

MEMBERSHIP

As of June 30, 1940, there were 13,534 operating banks insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. The decrease of 55 banks in the number of insured banks during the 6 months ended June 30, 1940, resulted principally from continued elimination of banks in unsound condition and from the chartering of few new banks.

During the 6 months 82 banks were eliminated: 12 by suspension; 14 by merger with the aid of loans or purchase of assets by the Corporation; and 56 by merger, consolidation, or voluntary liquidation. There were 27 banks admitted to insurance, of which 9 were in operation or were successors to noninsured banks in operation at the beginning of the year and 18 first opened for business during the year.

There continues to be a close cooperation on the part of all bank chartering and supervisory authorities in eliminating unsound banks from the banking system and in permitting the chartering of only those newly organized banks sufficiently strong to be admitted to deposit insurance. During the period there was only one bank first organized and opened for business which at June 30 was not insured.

COMPLETION OF THE PROGRAM FOR THE ELIMINATION OF CONCENTRATED HAZARDS TO THE BANKING SYSTEM

With the disbursement of more than $65,000,000 to facilitate the merger of 20 banks during the past 6 months, the corporation has about completed its program for the rehabilitation of the banks in the system constituting a substantial hazard. During the existence of deposit insurance, and particularly since 1935, when the Congress granted to the corporation power to make loans to or purchase assets from banks to facilitate mergers where such action would reduce or avert a threatened loss, the corporation has consistently pursued a program of singling out weak or unsound banks and of cooperating in the consummation of the necessary corrective action. All of the larger cases, and many of the smaller, were banks in an impaired condition following the banking holiday that were admitted to insurance in order to avoid further banking difficulty. Unfortunately the assets of these banks were of such nature that their recovery in value did not keep pace with the general recovery and it would have been poor policy to permit them to continue to operate with an increasing accumulation of loss. However, these problem cases, together with all other cases, involving deposits of more than $431,000,000 and 1,111,535 depositors, have been cleaned up with an anticipated loss to the corporation of about $46,000,000.

We can now say with a reasonable degree of assurance that the accumulated losses in the banking system have been eliminated, with the possible exception of a few small scattered cases. However, it is inevitable that there will be bank failures from losses currently arising, just as there are failures in any other business. Henceforth bank owners should assume a greater share of the risk of their business by investing more private capital, particularly in the case of weak or inadequately capitalized banks. An increased financial interest on the part of stockholders will contribute to the development of more effective management and will prevent an accumulation of losses, decreasing the need for governmental subsidy of inefficiently operated banks.

It now appears that the capital of the Corporation will have increased to about $500,000,000 by the end of 1940. This amount will have accumulated sooner than was expected since income has been in excess of that contemplated at the time of the passage of the Banking Act of 1935. We believe, therefore, that it would be appropriate to give consideration to a reasonable reduction in the rate of assessment paid by banks. The continued success of the Corporation is more dependent upon its possession of adequate supervisory powers than it is on annual revenue. Inadequate supervision of banks would require a charge considerably greater than the present assessment. We believe, however, that the banking system will become increasingly stronger with the existence of Federal deposit insurance to stabilize the demands on banks and to serve as an instrumentality for the development and maintenance of an adequate and uniform bank supervision, provided there continues to be reasonable cooperation on the part of other supervisory agencies and bank management.

By order of the Board of Directors.

Thoughts After the Fall of Paris

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

ARTICLE BY DOROTHY THOMPSON

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a very challenging article by Dorothy Thompson which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of June 17, 1940.

I do not always agree with Miss Thompson, but in this case I believe the widest possible reading of her article would be beneficial to the thinking of America.

And I wish emphatically to call attention to a very significant part of her article; it is that which pertains to the German method of financing the war, in contrast to that of the Allies. May we learn, and speedily, to make our money system the handmaid of industry and national needs instead of a great barrier to full employment and full production.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of June 17, 1940]

ON THE RECORD—THOUGHTS AFTER THE FALL OF PARIS

(By Dorothy Thompson)

For many generations the governments of free peoples, the democracies, have enjoyed the dominance of western civilization and have had the power to determine the destiny of the world. Now they have suffered the worst disaster in their history. Their very survival is threatened.

Their disaster involves us. It involves us for reasons which Mr. Lippmann set forth with admirable lucidity on Saturday morning. We should face that fact with complete clarity in order that out of today's defeat we may draw tomorrow's strength and wisdom.

There are simple, realistic reasons why Hitler has so far won this war. We must understand those reasons and look at ourselves in the light of those reasons.

First. His observations regarding the internal weakness of democratic societies—observations which formed the basis for his conquest of Germany itself by the Nazi revolution.

The democratic ideal, which started as a noble and heroic conception, as an attempt to liberate human beings and offer them the opportunity to develop and perfect themselves and thus grow from individuals into persons, has degenerated away from the idea of self-perfection through effort, away from the idea of equal and cooperative endeavor, into the idea of self-interest. The pursuit of happiness, which is vain except as it represents an accrual of joy through creative action, has become the pursuit of pleasure.

The concept that the laborer is worthy of his hire has been supplanted by the idea that work is a commodity, to be bargained for and sold at the highest price that can be extorted, regardless of the product. And the same is true of capital, whose creative function has become secondary to its safety. Capital—the accumulated savings upon which new creative activity can be based—has also come to be treated like a commodity, whose worth and use depends upon the market.

Higher education has been divorced from the idea of training the whole man, into the production of experts, who, possessed of immense amounts of specialized knowledge, are without the sense with which they were born. Secondary education has devoted itself to training youth by words rather than by action. It is literary and divorced from life, which is reality. Every June our high schools and colleges turn out youngsters who are completely unfitted for the realities of the world into which they emerge. An age that needs mechanics, technicians, skilled workers, men whose hands and brains have been coordinated to a unified efficiency, is flooded with young people who cannot read a slide rule or handle a screwdriver, let alone an exquisite machine.

A social snobbery which belies every democratic principle perpetuates the idea that a man who wears a white collar and adds up columns in a book, or a girl who types "Yours of the 10th received" is somehow of superior status to the driver of a steam locomotive or a first-rate cook.

We educate our children to come up in the world, instead of to live in it.

We belie our own democracy at every step. We classify people according to success—according to income—rather than achievement; or according to race, instead of according to quality.

Nothing is dearer to us than ourselves, and the ideal of ourselves is comfort.

Hitler is destroying democracy by the sword, and by revolution, because democracy has already gone far on the road to self-destruction.

Second. Hitler is winning the war because he has been fighting it with an industrial and engineering economy, while the democracies have been fighting it with a money, or financial economy, and fighting it stingily. We are now following Britain and France in our defense program.

The Germans did not vote themselves 4,000,000,000 money units for defense. They voted—had voted for them—30,000 airplanes, so-and-so many guns, so-and-so many thousand tons of reserves of oil and raw materials. The German economy is an economy of things and men; the Allied economy is an economy of symbols; money. The German economy recognizes that all wealth is in goods, particularly in capital goods, and that these are not created by money, which is only a medium of exchange, but by the application of labor to materials.

The Allies had money but failed to produce goods. The Germans had no money, but did produce them.

To recognize this is not to accept the mystic race-domination, fanatical, Hitler-worshiping secular religion of nazi-ism. This economy was not designed by Hitler. Thorstein Veblen, an American, knew all about it; Henry George, an American, knew a great deal about it. As far as Germany is concerned, the man who first saw and practiced the facts about an industrial and engineering economy was Walter Rathenau, the coordinator of the German economy during the last war, and he was a Jew whom the Nazis murdered. The Germans were forced into it, because they had a will to conquest and no money. But the lack of money proved to be a godsend to them.

Third. The Germans are winning the war because, in spite of a complete political dictatorship, they have devoluted power to the places where power exists. Power is knowledge.

To take an illustration: Hitler wanted planes. The place to get planes is in the highly organized industries. In those industries were the scientific, technical, and engineering brains, and the skilled labor to produce those planes. The Government demanded the planes and demanded of the industries that they produce them—produce the blueprints, the models, and the goods. The designs were not made by bureaucrats, or tin hats, but by pilots and industrialists. If Hitler had had Mr. Ford, he would have told Mr. Ford to turn out the model he claims he can produce in clouds and masses; he would release to the fullest the energies in Mr. Ford's remarkable organization, and he would give Mr. Ford full freedom to see whether he could deliver the goods, without interference from bureaucrats or politicians.

The speed with which Germany rearmed lay in the use, coordination, and expansion of the existing plant, and the placing of responsibility where it belongs, namely, where the power is. It does not require dictatorship and a Gestapo to do this.

Fourth. The Germans are winning the war because they have a vision. That vision is appalling to us. They envisage Germans as the master race, setting a design for living for all the peoples of the earth. The vision is at the moment the basis of their communal morale, but before this world revolution is finished it will be the basis of the Nazi defeat. For it is not in harmony with truth and reality. They are not the superior race. They are not superior to the French, or the British. They are merely more numerous, more united, and have hold of a few truths which are universal and available to all people.

But one cannot oppose an ignoble and untrue vision with no vision at all. The Germans are strong because they can imagine this world as a small planet. They can imagine conquering it. And it can be conquered. The Germans today live in a totally different sphere of possibilities from the one in which the democracies have lived. (The democracies were not always so. Certainly this country was not always so. Once we believed with all the passion of our hearts that the ideals on which this Nation was founded were valid for all the earth. But that was long ago.)

We shall not survive this epoch unless we can conceive a vision as large as theirs, but truer and more real.

The concept of the supernation, being untrue, must die. But the concept of the union of all peoples in a world-wide scheme of things, in a planetary cooperative commonwealth, in which those things are denationalized which are not national and those things that are the special cultural values of individual races are given the freest expression, was a concept born in the democratic mind; it has failed only because of the failure of our will, because we have become complacent, provincial, and comfort loving.

Today the news is heartbreaking. But let us not think of today. Let us think and plan for tomorrow. Let us find each other—those of us who are not discouraged, and do not intend to be discouraged, either for this country or for the world.

The Chinese write with symbols, with what they call "ideagrams." And the Chinese word for "crisis" is "danger plus opportunity."

We live in the greatest epoch of human history. It holds the greatest possibilities for evil and the greatest possibilities for good. It can plunge mankind into chaos or liberate him into light. And everything in this world and this epoch is either given to us in and by Nature, or has been created by the mind and imagination, intellect, and soul of human beings.

And what is sown in tears can yet be reaped in joy.

Aid to Aliens

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 29, 1940

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON POST

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, this morning I observed in the columns of the Washington Post an article entitled "Miss Perkins' Aid to Aliens is Censured—Small-Business Men Charge She Saved 700 'Deportables.'"

This is a dispatch by the United Press from Chicago, the first paragraph of which reads:

> The National Small-Business Men's Association charged tonight that more than 700 aliens guilty of deportable offenses have been granted exemptions from deportation by Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins.

In this connection I desire to call the attention of the Members of this body to the fact that about 3 weeks ago I brought this subject to the attention of the Members of this body, at which time I specifically referred to a list of 700 names of alien criminals whom the Secretary of Labor had permitted to leave the country and to reenter legally in order that they might remain here permanently, taking advantage of what I claim to be a misinterpretation of the seventh proviso of the general Immigration Act of 1917. I therefore ask that this article be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MISS PERKINS' AID TO ALIENS IS CENSURED—SMALL-BUSINESS MEN CHARGE SHE SAVED 700 "DEPORTABLES"

CHICAGO, July 28.—The National Small-Business Men's Association charged tonight that more than 700 aliens guilty of deportable offenses have been granted exemptions from deportation by Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins.

Donald Despain, vice president of the association, said in a prepared statement that "practically all" of the aliens committed a felony by entering the United States illegally. His statement was accompanied by an official State Department list of the aliens and the charges against them.

"Instead of deporting these aliens, Secretary Perkins devised elaborate methods to keep them permanently in the United States. They were advised to move temporarily to Mexico or Canada, there to request new incoming visas, which then were approved by the Labor Department under special discretionary provisions of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917," Despain said.

"Section 3 of the act provided that an alien who had lived 7 consecutive years in the United States, and had maintained his American residence during temporary absence in a foreign land, might be readmitted to this country, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, without regard to certain exclusion laws. By the gross abuse of this old and forgotten discretionary authority, the Department of Labor has contrived to prevent the deportation of criminal aliens, as specifically required by other sections of the immigration statutes."

Despain said that some of the aliens who were readmitted to the United States "by this illegal device" had been deported previously as Communist agitators.

"Having later reentered the country illegally," he said, "these Communists now have the formal official protection of the Labor Department, by virtue of the abuse of Secretary Perkins' discretionary authority.

"Instead of using the immigration laws to protect the United States, the Department, in at least 700 cases, has distorted them to shelter deportable criminal aliens. Undoubtedly there are many more cases of this sort throughout the country which have not yet come to the notice of the country."

The Defense Program and Reclamation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, when the Nation was in the throes of the World War I, it was found that we were as woefully unprepared for furnishing food supplies to sustain our armed forces as we were to furnish arms and ammunition. It was a bitter experience indeed for a country with the greatest agricultural resources in the world, in order to have food for the millions of men under arms, to be obliged to place restrictive measures on use of food by our civilian population and materially increase our imports of foods from foreign sources.

TIME REQUIRED TO PREPARE

Regardless of our experience 23 years ago, it seems that we must learn all over again that it takes time to build factories for manufacture of airplanes, tanks, guns, ammunition, and war equipment. It takes time to recover and process raw materials that will be needed by the factories called upon to produce the equipment we need. Let us not forget that it also takes time to prepare the land, plant, grow, and process the food for our armed forces and our civilian population during a war period.

Suddenly everybody is demanding that we arm in a way that we will be fully able to defend our 130,000,000 people against attack from any combination that may be organized against us. Congress is appropriating billions for the purpose of doubling our Navy, for an army of a million men, for construction of 50,000 airplanes, with millions of rifles, big guns, and manufactured articles needed to equip our defense forces, but not one single word has been said about food for the men engaged in this vast program of preparedness.

ARMY MUST HAVE PROPER FOOD

Less than a quarter century ago we were thrust into a war situation and found that notwithstanding a so-called food surplus that was supposed to exist just prior to that time, the country was as ill-prepared for furnishing the classes of foods necessary to maintain an army as we were to provide arms and military equipment. The huge quantities of meats, flour, sugar, dairy products, and condensed foods were not available in the United States to maintain our Army without considering our civilian population, factory workers on war orders and their families.

FOREIGN PRODUCTS PURCHASED

Regardless of our need for ships to transport our Army and equipment abroad, we were obliged to go into foreign markets for food and transport it ourselves to the United States. As an example, you will recall that it was necessary to purchase the entire Cuban sugar crop because the country had not in peacetime been foresighted enough to encourage the production of sugar beets on a scale that would more than fill a small part of domestic sugar requirements. That same condition exists today as our mainland growers of beets and cane are producing less than 30 percent of our consumption requirements.

What happened to sugar prices as an aftermath of the World War is also well known to the housewives of the country, for they paid highly exorbitant prices for sugar in 1920. As a matter of fact, the only thing that stands in the way of sugar prices going skyward under prevailing war conditions is the small production of sugar beets on the irrigated farms of the West and the demand for allotment of additional acreage which would most certainly follow any attempt to boost the price of imported sugar.

IRRIGATED AREAS NEEDED TO STABILIZE NATION'S FOOD SUPPLY

This brings me to one of the main points I wish to make, which is that the irrigated areas of the West offer the major opportunity to stabilize the Nation's food supply, come what may. Droughts inflict themselves with periodic regularity on other agricultural sections. Should a drought come with World War conditions as they are now, the United States would be faced with a crisis more critical than it faces in unpreparedness in airplanes, tanks, ships, and other implements of war.

WHAT IS NECESSARY TO PROVIDE FOOD FOR DEFENSE

How can we meet this situation with respect to our food supplies and insure stabilized production? By continuing and expanding our reclamation policy. Reclamation projects under construction and recently approved, when completed, will go a long, long way toward insuring a stabilized food supply for the Nation, without having to resort to import during times of drought or war. Water storage reservoirs are needed to supply fully the need in many old settled areas of the West. People, generally, are under the impression that reclamation means only bringing new land under cultivation. As a matter of fact, a major objective of Federal reclamation today is to complete the supply of water for established irrigated areas, thus bringing land up to full crop production and insuring the preservation of established communities that are now threatened with destruction and desolation on account of shortage of water supply. Many of the larger projects now receiving the attention of the Bureau of Reclamation do not bring a single acre of new land into cultivation. I refer as examples to the following:

The Central Valley project of California.

The Big Thompson project in Colorado.

The Anderson Reservoir, Boise project, Idaho.

There are hundreds of farms in the West with highly productive land capable of producing feed for livestock, beef, hogs, and sheep, thus assuring fats and foods that are so vitally needed, that must have a supplemental supply of irrigation water. Water is available and can be impounded and conserved against the time of need at small cost, stabilizing production of vital commodities needed under the defense program, and will at the same time maintain the purchasing power of the West.

IRRIGATED AREAS IMPORTANT TO INDUSTRIAL SECTIONS

The reclamation program has been hampered by lack of funds. Opposition to increased appropriation is not so much the cost to the Government, as funds for reclamation projects are fully repayable to the Treasury by water users, but because of fear of adding to surplus of certain products, such as wheat, corn, cotton, and tobacco. This is another mistaken idea, which can be proven to the satisfaction of anyone willing to investigate. Irrigated areas add practically nothing to farm surplus of crops mentioned. I am including a table of imports into two Idaho counties having 340,000 acres of irrigated land. Records show that 9,740 carloads of goods were shipped into this section during the year 1939 and included 1,249 cars of food supplies, while the outgoing shipments during the same period included 32 carloads of corn, 1 carload of wheat, and no cotton or tobacco.

RECLAMATION PROJECTS SHOULD BE SPEEDILY COMPLETED

The Nation will need the food supplies from reclamation areas in event of an emergency caused by drought or war, otherwise we will again be unable to provide proper food for our civilian population and be forced to look to foreign lands for food for our armed forces. The Nation needs the great markets of the West in peacetime to assist in maintaining our domestic economy and in paying the tremendous costs of our defense program. The Nation must not neglect as a preparedness measure to assure itself of an adequate food supply, otherwise our great armament secured at such heavy cost will be useless.

In this crisis we cannot afford to neglect a great natural resource. I, therefore, ask that the program of the Bureau of Reclamation for conservation of water and power be continued to the full extent of use of every dollar directly appropriated by Congress, and that additional funds be allotted from defense appropriations in such amounts as will enable the Bureau to speedily build the projects needed to complete the water supply for lands already under cultivation in the West and Great Plains areas.

Roosevelt's Third-Term Nomination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE PORTLAND (OREG.) JOURNAL

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks by including therein an editorial appearing in the Portland (Oreg.) Journal of July 18, 1940. The editorial is as follows:

ROOSEVELT'S THIRD TERM NOMINATION MUCH LIKE AN APPLE WITH A WORM IN IT; ALL NOT AS ROSY AS APPEARS ON SURFACE

The nomination of President Roosevelt for a third term is an accomplished fact. His running mate will be selected today and the campaign will be on.

On the surface the apparent unanimity of Roosevelt's selection augurs well, but does it?

The people will not be gullible enough to swallow the draft. Long before the convention assembled it was known that more than 800 delegates were pledged to vote for President Roosevelt. For months delegates were in the course of selection, State by State, by convention and by primary election. In the great majority of these States the rank and file of Democracy wanted Roosevelt renominated. As the preprimary campaign ran on, President Roosevelt did nothing to indicate, as Senator BARKLEY was permitted to declare Tuesday night, that he, the President, "has never had and has not today any desire or purpose to continue in the office of President, to be a candidate for the office or to be nominated by the convention for that office." However, by his silence Roosevelt gave consent to the movement in his behalf. Thus more than four-fifths of the delegates went to Chicago instructed for Roosevelt. His eleventh-hour declaration, which Senator BARKLEY also was permitted to disclose, that "all of the delegates to this convention are free to vote for any candidate" was, indeed, an empty phrase.

Stripped of all window dressing, President Roosevelt, by indirection, sought and secured for the third time the Democratic nomination which 4 years ago and 8 years ago he won by direct methods.

During his two terms Roosevelt has bowled over precedent at will with the notable exception of the bold attempt to bring the Supreme Court within the spell of the New Deal by congressional action. He now challenges the 150-year-old tradition against the third term, an unwritten law of the Democratic Party since the days of Thomas Jefferson. Time will determine the importance which the people will attach to the third-term issue.

Determined opposition to the third term compelled Vice President Garner to enter the race months ago. He knew it was a futile quest, but so strongly does he disagree with certain trends of the New Deal that as he nears the close of two score years of public service he felt it his duty to so go on record.

Determined opposition to the third term likewise drove Postmaster General Farley off the Roosevelt reservation. The White House juggernaut, which owes much to Jim Farley, ruthlessly ran him down. However, Farley comes out of the convention stronger than he went into it. He kept the faith. Loyalties are not something to be bandied about even by the President of the United States.

Senator WHEELER's withdrawal from the Presidential nomination Wednesday afternoon, after taking a fling at the Roosevelt-controlled convention, by no means sounds a note of harmony. It may indicate a third-term defection.

Roosevelt's apparently overwhelming convention victory is like an apple with a worm in it; all is not as rosy as appears on the surface. The entire procedure smacks too much of regimentation and overweening personal ambition.

Why Willkie Got It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE COLUMBIA (S. C.) STATE

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a very interesting and timely editorial carried in the Columbia (S. C.) State paper of July 25, 1940, entitled "Why Willkie Got It."

This item is particularly appropriate in that it is almost impossible to pick up any paper from day to day without reading headlines, "Wendell Willkie," referring to everything on the face of the earth except the actual man as he is.

Of course, this is done for no other purpose than to cover up the main issue—that is, he is at the head of one of the biggest Power Trusts of the country—with the hope that the people may be induced to vote for Willkie as he was when he was washing dishes and driving cattle through the pasture, and before he became connected with the Power Trusts and Wall Street.

[From the Columbia (S. C.) State of July 25, 1940]

WHY WILLKIE GOT IT

After reading many accounts of the Philadelphia convention, the State concludes the nomination of Mr. Willkie was due to these causes:

First. The absence of any other strong Republican candidate.

Second. The appeal of Mr. Willkie to a large number of people.

Third. The smartest publicity drive ever put on by and for any candidate. A score or more of the top advertising and public-relations men were employed by or affiliated with the Willkie preconvention campaign. They set the stage perfectly. They played down the big-business connections of their man and played up his personality, including unpressed pants and uncombed hair. When a Morgan partner appeared too active in behalf of Mr. Willkie, these publicity and advertising men hung a screen between him and the public. A wonderful job of pressure selling.

These pressure sellers, being a little alarmed when people began to talk about the resemblance of the telegraph campaign to former lobbying efforts by big utilities, began to deny they planned it that way. Those tens of thousands of obscure grass rooters just happened to send those tens of thousands of telegrams to the non-Willkie delegates, even before it was generally known which were the Willkie and which the non-Willkie men.

And—this is interesting—the grass rooters knew the precise names, the hotel addresses, and even the room numbers of the non-Willkie delegates.

The pressure sellers haven't explained yet how small-town merchants and little farmers in Kansas happened to know the room numbers of delegates from New Jersey, but they still say the telegraph campaign was spontaneous.

Youghiogheny Watershed Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. BUELL SNYDER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 29, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE CONNELLSVILLE (PA.) DIGEST

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, including an editorial from the Connellsville Digest by the editor, Michael Pryce, I wish to say that the United States Army engineers are now well on their way in the construction of this $9,000,000 multi-purpose dam, which is being constructed between Confluence, Pa., and Somerfield, Pa., on the "Yough" River.

The first contract for the tunnel was let and the work is well under way. The second contract is about to be let. The purchasing of the land that will be covered by the dam is progressing rapidly.

Mr. Pryce, in his editorial, calls attention to the fact that the assessed value of the property that the dam will cover is $417,000, which will be just about as much as 1 year's value to the counties and people living within the "Yough" watershed after the dam is completed. In other words, the Army engineers estimate that the values in dollars and cents to the people in the watershed and those receiving benefits from the watershed will average $500,000 each year after the dam is completed.

After the dam is completed a year or two it will be with this dam just as it was with the Pennsylvania Turnpike. A group of men in Somerset County who style themselves as leaders and opponents of the Roosevelt administration were bitter in their protests against building the turnpike. For 10 years before the turnpike was finally started they were protesting against it. During the campaign for governor in 1938 they campaigned on the plank that if Governor James was elected they would stop the foolish thing of building the turnpike. But what happened? After James was inaugurated he thought he would not let them complete the turnpike, although it was not costing the State of Pennsylvania a single penny because the Federal P. W. A. and the Federal R. F. C. furnished all the money to build the turnpike—but the State of Pennsylvania had to give certain grants and titles, and so forth. Suffice to say that after different agencies pointed out to Governor James the wisdom of building this turnpike he gave in and in a short time was converted to the advantages of same and is now himself, we understand, advocating running the turnpike on to Philadelphia.

As for the group in Somerset County who 3 years ago—yes 2 years ago—opposed the building of the turnpike, they are the ones now who, if you were to shut down the turnpike, would be out in protest against shutting it. Many of the same protestors when work started went after jobs and positions in construction work that would enable them to make some money out of the building of the highway, and they succeeded in so doing. The same will be true of the Youghiogheny Watershed. When this $9,000,000 multipurpose dam is built, these protestors will be the ones who will be looking for the avenues that the dam creates wherein they can make some money.

The United States Army engineers know what they are doing at all times when it comes to building dams and conserving water, and so forth. This, the Yough Dam, is the place they list as being the outstanding dam of all the flood control and other dams being built on the upper Ohio. Drive down to Taggert Dam in West Virginia some Sunday and see what is taking place there. That will give you a little idea of what will take place on the banks of the Youghiogheny multipurpose dam 4, 5, or 6 years from now.

The editorial referred to above is as follows:

[From the Connellsville (Pa.) Digest]

"FROSTY SONS OF THUNDER" ARE ALL WET ON PROTEST AGAINST YOUGHIOGHENY RIVER DAM

A group of "Frosty Sons of Thunder" over in Somerset County have protested the flood-control dam on the Youghiogheny River below Somerfield as an unnecessary waste of millions of dollars.

They short-sightedly object to acquisition of land by the State and Federal Government which has an assessed valuation, they claim of $417,000. They fear that the acquisition of this land will prove a loss to Somerset County and eventually cause an increase in taxes.

The Somerset County farmers fail to see that $417,000 will be dumped into the laps of owners of land, not now of very great value from an agricultural standpoint. They fail to see that adjacent lands will be benefited materially by the large body of water that will be created. They fail to take into consideration that the owners of the land and houses to be taken over by the State and Government, will buy other lands and erect modern homes and farm buildings of much greater value than now exists. The Somerset County protesters are nearsighted. They fail to see that by the creation of the Youghiogheny lake that thousands of summer tourists are going to be attracted that way and that hundreds of cottages will dot the banks of the new inland ocean and that the valuation of these alone will increase Somerset's tax revenue several times as much as they fear will be lost in the acquisition of lands for the dam.

The Youghiogheny River Dam will make Somerset County. Improvement of the watershed, the reclamation of cut-over woodlands, and reforestation alone will eventually increase the land valuation in a great area of the county and thereby pay a good portion of the taxes.

The Somerset County Pomona Grange, apparently has not checked the loss against the gain. It sees but one thing, the loss of property valuations, estimated at $417,000, and steps there. Neither has the organization taken into consideration that hundreds of thousands of dollars will be paid to Somerset County workmen employed on the dam project. Those fellows are seeing red when the color actually is green. The grangers, because of their blindness to the march of time, appear selfish in their attitude to the communities that suffer big losses every time there is an abnormal flood.

Industrial life in the "Yough" Valley will be stimulated by the conservation of water for both industrial and domestic purposes, without which there would be little hope of attracting industry that requires a large and constant supply of good water. The Youghiogheny project means more to Connellsville and communities farther down the river than prevention against flood damage. It will be industry's guaranty of a constant and adequate supply of pure water, something that is absolutely necessary in many lines of manufacture.

The whole Youghiogheny watershed should and probably will be harnessed when the entire river program is completed. Then Connellsville and the "Yough" Valley will be sitting on top of the world. Somerset County will reap big benefits from those who will want to spend their vacations on its inland lakes.

Thank God for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 25, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, Rev. Charles M. Fillmore, of Indianapolis, Ind., is the author of a very inspiring new song entitled "Thank God for America." The first edition of this song was issued on June 6, 1940, accompanied by a notice stating that it was not published for profit. Since then there have been two more editions. The publisher's notice says:

The United States of America is one of the foremost nations of the world, a truth attested by abundant, positive evidence. We have better reasons than the citizens of any other nation for real, patriotic pride. We should cherish it jealously and cultivate it zealously.

One of the best mediums through which to develop this real kind of patriotism is song. Here is a new patriotic song, Thank God for America, that undoubtedly will come to rank with My Country 'Tis of Thee, with America the Beautiful, and with the recent God Bless America. It supplements others by emphasizing the gratitude which we owe to God for His many blessings to us. It will meet a sincere response from the soul of every true lover of our Nation, and find a hearty expression upon their lips.

The author of the new song has had a long and useful life of service, having passed his eightieth milestone.

In these times of grave national concern over the safety of our revered institutions founded on freedom and the rights of man, when in so many countries of the world liberty is being crushed beneath the heels of despotism and the lights of Christianity are going out, it behooves all of us to Thank God for America, and by unanimous consent of the House I present for publication in the RECORD the words of Mr. Fillmore's new song, as follows:

I

Thank God for America!
The good, old U. S. A.
Thank God for America!
And thank Him every day.

Refrain

God has blessed America
With all things fair and good;
We will show our gratitude
By living as we should.

II

Thank God for America!
The best place on the earth;
Thank God for America!
The land of highest worth.

III

Thank God for America!
"Sweet land of liberty";
Thank God for America!
Whose citizens are free.

Refrain (to be sung after last stanza)

God will bless America,
And bless the whole world, too,
As with Him America
Unites His will to do.

Encores

Thank God for America!
Our flag—red, white, and blue.
Thank God for America!
The strong, the brave, the true.

Thank God for America!
Both human and divine.
Thank God for America!
God's land and also mine.

EDITORIAL FROM THE SHREVEPORT (LA.) JOURNAL

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial of the Shreveport Journal of July 20, 1940:

[From the Shreveport (La.) Journal of July 20, 1940]

IT PAYS TO STAY PUT

The comparatively new State of Oklahoma has nine Members of the Lower House of Congress, including one elected from the State at large, and any one of them has been renominated in spite of the fact that they did not make any sort of personal campaign. On the other hand, the nine Congressmen from Oklahoma, sensing their duty to be paramount, stayed on the job at Washington throughout the campaign; whatever electioneering was done in their behalf, then, was done by their friends. There was plenty of opposition in every district, and no less a figure than "Alfalfa Bill" Murray undertook to grab the State-at-large job of Representative WILL ROGERS, but the voters took care of the men who elected to "stay put." The Oklahoma congressional delegation and the Democratic voters of that Commonwealth are entitled to commendation and to congratulations.

Financing Defense

ARTICLE BY W. A. OVERHOLSER

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, as I have said so many times before this, the basic foundation for true national defense is full employment of our people, our resources, and our industrial plant, and the key to such full employment lies in a system of national finance which will permit expansion of our money and credit, without increasing debt, as production expands.

The following article by Mr. Willis Overholser, appearing in the Waukegan News-Sun, will carry the same message, and I am pleased to include it with my remarks:

[From the Waukegan (Ill.) News-Sun of July 19, 1940]

FINANCING DEFENSE—MEETING CHANGES IN A CHANGING WORLD

(By Willis A. Overholser)

Several weeks ago I spoke before a bankers' association on the need for certain changes in our money and banking systems. At the time the public press was full of reports from the battlefields of Europe revealing victory after victory in favor of the Germans. After the meeting one of the bankers told of a discussion among a group of people prior to the outbreak of the war.

He related that the possibility of Germany going to war was brought up during the discussion. Some elderly banker, who was present, spoke up saying: "Germany can't go to war. She is bankrupt." Afterward, and out of the presence of the gentleman who had made this remark, some woman in the group remarked in substance as follows: "I have traveled quite extensively throughout Germany and the other countries in Europe during recent years and it didn't look to me, from what I saw, as though Germany was bankrupt. As a matter of fact, Germany appeared to be further from bankruptcy than the other countries of Europe. Of course, Mr. ——— is a banker and knows more about financial matters than I do, so I may be wrong, but we shall wait and see what happens." The banker who related this remarked that in view of the German victories, and the equipment and supplies which she had, that it certainly appeared as though the lady was right and the old banker was wrong in the respective conclusions which they had drawn.

THE GOLD STANDARD

Measuring things by the old standards, the old banker undoubtedly was correct. Germany was virtually without any gold, and that means bankruptcy according to the orthodox views of international financing. But we are beginning to learn that the antiquated and deflationary gold standard by producing a curtailment of production, an increase in unemployment, and a stopping of the wheels of progress, is not the answer to our modern financial needs. There are good reasons for believing that the gold standard was one of the chief causes of the long list of bankruptcies of the past 15-year period. Nevertheless, there is a growing cry for a return to the gold standard. An example of this may be found in the articles by Harry Scherman appearing in the July 6 and 13, 1940, issues of the Saturday Evening Post. Both every advocate and every opponent of the gold standard will find it to their advantage to read these articles, although I wish to warn the reader that many able students of the subject strongly deny many of Mr. Scherman's conclusions, particularly those contained in the second article.

In the United States today we are endeavoring to embark upon a vast program for defense. The question arises as to how we are going to finance an adequate defense program. In that connection the question also arises as to how Germany, a supposedly bankrupt nation, financed the development of a more powerful war machine than those of the other nations of Europe, which were regarded as being in better financial circumstances.

OUTMODED FINANCIAL PRACTICES

The answer lies in the fact that the other nations of Europe, like us, kept on trying to adjust their production, distribution, and consumption to their outmoded financial systems, instead of adjusting their financial systems to their productive and consumptive capacities and to their distribution needs. Hitler, it appears, made these adjustments, although it does not necessarily follow that it must be done just exactly in the way that he did it for it to be done successfully. Certainly a dictatorship is no essential part of the making of the needed adjustments, unless through our apathy we fail to work them out until a dictatorship is upon us.

Dr. H. R. Fack, of San Antonio, Tex., who traveled in Germany prior to the war and has made a special study of this question, in a recent article, in which he pointed out that Germany had financed the elimination of unemployment and the development of its war machine through the actual exercise of powers conferred upon our American Congress under article I, section 8, clause 5, of our Constitution, stated among other things:

"As a progressive nation, we usually do not hesitate to adopt technical development, scientific discoveries, military strategems, or other 'darn tricks,' such as Mr. Churchill referred to recently, when they come from Germany or any other nation, just as the Germans are not fools enough to refuse to accept progress where they find it. We have even permitted ourselves to move strongly, under the Roosevelt regime, in the direction of regimentation, State interference with private economic life, emergency powers, etc., similar to Nazi Germany. Strangely, however, we have moved heaven and hell in order not to adopt Hitler's financial technique, which actually is the source of Germany's amazing economic rise and increasing power."

FINANCING COMPARED

Similarly, the monthly newspaper, Money, has stated the following, among other things, in its July editorial:

"Adolf Hitler learned early the power and possibilities of free money to release an abundance of war material and equipment. His teachers were Feder, in his own movement, the British expert, Arthur Kitson, and the German economist, Silvio Gesell. When he rose to power, Hitler was as keen on application as he was quick to learn. He soon saved all the waste of unemployment to use in production of planes, tanks, munitions, for the world war to come. These cost the Germans nothing since the labor went to waste, anyway.

"In contrast, take the case of Paul Renaud, last civil Premier of France, former Finance Minister, who always kept on his desk German marks of the inflationary period. When monetary reformers came to plead with the Finance Minister for free money to create arms to meet Germany, they were shown the worthless German money, warned that Hitler's money system would never work. Renaud was confident to the last that only 'sound' money could save France. * * *

"With her dying gasp, France begged for 1,000 planes, at once. The request was thought preposterous. Yet Henry Ford can make 1,000 planes a day. One day's work at one American factory could have kept life in France. But planes cost a lot, so we have not made them. The money system makes us stingy.

"France is gone. * * * History will say: They refused to monetize their vast resources, put their unemployed to work, and so create the spirit and the means of resistance; these great empires fell because they could not learn the power of debt-free money nor use it for their own defense and security. * * *

"Hitler geared money issuance to unemployment, stopped issuance when all were employed. Good enough, though, there may be better standards of issuance."

Dynamic America, speaking in a similar vein in its July issue, has also stated, among other things:

"The common people of France can thank their banker-politicians for their present plight. And the same is true of England. England did not prepare herself adequately for the present war because she measured preparedness in terms of pounds and shillings instead of airplanes, tanks, ships, and munitions.

"Reactionaries everywhere, trying to conceal their own responsibility for the break-down of peace and the destruction of democratic institutions, are attempting to shift the blame. * * * It was the totally irresponsible position of the French financiers who under the leadership of Bonnet held France fast to a gold standard for years after other nations had abandoned it, and thereby bringing on deflation and depression in France. If one wants to find the real 'fifth column' of France, one can readily find it in the countinghouses in the financial districts of France.

"The democratic peoples of France and England are deserving of a better fate than to be crushed under the heels of a brutal megalomaniac. But, unfortunately for these millions of victims of Nazi aggression, neither the French nor English people were able to throw off the yoke of a financial system which hastened the process of their destruction. We in America must not repeat the mistakes of the English and French."

Whether you agree with all of the implications contained in the foregoing statements is not important. It is important to realize that we cannot continue indefinitely to resist needed changes and adjustments. If we attempt such resistance then sometime something or somebody will sweep aside our most treasured possessions. It is the law of a changing universe.

God bless America! May she be saved from the stupidity of reactionary resistance to the fulfillment of modern needs.

Roosevelt Moves Toward Dictatorship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, our ex-international banker Fuehrer Roosevelt's third-term "blitzkrieg" is a major move to establish a dictatorship in the United States.

Laboring under delusions and hallucinations, Stalin believes that he is the only person in the world capable of ruling Soviet Russia. Hitler has delusions and hallucinations that he is the only person in the world capable of ruling Germany. Mussolini has delusions and hallucinations that he is the only person in the world capable of ruling Italy. President Franklin D. Roosevelt, the ex-international banker New Deal fuehrer, has delusions and hallucinations that he is the only person in the world capable of ruling the United States. Should Fuehrer Roosevelt's third-term "blitzkrieg" be successful, the world will then have another added to the long list of dictators on horseback.

Under permission granted by the House I incorporate the following exceptionally fine editorial appearing in Father Coughlin's July 29, 1940, issue of Social Justice.

RESULTS OF THE THIRD TERM

Most beneficial for America will the third-term nomination of Mr. Roosevelt prove to be.

The veil of secrecy and of hypocrisy has now been removed.

The lust for power and self-perpetuation has been exhibited.

In nominating Mr. Roosevelt for a third term, the National Democratic Convention—composed of jobholders predominantly—has gone on record for several things:

First, it has voted democracy out of existence, as far as it was able.

Second, it has voted for a dictatorship dominated by public servants and pork-barrel munchers.

Third, it has destroyed the old-time Jeffersonian Democratic Party.

And all this at the expense of honesty, forthrightness and decency.

Honesty was ash-canned when Mr. Roosevelt accepted the nomination after having protested that he had nothing to do with it.

Forthrightness was discredited through the activities of Hopkins, Ickes, Kelly, Hague, and the steam-roller politicians who attempted to practice deceit upon the listening public, as they rigged every movement of the convention.

Decency was decapitated in the manifestation of rowdyism, vulgarity, sovietism, and intemperance which characterized the convention.

If the American people want the perpetuation of a gang of job holders under the regency of a power-mad politician, that is the business of the American people.

And is all this democracy?

Is all this identified with the Constitution, the Bill of Rights, and the liberties which they safeguarded?

Social Justice does not think so. We believe that the decent element amongst the millions of Democrats of America will resent being hoodwinked, lied to, yelled at by sewer superintendents, and steam rollered by party politicians.

This decent element, with CARTER GLASS, MILLARD TYDINGS, Vice President GARNER, and a host of others will put patriotism above decadent partyism, preferring to risk the destiny of America to the guidance of Wendell Willkie.

Nothing more disgraceful ever occurred at any national convention than the imposition of Henry A. Wallace upon the electorate of America.

If Henry Wallace were only a dreamer, an idealist, and a political stooge, one could afford to be silent.

More than all that, he has proven to be a destructionist of the worst possible type.

It was under his jurisdiction that thousands of pigs were scuttled.

It was under his jurisdiction that thousands of fruit-bearing acres were plowed under.

And all this at a time when a great portion of our population was on the verge of starvation; all this at a time when President Roosevelt was more concerned with raising prices than with alleviating the hunger of our fellow citizens.

Yes; all this at a time when Henry Wallace was busy importing foodstuffs from abroad to the disparagement of the markets at home.

The nominations of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Henry A. Wallace will prove most beneficial to this Nation. It gives a clear-cut opportunity to the American people to decide between dictatorship and democracy, inefficiency and efficiency, partyism and patriotism, war and peace, depression and prosperity.

It was ironical to hear the job holders in the Chicago Stadium sing God Bless America after having poniarded the real blessings which are identified with America.

It were more appropriate had they substituted for those words, "God help America."

As for the platform written by the job holders and their delegates, pay no heed to it.

Platforms are written—as is history oftentimes—to be a conspiracy against the truth.

Woodrow Wilson was elected on the implied promise of keeping us out of war.

Franklin Roosevelt desires to be reelected for the moral certainty of getting us into war.

His deeds for the past 7 years speak more eloquently than all the unctuous words which are crammed into his platform.

I also incorporate the following article, entitled "Daily Worker," appearing in the same issue of Social Justice which refers to the activities of Stalin's Communist agents now operating in the United States:

"DAILY WORKER"

The Daily Worker, Jewish-Communist sheet, prints the following in its edition of July 15:

"A powerful drive to force the Department of Justice to investigate Father Coughlin and the Christian Front as the real 'fifth column' in America will be launched with a monster mass meeting on Wednesday, July 31, at Manhattan Center, Thirty-fourth Street and Eighth Avenue. Outstanding leaders from all walks of American life will address the meeting which is being called under the auspices of the Jewish People's Committee.

"Rabbi Moses Miller, national president of the Jewish People's Committee, today issued the following statement on the meeting:

" 'The acquittal verdict in the trial of the 14 Christian Fronters, followed by Father Coughlin's anti-Semitic incitement, has been greeted as a green-light signal by the anti-Semitic forces which are daily growing bolder. Events of the past few weeks have made it crystal clear that only a powerful and determined demand can force the Department of Justice to act. The people must raise their voices now. From one end of America to the other the cry must ring out: Investigate Coughlin now! Smash the anti-Semites, the real "fifth column" in America!'

"Support of the meeting has already been pledged by large numbers of trade unions and other progressive organizations which have set about rallying their membership to attend the mass meeting in the largest numbers.

"Tickets for the meeting will be sold at 25 cents each in order to insure the largest possible attendance. Tickets will be put on sale on Tuesday and can be purchased directly from the Jewish People's Committee at 1133 Broadway, room 1427."

The date of July 31 is very important to all persons living in New York, Brooklyn, etc.

The meeting is being held under the auspices of the Jewish People's Committee, a radical organization notorious for its "red" leadership.

Mr. Speaker, let us not forget that Fuehrer Roosevelt on November 16, 1933, extended recognition to Fuehrer Stalin's bloody red butcher government in Moscow, and on many occasions sent congratulatory communications on its birthday anniversaries.

The New Deal administration in Washington was so impressed with communism as preached and practiced in Moscow that shortly thereafter it commenced to advocate, effectuate, and emulate the planned economy of the Soviet conception of regimented bureaucratic autocracy. Shortly thereafter, in early 1934, according to the sworn testimony of the aviation expert, Mr. Anthony H. S. Fokker, before the Special Senate Committee Investigating the Munitions Industry, Mr. Elliott Roosevelt made a deal with Fokker to sell the Communist Russian Government 50 Douglas military airplanes of Lockheed make. Mr. Fokker's testimony revealed that the agreement which he signed with Mr. Elliott Roosevelt was a special agreement for the sale of these planes to Russia, and when questioned concerning why he had signed an agreement for such a large commission of $500,000 to Mr. Elliott Roosevelt and $500,000 to himself, Mr. Fokker explained that he had not felt that the prices which it was proposed to charge the Russians for these 50 military planes were at all reasonable and, in fact, he had thought them notably excessive, but that he had been persuaded by Mr. Elliott Roosevelt and Mr. Roosevelt's associate, Mr. Stratton, that Mr. Elliott Roosevelt had enough influence with the Export-Import Bank and the Russian Purchasing Commission, then in this country, to swing the deal at that excessive price.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Elliott Roosevelt, the son of our New Deal President, is truly a great liberal—liberal when it comes to spending the taxpayers' money in order to make money for himself. Mr. Elliott Roosevelt proposed, through the Federal Export-Import Bank, to raid our almost bankrupt Federal Treasury of millions of dollars to hand to Soviet Russia for the purchase of 50 Douglas military airplanes from himself and his associate, Mr. Fokker, each of whom was to receive $500,000 commission on the deal.

In the interest of the taxpayers of the United States and our country's national defense it is essential that we have a thorough congressional investigation of all foreign and domestic military airplane purchases in the United States since the New Deal disciples of Karl Marx have had control of our Federal Government.

Democratic Central Committee Proposes Suffrage Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

RESOLUTION OFFERED BY MALCOLM S. McCONIHE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the discussion of suffrage for the District of Columbia I am pleased to place in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of the resolution on this subject which was adopted by the Democratic central committee of the District of Columbia at a meeting in Washington on May 13, 1940.

The Honorable Malcolm S. McConihe, national Democratic committeeman for the District, offered the resolution which was passed unanimously. From this action came the introduction of the resolution by Melvin D. Hildreth, vice chairman of the Democratic central committee, when he appeared at Chicago and did excellent work as a member of the platform committee at the Democratic National Convention.

I have received from Walter F. Bramhall, secretary treasurer of the Democratic central committee, the resolution, which is as follows:

RESOLUTION PROPOSING DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA PLANK

Whereas the political status of the over half a million residents of the District is so completely at variance with the accepted principles of a democratic government, in that they are taxed by the Nation but denied any participation in the Nation's councils, a condition as unfair and obnoxious today as in the days of the forefathers; and

Whereas the District of Columbia with a population exceeding each of eight of the States, and a population of voting age in excess of each of 10 States, bears all the burdens of national citizenship including the payment of national taxes and the bearing of arms in the country's defense; and

Whereas during the fiscal year 1938 District citizens paid into the United States Treasury $27,660,524 in Federal internal revenue taxes toward the support of the National Government, which was greater than the payment by each of 24 States and more than the combined payments of 9 States, which 9 States were represented in the Congress by 18 Senators and 18 Representatives, and will have 36 Presidential electors; and

Whereas such un-American conditions prevailing at the Nation's Capital are violative of the cardinal principles of the Democratic Party and in conflict with our best American traditions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense and desire of the Democratic central committee of the District of Columbia that the delegates elected to represent the people of the District of Columbia at the Democratic National Convention, to be convened in Chicago on July 15,

1940, shall use their utmost efforts to prevail upon the committee on resolutions and the convention itself to insert the following plank in the forthcoming National Democratic platform:

"DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"We favor granting to the people of the District of Columbia voting representation in the Senate, House of Representatives, and electoral college."

What's Ahead for the Farmer?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE NORTH CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF COMMISSIONERS, SECRETARIES, AND DIRECTORS OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, serious as are the international problems which confront this Congress, we must not permit concern with foreign affairs to blot out our responsibility to improve conditions in the many domestic problems which continue to plague and perplex America. Of vital importance among these unsolved domestic problems is the development of a long-range farm program to provide something more than bare sustenance incomes for our American farmers and to open the doors of opportunity to farm families once again so they can receive a fair price for a full crop. Our farmers are entitled to a program enabling them to look forward to earning enough profits on the farm during the active periods of their life so that when old age comes they will have put aside enough to move to town and retire, as used to be the accepted American custom for the typical American farmer.

Because the farm problem is of such basic importance to our whole recovery program, Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD at this point a set of resolutions adopted by the North Central Association of Commissioners, Secretaries, and Directors of Agriculture at their convention held in Deadwood, S. Dak., July 19, 1940. These men represent a variety of parties and a highly significant block of farm States, and so it occurs to me that their unanimous observations will be of interest to the Members of this body who are working to secure equity, parity, and justice for the American farmer. These officials are in close touch with the farmers of their respective States and their findings reflect a wide cross section of farm sentiment regardless of political affiliation or place of residence. The American farmer is entitled to a fair chance and a square deal and this Congress should not adjourn before perfecting a permanent program by which farming can again become profitable in this country.

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES SET FORTH BY THE NORTH CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF THE COMMISSIONERS, SECRETARIES, AND DIRECTORS OF AGRICULTURE JULY 19, 1940, AT DEADWOOD, S. DAK.

We reaffirm our faith in the American system of government as the surest foundation of true progress, sound social security, and permanent general welfare. We must have tolerance and understanding among all groups of people. We are opposed to totalitarian forms of government. We believe in constitutional democracy. We believe that the unsolved problems here are even more threatening to democracy and the public than any European dictator. We believe a well-balanced domestic economy is our strongest first line of defense. We believe our Nation must stand ready to protect all of our citizens who are engaged in useful pursuits and investments so long as these investments are confined within the boundaries of these United States of America, and we also urge that the United States Fleet and the United States flag will never follow American investors into foreign countries. We believe that by taking the profits out of war we will do much to lessen the possibility of our engaging in it.

Effective organization of our military and economic defenses are the outstanding problems of our Nation in these trying times that lie ahead. Partisanship must not be allowed to interfere in these vital questions. In a world of armed totalitarian states our people will and must be called upon to make rapid and radical revaluations, a readaption of their mental habits. Democracy must now meet the acid test. It is for us the people who are privileged to be citizens of this great Republic to prove to the world that a government for and by the people cannot only maintain and continue to give us liberty and freedom but be efficient in times of great crisis.

Our first line of defense must be to put our own house in order. In this connection we wish to emphasize the fact that on the subject of preparedness the production of food and fabrics is of equal if not greater importance than the manufacture of arms and ammunition and that those who produce this food and fabric are entitled to equal consideration as to the compensation for these patriotic services. We demand that the American farmer be given the first opportunity to supply the American market to the extent of his ability to supply that market. The farm problem is an economic, a political, and a social problem of the first magnitude. The farm problem is everyone's problem. The farmer does not seek privileges but he does want an equal opportunity in our economic system. We believe that the problem of the ten or twelve millions of people that are now unemployed has its roots in the low income of agriculture; that our greatest problem is to make agriculture prosperous; that only as the farmer prospers can industry and labor prosper.

We pledge our support to a program which will produce cost of production net to the farmer on that portion of agricultural products consumed in the United States. Planned scarcity means national bankruptcy. We further believe that farm cooperatives are a powerful weapon in the fight against monopolies and we pledge to them our loyal support.

We favor the continued research and experimentation in the development of other than food uses for our surplus farm products and the manufacture of such surplus farm products into such other manufactured products as rapidly as they prove to be practical and economical.

We believe that the regulatory functions of government as they pertain to agriculture should be placed under the State departments of agriculture.

We commend the Federal Division of Plant Quarantine and Insect Control, under Dr. Lee Strong, of the United States Department, in their effort to save the farmers' crops from the destruction by grasshoppers and other insect pests.

IMPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS

Whereas, under existing trade agreements, large importations of foreign agricultural products, such as are produced in abundance on our own farms, annually enter the United States; and

Whereas such trade agreements are entered into by the Department of State, without hearings or study by Congress or either House thereof; and

Whereas such agreements, having the force and effect of treaties, should be studied and considered by the United States Senate, which is much more responsive to the will of the people than any department or bureau: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the North Central Association of Secretaries, Commissioners, and Directors of Agriculture, in convention assembled on this 19 day of July A. D. 1940, at Deadwood, S. Dak., That we request and petition the Congress of the United States to enact legislation requiring that all trade agreements be first submitted to the Senate for study and approval or rejection after the manner in which treaties are now considered and ratified or rejected by that branch of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the press of the Nation.

MATH DAHL,
President, Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor of North Dakota.

E. H. EVERSON,
Secretary, State Secretary of Agriculture of South Dakota.

RESOLUTION PASSED BY QUEENSBORO CIVIC CLUB, OF SHREVEPORT, LA.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution passed by Queensboro Civic Club, of Shreveport, La., on July 25, 1940:

Whereas the United States of America is now recognized as the last bulwark of democracy in the civilized world; and

Whereas on this 25th day of July 1940, Queensboro Civic Club, an organization of American citizens, desiring to promote the welfare of the community of Queensboro, a section of the city of Shreveport, Caddo Parish, as well as our entire State and country, have unanimously approved your proposed adequate national-defense bill: Therefore be it

Resolved, That our Federal Government should take all possible precautionary measures for the protection of our religious liberty, civic welfare, and for the promotion of democracy and the ideals for which it stands in the United States of America, and in the entire Western Hemisphere.

Thus done and signed at its regular meeting.

The Mythical "Jewish Vote"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES SECCOMBE
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. BRUCE BARTON OF NEW YORK

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hon. BRUCE BARTON, published recently in the Jewish Veteran.

THE MYTHICAL "JEWISH VOTE"

(By Hon. BRUCE BARTON)

There has been a great deal of talk about "unfriendly" cities and "unfriendly" people, but there's no doubt that any man who likes people can have as many friends as he wants. And he doesn't have to be aggressive or a "go-getter" either. He merely has to be a decent fellow and treat others as he'd like to be treated himself. The average American is probably the friendliest fellow on the face of the earth. Being an average American, with the traditional good-will and friendliness of the American people, his friends will be Catholics, Jews, and Protestants, Democrats and Republicans, Irish, English, Italian, or German, as the case may be.

Certainly the average American can never be accused of harboring ill will toward any person or group of people merely because of religious belief or national origin. But with his trusting good nature, the average American citizen is often an easier mark for rumor mongers than the average citizen of other lands. When the rumors are designed to set one group in the American scene apart from their fellow citizens, and especially when such rumors have not a grain of truth in them, they should be spiked as soon as possible.

A man in public life has an advantage over the average citizen in one respect. While he has the same sort of friends as the average man, from whom he can get a cross section of public opinion, his public office and his experiences while campaigning for office give him a considerably wider perspective. As a private citizen, I encountered one untrue rumor which I should like to refute on the basis of my experience as a public officer. The rumor I'd like to spike right now is the sort that everyone is supposed to whisper about, but the sort that no politician is supposed to discuss publicly. I refer to the so-called Jewish vote in New York.

Ever since I entered politics I've been hearing about the Jewish vote, the Italian vote, the Catholic vote, and all sorts of racial and religious votes. And my opinion is that it just ain't so.

There is no Jewish vote.

A majority of Congressmen in Washington are probably not qualified to speak on this subject, except in vague generalized terms, because there are very few Jewish citizens in their congressional districts. Since I represent the Seventeenth New York Congressional District in the Congress of the United States, I feel in a position of authority to discuss the roots and ramifications of the idea of a "Jewish vote." The Seventeenth Congressional District is at least 50-percent Jewish 'n population. I have run twice for office in that district, and each time my opponent for office was Jewish.

We've all heard talk about some sort of tremendously mysterious conspiracy or something, in which the Jewish citizens of the United States are falsely charged with getting together on every important and insignificant issue of politics and business and always sticking together. Naturally, they're supposed to vote together. That's what people mean by the "Jewish vote." If you want to know exactly what the "Jewish vote" means, you will probably have to trace the rumors back to their source. My guess is that all too often they will be found to have come in one way or another from the "fifth columnists" that are running around our land today.

As I say, I have run twice for public office. Each time, my opponent was a Jew, yet the religious question never once entered into either campaign. I ran for office as an ordinary American and laid no claim to any religious or nationality vote. My opponent ran for office as an ordinary American, and I'm sure it would never have occurred to him to call upon the Jewish voters in our district to vote for him because he was a coreligionist. No more did it occur to the Jewish voters of the district to vote for my opponent because he was a Jew. If there had been the slightest sign of Jewish solidarity in voting, if there had been any such thing as a "Jewish vote," I would be a private citizen and not a Congressman today.

I was elected by a substantial majority, in which there were thousands of votes cast by Jewish citizens. Without those thousands of votes cast by Jewish voters against my Jewish opponent, I could never have been elected. And yet I was not elected by Jewish votes.

I was elected by American votes, cast by Yankees, Italians, Finns, Germans, and Jews, all Americans.

We Americans are today proud of the national unity we have preserved so solidly in spite of "fifth column" attempts to destroy it by raising smoke-screen anti-Semitic issues. But our unity is a unity of free men in defense of democracy and the basic principles on which democracy rests. It is not a slavish subservience to a unity of thoughts and beliefs imposed by a totalitarian dictator. On all other issues, except the issue of the defense of American democracy, the American people will be found on both sides. So will the Jews.

Jews are Americans and divide on every political and social question like their fellow American citizens. I've heard some conscious or unconscious "fifth columnists" rant on about how Jews all support the New Deal. I ran for office in a Jewish neighborhood as a liberal Republican, not as a New Deal Democrat. If all Jews supported the New Deal, I would never have been elected to office. The fact that I am holding office now is incontrovertible proof that while some Jews may vote for the New Deal—which is their privilege as Americans—many thousands of others vote against it. Which is also their privilege, as Americans.

Jews usually divide in exactly the same proportions as the rest of the American population. That division applies both to prominent Jewish citizens and political leaders and to ordinary Jewish citizens, who react to every political measure in exactly the same way as their Catholic or Protestant neighbors.

The plain fact is that when Jews walk into the voting booths, they walk in not as members of a religious faith but as Americans.

I contend further that in the broad sense there is no Jewish problem. There is an American problem. The problem of preserving the foundations of this democracy—free speech, free worship, free assembly. If this is a good country for my children, it will be a good country for the children of every other American citizen, regardless of his or her faith. If it is a country torn by class hatred and sectional and religious dissensions, then it will be as bad for my children as for the children of my Jewish friends.

Untruths about the Jewish citizens of America, whether uttered with the best or worst of intentions, merely increase the possibilities of class, sectional, and religious dissensions in our country.

A strife-torn nation will be equally bad for the children of Jews, Protestants, and Catholics, and it is in the interest of every loyal American citizen to spike any rumors that might contribute to malice or misunderstanding among the various great religions of our country. If every misinformed but well-intentioned Catholic or Protestant refused to heed or repeat any malicious rumors about his Jewish fellow citizens, the rumors would immediately be traced to their sources. And those sources will inevitably be self-seeking demagogues who grind the ax of religious discrimination to further their own selfish aims of aggrandizement.

We need a different emphasis on the word "tolerance." We speak of tolerance in the negative sense. We say: "I don't like that man, but I tolerate him," or, "I dislike such and such a situation, but I tolerate it." If the man is evil, or the situation is unbearable, it should not be tolerated at all. Evil must never be tolerated. It must be eradicated, with every physical and spiritual means at our disposal. The religion of another man, unless it is a religion of evil, should not be tolerated, but should be respected and furthered. The Jewish faith is a noble and ancient one. It is entitled to respect, not tolerance.

The word "tolerate" is derived from the Latin tolero, tolerare, to lift, to bear up, to carry forward. It connotes a willingness to do something, not merely to accept something. I am tolerant because I want this country to be a united America, in which I, whose ancestors came from England a century and a half ago, can stand shoulder to shoulder with the man whose parents came here from Ireland or Germany, from Austria or Russia, a generaton or less ago; or with the man whose forebears were brought here as slaves from Africa. This is the glory of America, that we are all free and all endowed with "certain unalienable rights." Not merely a few of us, not merely those whose forebears happened to come earlier, not only those who happen to live on the right side of the tracks. But all of us, every man of whatever race, creed, color, or economic status. Let us not be satisfied with tolerance in the negative sense of merely refraining from hate. Let us have the tolerance which is a creative force for a finer and nobler civilization than the world has ever yet produced.

It is because I want this country to be free to work out its unique destiny that I am determined, as one Member of Congress, to vote to keep it out of any foreign war. And it is for this reason also that I hope we shall hear less and less, as our country matures in good will and understanding, about the so-called Jewish vote, which does not exist. I hope we shall hear less and less about the so-called Jewish problem, which is actually the problem of Jews, Catholics, Protestants, and all other Americans alike.

EDITORIAL FROM THE COSHOCTON (OHIO) TRIBUNE

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Coshocton Tribune of July 17, 1940:

[From the Coshocton (Ohio) Tribune of July 17, 1940]

HIS MAJESTY SPEAKS

His Majesty, Franklin the First, last night sent a high-ranking vassal, Senator BARKLEY, with a message for a thousand or more of his subjects gathered in Chicago.

This was indeed gracious of His Majesty. Up to this time he had not deigned to take the people into his confidence on the great secret. It isn't wise, of course, to let the people in on affairs of state. Tax 'em, rule 'em, regulate 'em, and tell 'em nothing—that's the system of Franklin the First.

Last night's message, like many another royal decree from Washington, is quite clever and needs a bit of interpreting. We therefore make bold to read between the lines.

The statements below are ostensibly what Franklin had to say in his message. After each statement, in parentheses, is the statement that we believe he really means.

Frankly, boys, I don't want a third term. (Frankly, boys, I do want a third term.)

No one has ever heard me say that I want the nomination, have they? (No one has ever heard me say, either, that I would refuse it, have they?)

All of you delegates are free to vote for anyone you like. (All of you delegates had better vote for me—and I mean all!)

I've never even announced that I'm a candidate. (Now, when the time comes I want you dopes to whoop it up plenty and make this "draft" business look like the real McCoy, not like a phony that was all rigged up ahead of time. Whoop it up and make me run for a third term. That's all you're here for. Don't kid yourselves that you have any choice in the matter.)

I release my delegates. Go ahead and pick somebody else if you want to. (Yeh, just try it. By patronage politics and other devices I've already killed off every guy that had a chance, so what the hell!)

I'm tired of being President and I'd like to retire. (But a great man like me has to sacrifice his own desires. You certainly aren't silly enough to suppose the American people are capable of governing themselves, are you? It's bad enough in normal times, but in a time of crisis such as this—why, gee whiz, mah frans, the country just can't get along without me!)

Army Reorganization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROSS A. COLLINS

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

ADDRESS BY COL. ROBERT R. McCORMICK

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered last Sunday night by Col. Robert R. McCormick, editor and publisher of the Chicago Tribune:

From the earliest of times we read of armies in the terms of infantry and cavalry; men marching on foot; men mounted on horses; and the ancient equivalents of artillery—instruments drawn by horses.

These are called the three principal arms and are considered as unchangeable as the principles of war are said to be. All military thought from the beginning of time has revolved around the speed at which these components could be moved. So it was that Napoleon could say:

"Read and reread the campaigns of Alexander, Caesar, and Frederick; model yourself upon them; this is the only way to become a great captain and to discover the secrets of the art of war."

WAR INSTRUMENTS CHANGE

But Napoleon was about the last man who could say so accurately. After his day the inventor and the manufacturer began to so change the instruments of war that the old lessons no longer held.

The industrial revolution which drove admirals crazy, first with steam, then with armor, then with torpedoes, dealt gently with the generals. Nothing new came into the army for a hundred years. Infantry goose-stepped up Unter den Linden; artillery fired in the Place de la Bastille; cavalry drilled in the horse guards.

RAILROADS USED IN CIVIL WAR

In the American Civil War, however, great strategic movements were made by railroad. The genius of Grant used speedy river boats and the railroad for the tactical movement of troops on the battlefield, but no one paid any attention to this example.

Said Von Moltke of the Civil War:

"This colossal conflict was but a matter of two armed mobs chasing each other around the country, from which nothing could be learned."

Generals blundered through the wars of 1864, 1866, and 1870 without perceiving the results of the slight changes in material that they had allowed to be adopted. The lessons of the war in South Africa from smokeless powder and high-powered rifles were but dimly perceived by the brass hats, who only saw in automobiles more comfortable conveyances for themselves.

AUTOMATIC WEAPONS UTILIZED

Came automatic weapons: The Gatling gun, the Maxim, and the Colt. Rapid fire and long range multiplied the battlefield in width and depth.

By 1914 the equipment adopted by European armies had passed far beyond the comprehension of the generals. Their maneuvers at a foot pace were nowhere able to pass through the fire of the weapons.

Inventors having outsmarted the soldiers, other inventors were called upon to break the deadlock. The classic conception of the infantry, that it must consist of men walking with individual weapons in their hands, could not be thrust aside, so mortars, machine guns, infantry cannon, flame throwers, and heavy artillery were added to the infantry equipment, while busses were taken from the streets, first to bring men leisurely up to trenches, then frantically to re-form broken lines, finally to set up a surprise attack. Tractors were introduced to draw heavy guns and to become tanks.

CAVALRY GETS INTO TANKS

Men fighting on horseback were shown to be utterly futile in that war. In consequence, except for a few animals retained to carry scouts and weapons in certain terrains, the cavalry arm agreed to get into tanks.

But 3 miles an hour remained the common denominator of the war colleges, except in Germany, where Von Brauchitsch, using flying boats and gasoline trains, as Grant had used river boats and railroad trains, scored another Vicksburg and another Appomattox.

Now we have infantry in tanks and cavalry in tanks.

Shall the infantry have the slow tanks and the cavalry the fast tanks? How slow and how fast? The infantry the big tanks and the cavalry the little tanks? How big and how little? Isn't this nonsense?

The terms "infantry" and "cavalry" have become anachronisms. When a tank carries a gun is it artillery? No? Is the demarcation, then, between a gun mounted on a tractor and one fastened behind it? And are we to have artillery guns, infantry guns, cavalry guns, tank guns, antitank guns, aviation guns, and antiaviation guns? Confusion worse confounded. Furthermore, aerial bombardment does not use cannon at all. The artillery arm has ceased to exist. It has burst into fragments.

INFANTRY, CAVALRY, ARTILLERY

Infantry, cavalry, artillery! Alexander, Caesar, and Napoleon! All equally dead. We cannot cramp the creations of inventive genius into the coffins of the past.

I subscribe to General Miles' statement, that:

"Fundamentally our concepts of basic military facts are proved to be largely in error."

We no longer have an army composed of three arms: Men walking, men riding on horses, and guns drawn by horses. Our organization of infantry, cavalry, and artillery is as obsolete as the organization of the fleet of sailing ships and fire boats in Decatur's day. We have an infinite complexity of machines bearing men, and still more intricate machines.

HOW SHALL ARMY BE DIVIDED?

As I showed last week, an air force that holds aloof from the other defenses is of little use. An air arm is as wrong a conception as the older arms. There are many forms of aviation tactics, and most of them are in direct connection with some element of the ground forces.

How, then, shall this new army be divided? Patently, all mechanics belong in one class, whether it be aviation, tractor, or truck. Aviators cannot deny that pilots and chauffeurs are one and the same, since the greatest of them was once a racing driver before he was a flyer.

Shooting is shooting, whether from an airplane, a tank, or a shell hole; whether the shooter is transported in a tank, a truck, an airplane, a parachute, or moves for short distances on foot.

THREE PRINCIPAL BRANCHES

The new three principal branches of the army should be, therefore: mechanics, pilots, and gunners.

Of our old services, only the engineers remain, or appear to remain.

The field fortifications of yesterday varied as little from Julius Caesar's as did yesterday's tactics. Now they belong in the museum.

To resist the charge of giant tanks and of heavy bombers, fortifications must be on a scale as undreamed of as warfare at 40 miles an hour was 30 years ago. These can only be erected by machines that can dig veritable canals and pile up great embankments in short order.

And so, while engineer officers must be versatile architects, the engineer soldiers again will be mechanics.

Until these changes from the dead past are made, Congress is wasting all its billions of money and its millions of men.

Nominating Franklin D. Roosevelt for President at Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. LISTER HILL, OF ALABAMA

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the remarks which I made at the recent Democratic National Convention at Chicago when placing in nomination Franklin D. Roosevelt for President of the United States.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We meet not merely to answer to our party's call but to answer the call of America in her hour of need. The Alabama delegation places its duty to the United States above and beyond all selfish aims. Our desire to put in nomination the name of Alabama's illustrious son, the temporary chairman of this convention, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the strong arm of the present Democratic administration in the House of Representatives, the Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, is overwhelmed by our desire, shared by the Speaker himself, that we put service to our country first. America needs loyal hearts today more than she has ever needed them in all her history. This is no time for untried hands to pilot the ship of state. This convention must name a leader whose record of achievements will inspire our Nation with supreme confidence.

Fortunately for us and for our country we have in our party a man whose courage is beyond all question, who came back from a living death to serve his country, whose proven will to live and to achieve matches the great will of the American people. The greatness of his vision is demonstrated by the roll of his achievements.

When the great banks and bankers of America were falling before a force beyond all their power and beyond all their imaginings, this man saved them. When millions of Americans faint with hunger cried out in their anguish, he gave them food. When strong hearts grew faint he gave them courage. Under his leadership a Nation milling in gloom became a resolute people marching toward the light of a better day and a better world. His heart made him a friend of the lowly; his deeds show him to be the friend of all, both great and small.

With such a man in our party there is no choice left to us. He alone is strong enough to match the strength of America against the avalanche of fate. If peace is possible—and I pray to Almighty God that it is—he can preserve it for us. If war is inevitable, he can win it for us.

If America is to survive we must all give the best that is in us and must demand the best of every American. We must be valiant, and we must demand valor. This man whose name I am proud to offer saw the approach of the whirlwind of disaster while it was far off. He has labored to make us strong, to keep us at peace, and to keep us free. He stands the symbol of the hopes of all the stricken and suffering peoples of this earth. In the name of the State and people of Alabama, in behalf of the people of the whole United States, and in furtherance of the cause of freedom and law and justice in a world at grips with chaos, I place in nomination that valiant American, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Democratic National Convention, 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. PAUL V. McNUTT

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the statement made by the Honorable Paul V. McNutt at the Democratic National Convention on July 18, 1940.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I want to express my eternal gratitude for the thousands of true and loyal friends who have accorded me such generous and loyal support. I would be both ungracious and ungrateful were I to fail to make some public recognition of their efforts on my behalf.

The State of Indiana, from whence I am proud to come, believes that our party is destined to be the vehicle by which the processes of liberal government are to be preserved, and in facing that responsibility it is above everything else necessary that we be and remain a united party.

Our party stands on the record of the last 7 years. It goes to the people under the leadership of the greatest peacetime President in the history of the Nation.

America needs strong, logical, liberal, and able leadership in the kind of a world in which we live today. We cannot take chances now. A nation only gets one chance these days. If it makes a mistake, it is lost. We must have leaders who have demonstrated what they can do, what they will do—men whom we know will keep this country safe and free, men who have been through the fires and have come out proven liberals and proven leaders.

We have such a leader in Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

He is my commander in chief, I follow his wishes, and I am here to support his choice for Vice President of the United States. I therefore ask in all sincerity that my name be withdrawn from nomination by this convention. I pledge my wholehearted and enthusiastic support to the Democratic Party and to the nominees which it is selecting on this historic occasion.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1940

ADDRESS BY FREDERICK G. HUGHES TO EMPLOYEES OF GENERAL MOTORS MANUFACTURING CO.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be published in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting and timely address delivered by Mr. Frederick G. Hughes at a dinner given in honor of many old employees of the New Departure plant of the General Motors Manufacturing Co., at Bristol, Conn., on June 24, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On each of the past 5 years since it has been possible for the New Departure old guard to gather together to celebrate our successful adventure in industrial good-fellowship it has been a great pleasure to welcome larger and larger numbers of 20-year men and women to this group of industrial heroes.

This year the new recruits number 121 and while 5 years ago we had 250 Old Timers, this year there are over 600—602 to be exact. We welcome you, old friends. None has gathered here who has not earned his or her place through friendship, loyalty, and good faith, these many years.

As we greet you who are newly added to our ranks we cannot forget that there are some who last year broke bread with us and having passed to the Great Beyond, now dining at the Father's table, are with us in spirit to inspire and guide us through the days to come.

During the year we have lost Gustaf Adolph Ahl, Frederick A. Bunnell, John C. Carter, Mrs. Ida H. Cook, James J. Corrigan, Gales P. Moore, Robert H. Muzzy, DeWitt Page, George J. Pearl, John Stotz.

Of these, two were among our oldest members, DeWitt Page and Robert Muzzy, each of whom had been with New Departure over 40 years. Each as a young man had thrown in his lot with this young company whose principal asset was a restless spirit of adventure.

Each grew and prospered as he contributed to the growth and good fortune of the company. I know that tonight as we honor these men who have gone on before, we feel as though we had lost elder brothers in whose advice and counsel we had trusted completely.

Especially is this true of the loss of Mr. Page who for 48 of our 51 years had exercised so tremendous an influence upon the life and success of all of us.

Coming to the New Departure Bell Co. a young man, poor in money but rich in courage, physically handicapped by impaired eyesight, yet equipped with the vision of a bright future to be wrought through his complete faith and trust in his fellow men, DeWitt Page brought with him boundless energy, coupled with a magnetic personality that converted him first into one of America's greatest salesmen and then in the hour of need into the leader who brought New Departure through difficulties to the forefront of industry.

DeWitt Page, himself a new departure in men, has left his imprint upon the life and character of every New Departure man and woman here tonight. To him no tribute we can pay will cancel the debt we owe to his leadership.

It is fitting that we should express our sympathy to Mrs. Page who a year ago with Mr. Page attended this gathering. I propose that we send her this resolution:

"Six hundred and two New Departure men and women who for most of their 20 or more years of association worked with Mr. Page in the upbuilding of this industry, remembering with affection his loyalty to them and their indebtedness to his foresight and leadership, express to Mrs. Page their deepest sympathy in her loss, in which they too have so great a share."

From the beginning these Old Timers' Dinners have had the nature of a memorial service for those of our old time associates who have passed to the Great Beyond, as well as a celebration for the service of those who for 20 years or more, by loyal cooperation and friendly association, have achieved maturity here with New Departure.

When last year we celebrated our fiftieth anniversary in this same hall, we looked forward to the years to come and said that with the same courage, the same loyalty, inventiveness, and resource we would press on to the unknown future, determined to master difficulties, to invent new things, to expand and grow, to do our share of whatever might come; that we as a group of men and women, engaged in earning a living and achieving happiness, might expect to continue to win through to success and brighter days.

We who for over 20 years have worked side by side together have learned that while not every day is bright and sunshiny, that every problem is not easily solved, that hills go up as well as down; we have learned that loyalty and friendly cooperation with each other ease the road that leads on to fortune.

We have known that for the last 10 years the way has been harder and the path to success in America much more difficult than in the years before, yet with courage we have fought through, perhaps not to the heights we once attained, but to a substantial measure of success and prosperity. All through those years we have sensed a change in outlook, not only in America but in the world at large.

In many foreign countries movements which claim to be the will of the common people, the spontaneous achievement of a common desire, and the effective expression of a democratic ideal through compulsory unanimity of popular vote, have nevertheless set up rulers as absolute as any monarch, Caesar, or czar that history records. These rulers at their personal whim are able to command the lifeblood of the people, first in regulative control and compulsory industry and then to make war upon those more defenseless than themselves in order that they might satisfy their lust for power.

All over the world we have seen the progressive deterioration of the idea of the individual as a person of importance; as an entity with the right to expect freedom, justice, mercy, kindness, friendship, and the right to live in peace with his fellows as a human being. While these ideas, so destructive of the individuality of the person and of his dreams of individual liberty and freedom, were being fostered under the dominance of the superauthority, there grew up in these countries a deep sense of national unity and purpose, a stiffening of morale, and, strange to say, a ready and universal desire to work hard and long for the accomplishment of the national ideal.

From such a Spartan regimen of discipline there grew up a sense of power; power not based on right but power based on might, power asserting itself as supreme over the rights of men, over the rights of weaker nations, a power strong and determined, a power realistic in its knowledge that the fit must naturally survive, determined that their nation should be the strongest and most determined to survive, even at the expense of the lives and property of their neighboring states.

While the ideology of the dictators was becoming supreme in central and eastern Europe, and even in parts of Asia, there was among the democratic nations, late allies and supposedly the victors in the war of 1914, a lowering of morale, a lessening of the desire to work, and the growth of the idea that pay comes before production. Among these sponsors of democracy, the people deemed themselves so secure in their freedom and their democratic privileges that they need no longer strive to preserve them, forgetting that freedom was only possible as it was earned. They began to believe that security, their prosperity, and a high standard of living, and even wealth and happiness, were gifts of the gods and not to be earned by work.

Thus, while dictatorships were becoming strong and powerful, the democracies weakened themselves all over the world, including America, by pursuing false gods and dallying with the idea of a self-perpetuating, unearned salvation.

It is not surprising that eventually the depredations of a strong and virile people upon the weak should soon become intolerable, and that war should break out between those devoted to the totalitarian ideal and those representing the democracies. The world for nearly a year has been in that war; nation after nation has fallen before the power of the dictators, and the democracies are sorely pressed.

On many occasions before I have said that America has been at war for the past 10 years, perhaps longer. America has been at war with herself, America has been at war with her own ideals; America has been at war—civil war, if you please—with the ideals of the founding fathers. The democracy that we claim to be has already been at war with democracy; the responsibilities of the individual for its preservation have been ignored in our desire to have comfort; America has been at war with common sense; America has been at war with the lessons of history.

I do not need to remind you of the battles that we have fought, so many of which remain to be won—battle of the depression, the battle of surpluses, the battle with debt, and the battle of unemployment. We are beginning to be convinced that the battle for security, whether it be internal or external, is not to be won by thumb-twiddling exercises.

In this war which we have been fighting too many Americans have been unwilling to fight the stern and hard way; they did not have sufficient moral courage to stand the gaff and fight through in the cause of honesty and straight thinking. They sought to find the easy way out—to find Paradise on a bed of roses with a cushion of false promises.

Now we see abroad the trial of a real war in which the weapons produce sudden death through bomb and shrapnel, not through the slow decay of moral fiber. We, who have set such store upon our comforts—are we prepared for the hardships of the preparedness sacrifices? Are we who lend and borrow with such liberality prepared to realize that preparedness cannot be bought with dollars alone, but is to be secured with the items of production, with things; with guns, with battleships, with planes, with motors—all the product of work, of labor not given to the pursuit of peace?

Are we sure we know the ends for which we would fight; and are we prepared to donate labor, materials, and endure the hard times, the sacrifices, which must be ours if we would make ourselves secure; or do we propose to run away from these new sacrifices as we attempted to avoid the depression?

We ask the question in the supposition that we have a choice.

Certain it is that industry does not want war; certain it is that people of intelligence do not want war; certain it is that the poor do not want war; certain it is that the rich do not want war—for the result of war is death, either complete or partial, not only for men and women, whether they be rich or poor, but for industries, for nations, and for all people.

America wants peace, America needs peace, not only abroad but at home, and America should be prepared to fight for peace—peace abroad and peace at home.

The fight for peace may be as hard and call for even greater sacrifice than to fight in a war. Either choice requires more courage, greater sacrifice, than Americans have been accustomed to make in the battle of the depression. We who have been accustomed to cozen ourselves with the sophistries of an easy life, and of riches gained through idleness, and coddled with the security of the promise that the wealth of the thrifty should provide for the old age of the lazy—we Americans, if we are to escape slavery, slavery either physical or slavery to falsehood and false ideals, we must wake up, prepare to go to work early in the morning and to work until late at night.

Salvation of any kind presupposes willingness to work to attain it. Without labor it is lost. To a people long grown accustomed to lollypops and ice cream a diet of fried potatoes and onions may be a real hardship. Are we prepared to endure it; are we members of the New Departure family prepared to do our part, essential as it is sure to be, for the salvation of this country of ours, the preservation of our ideals, our pleasant home, our freedom, and our liberties?

You who are here tonight have demonstrated your loyalty to the better things, loyalty to friends, loyalty to work, loyalty to honesty, truth, fair dealing—of you, one need have no question. We have learned in 20 years to be tolerant and long suffering, to be truthful and cooperative, to be inventive, resourceful, to be restless and pioneering.

Whatever the future may bring, those same qualities which have brought us this far on the road will carry us through, if there be anything left of truth, of faith, of all of the things that we have held worth while.

Sure as we are that the realities of peace in some measure must be foregone and that we must prepare the weapons of war, it is necessary that we trust in the honor, in the loyalty of each member of the family, to God and to his country as we prepare things even more important, even more essential, than bullets or guns for the winning of the battle. Whether it be bearings for machine tools or tanks, for airplanes or guns, for trucks or for tractors, we know that your appreciation of honest workmanship will show in the bearings which make it possible for the Nation to effectively defend itself.

While the products of our hands, the products of New Departure, may be in the first line of defense of the ideals, the hopes which have made America the refuge of the oppressed of all the world, back of these is our real first line of defense, that which we have grown to know through all the years as the New Departure spirit—the spirit of fair play, the spirit of cooperation, friendship, truthfulness. This has made it possible for us all, working together these many, many years, to have built on a solid foundation an industry worthy of the honor of defending our homes, our loved ones, and our country.

May God grant us courage to face the future, whatever it may be, as New Departure men and women, grown accustomed to struggle, work to victory. If God grants our prayers for peace, may we with that same courage carry on to new and broadening fields the banner of the New Departure pioneers.

'While for us in Flanders Fields
May no poppies grow in row on row,
Yet as one by one beneath the sod of these New England hills we go,
Heaven grant that they who live may know that here a hero lies,
Defender of the faith, his friends, his country, and, O God, of You."

Mr. Willkie's Candidacy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald of this morning, which is a reprint of an editorial published in the New York News of this morning, dealing with the candidacy of Wendell L. Willkie.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of July 30, 1940]

We publish editorials from the New York Daily News because, as we have said, we find them interesting, well written, and because we agree with the thoughts they express.

Today's editorial from the News is interesting and well written. With the thought we agree only in part.

WE AGREE IN PART

We are not sure at this writing which candidate for President we would like to see win. We think the question of which would make a better President cannot be answered until the wars abroad have reached another stage, as they are almost certain to before election time.

In one set of circumstances the United States may have to make such a drastic change in foreign policy that Mr. Roosevelt, with his record, would be an impossible leader to take us around the turn. Mr. Willkie, then, regardless of his sentiments or private view, would be the only one free to deal with the situation.

In another set of circumstances we may be so deeply involved in daily difficulties that a change in Presidents would be most dangerous to the successful prosecution of whatever policy may have been forced upon us.

To sum it up—we are going to wait and see. Meanwhile, we will print the News' well-written, interesting editorials, and add our own differences of opinion when we feel like it. Herewith today's:

THINKING OUT LOUD

Yesterday we read a piece somewhere, in which it was stated that 91 percent of United States newspapers are for Willkie this year, whereas 86 percent of them were for Alf Landon in 1936.

We don't know who made the count, but it may well be that 91 percent of the Nation's newspapers want to see Mr. Willkie defeat Mr. Roosevelt and are working as hard as they can to bring that about.

In 1936 the New York Daily News was among the alleged 14 percent of American newspapers which were for Roosevelt and against Landon. The question now before us is whether the News in 1940 is to be among the alleged 9 percent of newspapers favoring Roosevelt over Willkie.

We'll say at the start that the third-term issue cuts no ice in our thinking about this campaign. When this country in times as dangerous as these has a good President, it ought to keep him as long as it can or until it can get a better one, and too bad about traditions. The very fact that 91 percent of our newspapers are at liberty to curse the Roosevelt administration and demand a change shows the dictatorship talk to be absurd.

As long as the European war goes on, it will overshadow every public happening in the United States.

CHOICE BETWEEN INTERVENTIONISTS

We've sometimes felt that Mr. Roosevelt was too much of an interventionist; too much inclined to give other nations advice and scold all four of the gangster nations (Germany, Italy, Japan, and Russia) at once.

It was Thomas E. Dewey's isolationism that moved us to say some kind words for him when he was trying to sew up the Republican nomination.

But when Dewey began to make a pronounced hit with the western and midwestern farmers with his stay-out-of-it speeches, lo and behold, a lot of important eastern money shied away from Dewey and moved toward Willkie. And the fact now is, since Willkie's nomination, that Willkie's supporters include some of our wealthiest interventionists and some of our most powerful interventionist newspapers.

It looks as if Willkie is as much of an interventionist as the President. The President necessarily knows much more about national defense, and particularly about the Navy, than Willkie. Willkie, highly intelligent though he evidently is, can't have learned much about our Army, Navy, and air arms by being a corporation lawyer connected with big utility holding companies.

If we've got to choose between a couple of interventionists for President, the better choice would seem to be the better informed and more experienced of the two—meaning Roosevelt.

As regards domestic problems, we prefer Roosevelt far and away.

NEW DEALER; OLD DEALER

Roosevelt has made mistakes. Some of his appointments were not so good. The purge turned out badly for him. His handling of the Supreme Court issue was not adept. But Roosevelt has urged this country's thinking and acting in the direction we have to take, we believe, if democracy is to survive in this country. That direction is toward a wider distribution of wealth and away from the state of affairs where 10 men have $100,000,000 apiece and 10,000,000 have nothing apiece.

Willikie's crowd are against a wider distribution of wealth. That is why they hate Roosevelt so hard—because he's for it. Willkie's crowd feel that everything that happened before 1929 was ideal and that the depression was just a regrettable accident—that if we'd only stood by Herbert Hoover a little longer we'd be O. K. now.

We can't feel in our bones that this theory is correct. We think the New Deal has been and is on the right track.

Therefore, if the election were held tomorrow, this writer would vote for Roosevelt.

The picture of things may change between now and November, as often happens. Presidential elections in this country are usually settled sometime in September or October. But at this time we're for Roosevelt.

The Third-Term Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK SUN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the New York Sun of Monday, July 29, 1940, entitled "The Acute Angle of the Third-Term Issue."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Sun of July 29, 1940]

THE ACUTE ANGLE OF THE THIRD-TERM ISSUE

Most literate Americans are familiar with the historic high lights of the third-term issue. Washington, who could have had a third term, refused it. Jefferson followed suit in 1808. By the end of the administrations of Madison and Monroe the tradition against a third term for Presidents had been fairly well established. The fathers feared the return of a king as we fear the arrival of a dictator. There was an attempt to give a third nomination to Jackson in 1836, but he would not countenance it. Indeed, he favored a constitutional amendment which would restrict the Presidency to a single term. When Theodore Roosevelt was nominated in 1904 he announced that he regarded his service in the Presidency, to which he was elevated by the death of President McKinley in 1901, as his first term, adding that he would not take a renomination in 1908; nor did he. President Coolidge, who reached the Presidency similarly, and who could have been nominated in 1928 as easily as he had been in 1924, put an end to possible third-term talk by saying, in the summer of 1927, that he did not choose to run.

To find a partial parallel for the case of Franklin D. Roosevelt we must turn to the history of Ulysses S. Grant. It is a parallel to the extent that Grant undoubtedly wished a third term. The reasons were obvious. He desired to atone for some of the evils of his first and second terms; unlike Mr. Roosevelt, he was a poor man and he enjoyed the Presidential salary; his personal and political friends, like some of President Roosevelt's, wanted him to stay in the White House. But there were also friends, loyal supporters of Grant, who had eyes on the Presidency. Grant, a grateful man, undoubtedly had a thought for the ambitions of Republicans like Conkling, Oliver P. Morton, and Hamilton Fish. So on May 29, 1875, Grant wrote a letter in response to the demand that he declare himself. He said that he did not want a third term any more than he did the first. He wound up by saying:

"I am not, nor have I ever been, a candidate for a renomination. I would not accept a renomination if it were tendered unless it should come under such circumstances as to make it an imperative duty—circumstances not likely to arise."

In the timing of this declaration we see the radical difference between two Presidents who wished to cling to the Presidency longer than 8 years. General Grant, no matter what his personal desires, set other Republicans free more than a year before the convention. Mr. Roosevelt waited until the Democratic National Convention was in session and the nomination was in the bag for him before he authorized Senator BARKLEY to say that he "has never had, and has not today, any desire or purpose to continue in the office of President." As he did not refuse a third nomination this message was, in the circumstances, a bid for it. The Hull, Garner, Farley, McNutt, and other candidacies had already been nullified, a sharp contrast with the Republican convention of 1876, in which Grant's name was not presented, and in which, after a struggle among seven candidates, Hayes emerged the winner.

The third term will be a leading issue in this year's campaign, but the acute angle of that issue is the method used by President Roosevelt in his attempt to violate the tradition. He declared in his speech of acceptance that his friends knew that he was not a candidate and that he intended last September to announce this at an early date. But where is there a scrap of evidence? If it had been known that Mr. Roosevelt would not accept, his lieutenants could not have sewed up the State delegations one by one until he had a majority of them. The third-term workers went about their job as quietly as possible. When Henry A. Wallace let the cat partly out of the bag last October by saying that the third term had become a necessity he was gently chided by the White House for having made Mr. Roosevelt the victim of a prediction. It is evident that there was no victimizing except to the extent that a premature announcement by one of the President's intimates might clog the wheels of a personal political machine moving quietly toward its goal.

If Mr. Roosevelt had come out a year ago, with the frankness of Grant or Coolidge, and declared himself on the subject of the third term—even if he had said that the tradition was not to be respected by him—the country would think better of him than it does. But in his view the people had no right to know. If it be suggested that Mr. Roosevelt could not think so poorly of his fellow countrymen—"my friends," as he calls them—we have only to turn to the record. Mr. Farley called on him not long before the convention to learn the truth about the third term, and, presumably, Farley got it, but his lips were sealed. The public was not to be let in on the ambitions and movements of the President. But the palace guard knew and worked its head off to put over the third-term idea. Otherwise why was Farley replaced by Harry Hopkins at Chicago long before BARKLEY made the announcement that the delegates were free to vote for whom they pleased—a declaration which was swallowed only by the simple-minded?

It is all too evident that the third-term bee began buzzing in Mr. Roosevelt's bonnet long ago—perhaps years ago. He had only to keep silent and let his cohorts put the pressure of the Federal power where it would result in the election of delegates committed to him. The attempt to violate the tradition is painful to many, regardless of party. But the strategy of silence, the keeping of his own party members in the dark, must be particularly irksome to men and women who still may rightfully call themselves Democrats.

Glass Against Kelly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM NEW ORLEANS ITEM

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the New Orleans Item entitled "Glass Against Kelly," having to do with the booing of the name of Thomas Jefferson at the recent Democratic National Convention in Chicago.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GLASS AGAINST KELLY

When the veteran CARTER GLASS spoke at Chicago it was for two purposes: One, to nominate James A. Farley was a gallant gesture but futile. The second was to remind Democrats of the ancient opposition of their party to a third term for a President.

No utterance of Senator GLASS could be colored by personal ambition, not alone because of his age but because, should he live to 182 years Virginia would keep him in the Senate. As he stood in the withering glare of the klieg lights, holding the rostrum for support, his cracked old voice gained force as he appealed to his fellow Democrats not to forsake the teaching of Thomas Jefferson.

Thereupon burst forth a bedlam of boos and hisses. That marked the first time that any gathering of Americans has hissed and booed the name of the author of the Declaration of Independence. Many in the vast and sweltering assemblage looked on this scene in frozen silence. Chairman BARKLEY tried to put down the pandemonium, while the brave old Senator stood his ground as if he had been 7 feet tall and 21 years old.

Order was finally restored by the rising of a colored balloon from the hand of Boss Kelly of Chicago. Many of Boss Kelly's minions don't speak or understand English. They had never heard of Thomas Jefferson. They were there to boo, clap, whistle, or stamp their feet, on the Boss' order. But he had to give his orders in sign language.

After a tumultous few minutes, it must have filtered through even Boss Kelly's thinking apparatus that his hoodlums were doing a bad night's work. The balloon was released, order was restored, and Mr. GLASS went on to conclude his remarks.

The newest of naturalized citizens of the United States is entitled to the same rights as the descendants of those who came over in the Mayflower. And these poor misguided rowdies were not responsible for this shocking exhibition of disrespect to one of the Nation's founders. The men responsible were Ed Kelly and those new dealers who welcome this notorious boss into their inner councils.

Many a delegate who intended to vote for Mr. Roosevelt's renomination left the convention that night heartsick over the sorry pass to which the party of Jefferson had come.

The Virginia delegation sat like so many graven images throughout the strange proceedings. But when Mr. GLASS called on Democrats to stand by Jeffersonian principle the Virginians rose as one man and gave a mighty cheer for Thomas Jefferson and CARTER GLASS. And the Virginia standards waved on high for the only time during the convention.

Senator GLASS' words didn't make a dent in the well-armored political tank but they will be remembered by many who heard them. Some Democrats, on observing the delegates from the Old Dominion, may have paraphrased the words of the first psalm: "I will lift up mine eyes unto Virginia from whence cometh the light."

Suspension of Publication of Chattanooga News

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM PHILADELPHIA RECORD

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial published in the Philadelphia Record of July 29, 1940, entitled "Who Killed the Paper That Fought Willkie?" It is an open letter addressed to Mr. Wendell L. Willkie, and when Mr. Willkie replies I shall be very glad to place his reply in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of July 29, 1940]

WHO KILLED THE PAPER THAT FOUGHT WILLKIE?—AN OPEN LETTER

Hon. WENDELL L. WILLKIE,

1010 Fifth Avenue, New York City, N. Y.

DEAR MR. WILLKIE: Who killed the Chattanooga News?

Published by George Fort Milton, the Chattanooga News was one of the foremost liberal newspapers in the country, and one of a very few papers in the South which opposed you and your Commonwealth & Southern Corporation in your fight against the T. V. A.

Mr. Willkie, we ask you, "Who killed the Chattanooga News?" for two reasons:

First, because at Cheyenne, Wyo., on July 23, you declared that "a free and untrammelled press is one of the guaranties of democracy."

Second, because the Tennessee Utilities Commission found your power company, Tennessee Electric, guilty on 917 counts of "using unlawful devices" to destroy the Chattanooga News by illegally helping its competitor, which was "friendly" to your interests. Tennessee Electric was a subsidiary of your Commonwealth & Southern.

What is the truth, Mr. Willkie?

Do you believe in freedom of the press for all of the press?

Or only for those newspapers which do not stand in your way or in the way of your corporations?

The public is entitled to a clear answer.

You naturally know all the facts in this case—because the killing of the Chattanooga News took place while you were president of Commonwealth & Southern.

Milton's paper first supported T. V. A., then favored a publicly owned power plant for Chattanooga. What followed? We refer you to the records of the Tennessee Utilities Commission, which show—

(a) That your company withdrew its advertising from the Chattanooga News after a competitor, the Free Press, had been set up in business by a group of men whose chief stockholder was Silas Williams, an attorney for your Tennessee Electric Power Co.

(b) That your company was found guilty of turning over to this Silas Williams the sum of $10,000 "under the guise of counsel fees * * * all of which the said Williams shortly turned over to the Free Press in ostensible consideration for the issue to him of certain shares of stock."

(c) That your power company bought $19,303 worth of advertising in the paper set up to fight the Chattanooga News, and paid an advertising rate "far in excess of the regular rates"—about 25 percent higher—the only conclusion being that your company paid more than it had to as a subsidy.

(d) That your company granted a 5-percent discount on the power bills of the Free Press, even after they had become delinquent, and when, according to your company's advertisements, they were not subject to discount.

(e) That your company further gave indirect financial help to the publisher who was fighting the Chattanooga News by giving him 5-percent discount on the bills of some forty-odd grocery stores in which he was interested.

(f) That when the congressional committee investigating T. V. A. came across this whole episode its counsel, Francis Biddle, declared: "Tennessee Electric has been subsidizing the Chattanooga Free Press."

There were 909 other counts on which your company was found guilty of trying to destroy a newspaper whose policies it didn't like.

As directing head of the corporation in control of this situation, we'd like to hear your explanation, Mr. Willkie.

What finally happened to the Chattanooga News?

Surely you recall, Mr. Willkie, that it was sold by the sheriff to the Free Press, the same paper the Tennessee Utilities Commission said had been subsidized by your power companies.

The News was sold even though, in its last days, it was breaking about even while the company which bought it was then supposed to be losing money.

The News was sold even though its own employees raised $15,000 at the last minute by mortgaging their homes and cashing their savings in an effort to preserve their jobs.

The News was sold—and a lot of people are still wondering where its competitor got the money to buy it.

Sold, Mr. Willkie—and then killed. That was the fate of the Chattanooga News, the newspaper which stood in your way in Tennessee.

What could other American newspapers expect, Mr. Willkie, if you were to become President—and they were to oppose your policies?

Would they share the same fate?

You've been reading the papers of Mr. Justice Holmes lately. Maybe you observed his famous phrase, "Freedom of speech means freedom for the thought we hate as well as for the thought we love."

Freedom of the press, Mr. Willkie, means freedom to applaud you or to criticize you; freedom to support you or to oppose you.

From the time your company first turned on the heat of its financial power down to the very last kilowatt-hour, the Chattanooga News was no longer free.

It was electrocuted.

Maybe you'd like to tell us why.

THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD.

Kentucky's Self-Appraisal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 30 (legislative day of Monday, July 29), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM GRAND RAPIDS (MICH.) PRESS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I respectfully ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting editorial from the pages of the Grand Rapids Press of recent date entitled "Kentucky's Self-Appraisal." This editorial compliments a report of the management of the government of Kentucky by our most popular colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER] during the time he was serving as Governor of Kentucky.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KENTUCKY'S SELF-APPRAISAL

Since the government of a State is responsible to the voters, the work of that government should be brought before the voters in a form which can be understood by the majority. But State governments never have accomplished much in this respect. The Michigan Manual, published every 2 years, is mainly statistical and far too weighty for popular consumption.

Kentucky last year offered what may be considered a practical solution to the problem, in a paper-bound booklet designed with an eye to popular appeal. Inside the attractive cover are photographs, charts, and diagrams instead of columnar statistics. There is no monotony in the presentation of the material, and the pictographic make-up attracts many persons who otherwise would show little interest in their State government. There is evidence of a studied effort to avoid partisanship. Comparisons of administrations are omitted and the Governor's name appears only once, in the letter of introduction.

The report is organized on the basis of reporting each type of governmental activity separately, whether the job is to be performed by one or by several State departments. There are sections on reorganization, finance, highways, education, health and welfare, industrial relations, business regulation, conservation and agriculture, and Federal-State-local relations. The final section is entitled "Looking Forward," in which the unfinished tasks of the administration are enumerated, with an evaluation of proposals made both through the legislature and in organs of public opinion.

The publication is certainly inexpensive, and its value can hardly be overestimated, especially since it presents such an impartial picture of the situation to the people who have the chief right to know about it. The voters of Michigan might eagerly welcome such an opportunity to learn about their government in everyday language.

Timely Observations

HON. RICHARD M. DUNCAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE ST. JOSEPH (MO.) NEWS-PRESS

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article from the St. Joseph News-Press, of St. Joseph, Mo.:

TIMELY OBSERVATIONS

Wendell L. Willkie and Franklin D. Roosevelt should get together without loss of time and let all America know, as well as all the world, including the international brigand, Adolf Hitler, that America is back of Great Britain to the last ounce. All this "hooey" about neutrality is so much "guff." America has not been neutral from the very beginning and if anybody is loony enough to think Hitler believes us neutral he should be examined.

The United States should take immediate steps to protect its own interests. These interests include preservation of the British Empire. This is not pro-English propaganda. It is cold fact. If the British Empire goes to pieces, and well it may, the outlook for the United States is black. That is not meant to be too pessimistic, but it is exactly the situation as we view it.

We say again as we have said before no nation should adopt a foreign policy except inasmuch as it will serve her own selfish interests. All right. America's selfish interest is for the utter and complete defeat of Germany and the restoration of the nations Hitler has overrun in the last year or two. You pro-Germans will howl at that. You are afraid to come out and say you want to see Hitler win. You have not the courage to say that you are Nazi at heart. You hide behind the plea that we must not concern ourselves with Europe's age-old quarrels, that we are safe from all harm, and all that twaddle.

Adolf Hitler is another Attila, the Scourge of God, one of those inflictions of human fiends that Divine Providence permits on various occasions in the history of the world for His own mysterious purpose. Hitler was at first just a nuisance. Now he is a menace. And he is a menace to the United States of America. We are in the same position England was before Munich. We've got a great Nation which would like to see the world go on its smooth even way.

Surely, we all want that, but let's face facts as they are, not face fancies as we would like to have them.

The United States already has taken sides in this European quarrel. Hitler and all Germany know that the United States is unfriendly to the Nazi regime. Hitler and all Germany know we think the overrunning of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Poland, Norway, Holland, Belgium, Luxembourg, and France colossally criminal, a satanic lust for power. Let's not fool ourselves. What makes us think Hitler will go so far and no farther? His word! He says he has no intention of meddling in the United States. That's a laugh. His word is worth exactly nothing.

We are in for all the hell Hitler can give us if and when he subdues Great Britain. That is as certain as that Hitler beat France. Therefore it seems to us that we are a great big lumbering fat sleepy boy, waiting, waiting, leaning against a tree while the bully whips the other boys on the street one by one. What makes us think he'll pass us by? He'll take us on next. This is not red-eyed war mongering. This is a calm analysis of the way of dictators. They get drunk with victory. There is no turning back.

Don't fool yourselves that the German people would not follow Hitler in a war against the United States. He would get greater support than against any other foe, excepting perhaps Britain alone. Therefore let us quit this quibbling about whether or not we should jump in. Let's jump in and give Great Britain every ounce of support. We have—in the eyes of every German on the European continent—the name of being an ally of Britain. Let's have the game.

And let us go into this thing so earnestly and so strongly believing in the God of might that we annihilate Hitler and all for which he stands. This is unneutral. It is meant to be. We believe intensely that whether we like it or not America and Britain are allies and have been allies for many, many years. Our interests are closely intertwined. It is to our own selfish interest to see the daylight whaled out of Adolf Hitler, and we might as well get ready for the task.

Let's not blind ourselves. If Great Britain and France had been prepared and had jumped in when Hitler first ran amuck, he could have been brought to his knees. They were not prepared. France is reduced to the status of a third-rate power. The fate of Great Britain hangs in the balance. In the name of all that is good and holy, in the name of decency and justice, in the name of God and His cause, let America tip the scales. Let America tip the scales so that Britain's fate shall be decided in Britain's favor and in our favor.

Let America tip the scales that Hitlerism shall be destroyed as ruthlessly as he himself, this antichrist, has destroyed all that was good and fine and clean on the European Continent. Let us not deceive ourselves. Hitler hates America. Let Hitler destroy Britain and we shall have not a problem in economics, not a peaceful penetration through marts below the Rio Grande. We shall have war, plain war, hellish war, as only Hitler knows how to wage it. And he'll come down through beaten and crushed Canada or through treacherous, villainous South American routes. Let's not kid ourselves that those pseudosouthern republics love us. Rot. Let's face the cold fact that about the only friend we've got is Great Britain. Let's join hands with her and mop up on Hitler running loose like a madman escaped from a lunatic asylum.

Treasury Department Law-Enforcement Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

REPORT OF ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES TO THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, a very interesting report has just been made to the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the activities of enforcement agencies of the Treasury Department. A record that any enforcement agency can be proud of is that of the United States Secret Service, 97 percent of the cases tried in Federal courts resulting in conviction. As for income-tax evasions, 147 who were tried were convicted, 13 being acquitted. As part of my remarks, I include a statement concerning the report referred to. It follows:

Losses to the public through acceptance of counterfeit notes were reduced by 50.5 percent in the 1940 fiscal year ended June 30, as compared with the preceding 12 months, Elmer L. Irey, Coordinator of the Treasury law-enforcement agencies, reported today to Secretary Morgenthau.

This accomplishment by the United States Secret Service reduced losses to $145,644, as against losses of $294,057 in fiscal year 1939. It featured a performance report which revealed that marked successes against all crimes directed at the Treasury attended the coordinated efforts of the six agencies comprising the law-enforcement unit.

These agencies—the Secret Service, Coast Guard, Intelligence Unit and Alcohol Tax Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, Bureau of Narcotics, and the Bureau of Customs—which originally functioned as separate bodies, were grouped 5 years ago into a closely knit and cooperative organization.

Suppression of counterfeiting resulted from an intensive campaign instituted by the Secret Service and made fruitful by the voluntary enrollment of millions of citizens, Mr. Irey said.

Education was the keynote of the new attack, Mr. Irey observed. Acting on the premise that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," the campaign, he said, effectively demonstrated the truth of this adage, and proved that the major crime of counterfeiting can be curbed more successfully by the modern system of education than by investigation and prosecution after the crime.

The campaign, having for its slogan, "Know your money," demonstrated to storekeepers, cashiers, and the public the difference between good money and bad, and illustrated what should be done when confronted with spurious currency or its purveyors. The public, Mr. Irey explained, was eager for this education and grasped quickly the important points the Secret Service strove to make.

As a result, millions of citizens received their first instructions through the "Know your money" campaign, which made use of sound motion pictures, circulars, public meetings, radio broadcasts, the daily papers, magazines, and trade journals. Active cooperation was extended by the broadcasting companies, and hundreds of broadcasts were made by Secret Service personnel and chiefs of police, in which simple rules were given to aid in spotting bad money and professional passers.

Exhibits of counterfeit money were placed in banks where tellers were detailed by bank officials to explain its defects.

This widespread educational program was carried out under the personal direction of Chief Frank J. Wilson, and came, incidentally, during the seventy-fifth anniversary of the agency.

Secret Service arrests totaled 3,281 persons during the year. Of this number 2,222 were in connection with forgeries, 778 related to counterfeiting, and 281 covered a wide miscellany of crimes against the Treasury. In the previous year there were 3,985 persons arrested—2,598 for forgeries, 1,045 against counterfeiting, and 342 for miscellaneous crimes.

Of the cases that went to trial during the year, convictions were obtained in 2,897 instances, or 97 percent, while 893 cases were awaiting trial at the close of the year.

The loss to the public through acceptance of counterfeit coins during the year was $51,737.42 as compared with $50,325.42 the year before, while seizures of spurious currency not yet in circulation amounted to $94,589.

COAST GUARD

The United States Coast Guard, national maritime law enforcement agency, reported the absence of organized liquor smuggling during the fiscal year.

It found little or no bulk liquor smuggling by sea, the few isolated cases encountered being insignificant.

"This is evidence of the high state of cooperation between the Coast Guard, the Customs Service, and the Alcohol Tax Unit, and is a result of the accumulated deterrent effect of years of vigilant patrolling," Admiral R. R. Waesche, Commandant, declared.

A summary of the principal enforcement activities of the Coast Guard for the year follows:

Miles cruised by Coast Guard vessels	2,182,706
Miles flown by Coast Guard aircraft	1,219,082
Vessels trailed, prevention narcotics smuggling	4,510
Regattas patrolled	462
Vessels boarded	37,617
Vessels reported for violations	1,208
Fines for which liable	$217,619
Vessels seized for violations	18
Value of vessels and cargoes	$80,750
Radios sealed on merchant vessels	4,397
Armaments on merchant vessels inspected	603
Identifications of vessels in connection with neutrality	163,119
Illicit distilleries located	718
Still seizures with Coast Guard cooperation	75
Gallons contraband liquor seized with Coast Guard cooperation	1,358

BUREAU OF INTERNAL REVENUE

Special agents of the Intelligence Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue obtained the indictment of 360 individuals, including prominent and professional men as well as racketeers, for evasion of income and other taxes during the year. One hundred and sixty individuals were tried during that period. Of these, 147 were convicted and then, in addition to prison sentences, were fined $266,640. Additional taxes and penalties totaling $33,319,063 were recommended for assessment in cases investigated during the year.

Of the individual indictments, 52 resulted from attempts to evade the social-security tax. In addition, special agents were active in connection with violations of the National Firearms Act, and convictions of 37 individuals were obtained in the 12 months for this offense.

The outstanding achievement of the unit during the year was the conviction of Moses L. Annenberg, of Chicago, who entered a plea of guilty in April to charges of income-tax evasion. In addition, he agreed to pay $8,000,000 in settlement of his income-tax liability. In addition, Annenberg must pay 6 percent interest on unpaid balances. He is now serving a 3-year prison sentence.

An interesting case was culminated in January when Ralph Waldo Wagner, of Los Angeles, was convicted of evasion of income tax and sentenced to 2 years' imprisonment, plus a fine of $2,500. This taxpayer described himself as a "natural clairvoyant with remarkable talents for the benefit of humanity."

BUREAU OF NARCOTICS

Experience of the Bureau of Narcotics disclosed a sharp reduction in the illegal field of traffic in narcotics during the year.

Arrests for violations of Federal marihuana laws during the year totaled 2,796 as compared with 3,196 persons in the previous fiscal period. In addition, 788 persons were arrested for violations of the Marihuana Tax Act as compared with 971 arrests in the previous period.

A marked decline in the amount of illicit narcotics seized in the internal traffic as well as a substantial decline in the amount of narcotic drugs seized at customs ports and borders was noted in the Bureau report. A marihuana eradication program in cooperation with other Federal agencies and with State and local authorities was continued, resulting in 7,805 acres of volunteer marihuana being destroyed in contrast to 10,391 acres in 1939.

Scarcity of narcotic drugs in the illicit traffic was further accentuated during the year, the Bureau reported. Such narcotics as are available are generally highly adulterated, it was found, and there has been a substantial increase in what were already exorbitant prices. The Bureau declared that at no time since the beginning of the enforcement of the Harrison Narcotic Act has there been such a sustained scarcity of illicit narcotic drugs as appears at present.

Functions of this Bureau resulted in a further disintegration of various rings engaged in the illegal traffic of narcotics.

Outstanding among these was the notorious Louis (Lepke) Buchalter who, in December 1939, was tried in the southern district of New York and convicted for conspiracy to violate the Federal narcotic laws. He pleaded guilty to nine additional indictments charging substantive violations of the Federal narcotic laws and received a sentence of 12 years' imprisonment. Buchalter had been indicted in November 1937, with some 30 others, as a result of an exhaustive investigation by customs and narcotics officers.

Another case involved Dr. D. M. Nigro and others in Kansas City, Mo. Dr. Nigro, along with several other members of the medical profession, was indicted in April 1940 for selling illicit narcotics without prescriptions. The Bureau found that the physicians were alleged to have been selling large quantities of illicit drugs to narcotic addicts simply for the gratification of addiction. Dr. Nigro, a city official, was tried alone in this case, found guilty, and sentenced to 4 years' imprisonment and fined $12,000.

In still another case indictments for conspiracy to violate narcotic laws and evasion of income taxes were returned in New York City against Charles, Harry, and George Neiditch, better known in the underworld as the Newman brothers. They pleaded guilty in April 1940 and were sentenced to 2 years' imprisonment each, and in addition incurred substantial fines. These brothers were considered by the Bureau to be ringleaders in the world-wide illicit narcotics traffic.

BUREAU OF CUSTOMS

Law-enforcement activities of the Bureau of Customs were again directed in large measure against the smuggling of narcotics into the United States during the year. Operating independently, and in some cases in cooperation with the Bureau of Narcotics and the United States Coast Guard, it seized a number of important narcotic shipments and apprehended many notorious smugglers.

Seizures of all kinds of smuggled commodities totaled 6,600, a decline from the previous year. There were 3,000 seizures of smuggled liquor, also a decrease. Narcotic seizures aggregated 600 instances, a drop of 302 under the fiscal year 1939.

Customs seizures in the Southwest indicated there was a trickle of Mexican raw opium and marihuana into the United States from Mexico. Seizures generally were of minor caliber.

Agents of this Bureau, culminating an extended investigation made on behalf of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation of the Department of Commerce, obtained and showed evidence of fraudulent registry of approximately 200 American vessels of various sizes during the year. These vessels, documented under the American flag as being owned by United States citizens, were found to be owned by aliens, principally Japanese. Many of the vessels have been seized and proceedings are pending against the others.

A summary showing the number of Federal prisoners committed to penitentiaries during the fiscal years 1939 and 1940 through the activities of customs officials follows:

Number:
1939	231
1940 (11 months)	203
Sentences to be served:
1939	324 years, 6 months, 11 days.
1940 (11 months)	168 years, 3 months, 3 days.

ALCOHOL TAX UNIT

A total of 27,099 prosecutions was recommended to United States attorneys in alcohol-tax cases during the fiscal year 1940. Of these 22,037 defendants were indicted, and 18,056 were convicted. Approximately 14,000 defendants were awaiting grand jury or trial action in Federal liquor cases at the year's end. Of the defendants indicted, 3,552 were involved in conspiracy cases, that is, cases involving major frauds on the revenue.

Comparative statistics for the Alcohol Tax Unit covering seizures and arrests for the last 2 fiscal years are as follows:

Seizures and arrests	Fiscal year ended June 30—
	1939	1940 [1]
Stills seized	12,050	10,661
Distilled spirits (gallons)	336,268	264,590
Mash (gallons)	8,076,461	6,480,150
Automobiles	4,109	4,066
Trucks	447	458
Value of property	$2,223,899	$2,042,883
Number of persons arrested	28,844	25,621

[1] Preliminary.

The report of seizures and arrests during the year reflected a general decrease in illicit operations. Compared with the previous 12 months, there was a 12-percent decrease in the number of stills seized, a 20-percent decrease in the gallons of mash seized, and an 11-percent decrease in the number of persons arrested.

An analysis of the data indicated substantial progress in the drive against moonshine violators in the Southern States. In the metropolitan areas of the North and East an increase in the activity of groups operating alcohol distilleries was noted. Despite this increase in activity the unit, through effective enforcement, further reduced the fraud on the revenue in this area.

After Mobilization—What?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

LETTER FROM LT. COL. A. H. STACKPOLE

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a letter from Lt. Col. A. H. Stackpole, of the One Hundred and Fourth Cavalry, Pennsylvania National Guard. In this letter Colonel Stackpole sets forth and explains a plan to utilize the State National Guards in connection with the proposed compulsory training program. Colonel Stackpole has had a long and distinguished career in the Army and in the National Guard, and the suggestions which are embodied in his letter are the result not only of extensive study on his part but also of collaboration with other members of the Pennsylvania National Guard who are interested in making more efficient the defense program of the United States in this present emergency. A careful study of the plan will repay every Member, I feel sure. Colonel Stackpole's letter follows:

AFTER MOBILIZATION—WHAT?

Indications point to an imminent mobilization of the National Guard of the United States, with active training continuing for a period of a year or more.

But when the National Guard marches away from its armories, what then? In many States, of course, there are plans for a supplemental force within the States, such as the Pennsylvania Reserve Militia and the Home Guard of New York. That system was operative in 1917–18, and it is felt in many States that it should be equally successful now.

However, it occurs to this writer that another plan might prove even more effective, embodying both the retention of a continuing State force and replacements for those in the field.

Briefly, the scheme is this:

Let us assume that on October 1, 1940, the Federal Government will have 235,000 National Guard men called into the field for protracted active training. This leaves the communities from which they are drawn without guard protection.

To immediately replace these 235,000 guardsmen, let a similar number be drafted and placed in the armories in the same numbers and organizations in which they have been withdrawn for field training.

Give these 235,000 new guardsmen 6 months of training in the same manner as the National Guard has been receiving for many years. Let them continue to live at home, thus in no wise disrupting their civil occupations or their schooling, and at the end of 6 months send that force into the field to supplement those already there.

As they leave, call up the third 235,000 and put them into training, and so on, each 6 months. Thus you have a constant reservoir of men trained only in the basic school of the soldier, with intensive specialized training to come upon their arrival in the camps.

If the international situation indicates that a continuing greater force of men under arms is not required, then the first contingents could be relieved after a year as the new men come in, and return to a civilian status, although still held on the reserve roles.

The chief objection to the scheme, that under the Constitution men cannot be called into compulsory military service by the Federal Government and then used as State troops, could be met through orders to State military headquarters to retain these troops within the confines of the States until further orders.

Briefly summed up, let us look at the plan thus:

1. The National Guard, 235,000 strong, is called into active service, by order of the President of the United States, on October 1, 1940.

2. Selective service replaces these men at once, in the communities where the present guard troops are established.

3. Six months later, or April 1, 1941, this "secondary National Guard" moves out to camp, and is immediately replaced by a third group for its 6 months of preliminary basic training at home station.

4. At the end of the year, or in October 1941, relieve the initial force, if the international situation warrants it, as the third 235,000 move into camp.

As to weapons, etc., it is understood that there would be an insufficient number of rifles, machine guns, field pieces, and the like, but this situation would improve as the months go by and Government orders are filled.

And all the time this plan is operative, States will have their so-called home-defense forces, and many hundreds of thousands of men will be getting the training so essential at the beginning of every soldier's career.

A. H. STACKPOLE,
Lieutenant Colonel, One Hundred and Fourth Cavalry.

The New Deal Procedure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the program of the New Deal can well be summarized in the caption of the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune:

DRAFT ROOSEVELT AND HE WILL DRAFT YOU

The administration's bill to register for military conscription all male Americans between the ages of 18 and 64 provides another evidence that Mr. Roosevelt intends to get this country into the war as quickly as possible.

Though the bill is still in committee, the War Department has already completed its preparations for the draft. The blanks have already been prepared and skeleton organizations to direct the registration are ready in each State.

If Mr. Roosevelt knows, or has any reason to believe, that an attack upon America is imminent, he ought not to keep the facts upon which his judgment is based a secret. If there were substantial reason to believe that within a few weeks or months a German force would be on its way across the Atlantic, there might be some excuse for drafting an army this summer, even though no arms were available for the conscripts to use.

But no such evidence of imminent danger has been provided, and common sense suggests that an invasion, however likely it may become in the indefinite future, is not now imminent. Herr Hitler seems to have the habit of calling his shots, and at the moment he is talking about London, and nothing else. It took him 5 years to prepare for his present wars. Not one of his airplanes would prove of value in a trans-Atlantic campaign, because none of them can fly the ocean with a load of bombs. He has not yet captured the British Navy, and at the moment is trying to sink it rather than seize it. If he gets it, many months and probably several years would be required in which to organize an expedition which would have any hope of a successful landing on our shores, even in our present state of unpreparedness.

As the new arms and an understanding of their use become available to the Army, and that means a year from now at the earliest, conscription of the young men of the country may be required. There is surely much to be said for it in principle; but the draft at this time can only interfere with the Nation's preparation for defense. It will divert the attention of the Army from the more pressing business of obtaining armaments and at the same time disorganize the productive capacity of the country.

Immediate conscription makes sense only if it is assumed that Mr. Roosevelt means to organize an expeditionary force within the next few months. Mr. Roosevelt's conscripts would not be ready for war against a first-class enemy, but they could take their place in the line in an emergency and, perhaps, before they were all killed off they could be replaced with men better armed and better trained.

Meanwhile conscription can serve Mr. Roosevelt in other ways. The departure of National Guard men as well as the draftees for camp will whip up the war hysteria upon which he is counting to win him his third term. The mounting excitement will make it easier to bring the country into war, and the knowledge that a million men are in training will give many people a wholly false sense of the Nation's military strength, encouraging them to undertake adventures for which we shall be insufficiently prepared.

At the same time Mr. Roosevelt will have been given a powerful engine with which to quiet opposition. Every man in the United States between the ages of 18 and 64 will find himself subject to orders from the White House. Citizens who may wish to argue that there is no occasion for war and less for the third term may find it expedient to keep their thoughts to themselves. The penalty might be an assignment to work in a factory halfway across the country.

It is difficult to believe that the President's conscription bill is going to meet with popular favor. It is difficult to believe that the people of the United States are not suspicious of the motives behind the scheme, and especially so in the absence of any clear showing of a need for the measure at this time.

The President assumes that Congress, like the Democratic convention at Chicago, will do his bidding; and already, before the legislation has been enacted, he evidently is making plans to send not only a half billion dollars into South America to buy surplus commodities but to send as well American citizens.

Mr. Roosevelt must always have his spending program, whether it be disguised as a relief measure, as a program to assist the underprivileged or the forgotten man, or whether it be a so-called preparedness or conscription plan.

On one excuse or another, he must spend and spend, for only by spending can he perpetuate himself and his new dealers in office.

Long ago as good a Democrat as Senator GLASS charged that the 1936 election was bought with the aid of public funds. Now, in addition to gambling with public funds, President Roosevelt desires to gamble with the lives of American citizens.

By his war-provoking utterances, by his warlike acts, he each day is making it more difficult for other nations to avoid retaliation, for us to avoid becoming involved in war.

Long ago it was written, "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

Well might we now ask, What will it profit America, if, by engaging in war in an effort to save the so-called "democracies" of the world, we here in the last great democracy lose our liberty?

If we wish to avoid a dictatorship, we will work unceasingly for the defeat of the would-be dictator, Roosevelt, who, in time of peace, would draft us for an unnecessary and avoidable war, but which his every act brings nearer.

Secretary Perkins Accused of Harboring 700 Alien Lawbreakers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LELAND M. FORD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1940

ARTICLE FROM LOS ANGELES EXAMINER

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Los Angeles Examiner:

[From the Los Angeles Examiner of July 29, 1940]

PERKINS ACCUSED OF HARBORING 700 ALIEN LAWBREAKERS—DESPAIN TELLS LIST OF ALIENS AND OFFENSES—ILLEGAL ENTRY AND FELONIOUS CRIMES LAID TO MOST OF THOSE DECLARED PROTECTED

WASHINGTON, July 28.—Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins was accused today of exempting from deportation more than 700 unnaturalized aliens guilty of deportable offenses against the laws of the United States. The charge was made by Donald Despain, of Chicago, vice president, National Small-Business Men's Association. Accompanying his statement was a copy of the State Department's list of exempted aliens and their deportable offenses, which, he said, had been made a part of the public records of Congress.

CALLS IT AMAZING

"It is amazing and shocking for American citizens to learn, while official Washington is calling upon the Nation to prepare for defense against foreign enemies * * * that over the last 5 years an executive department of the Government has been exerting unusual efforts to protect and keep within our borders hundreds of foreigners branded as criminals," Despain said.

He said Secretary Perkins, instead of deporting these aliens, "devised elaborate methods to keep them permanently in the United States."

"They were advised to move temporarily to Mexico or Canada, there to request incoming visas, which then were approved by the Labor Department under special discretion provisions of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917," Despain continued.

ALLOWS REENTRY

This provision, he said, allows the reentry of an alien who had lived 7 years in the country and had maintained his American home during a temporary absence, at the Department's discretion. Despain argued the purpose of the provision was to avoid hardships to law-abiding aliens who had lived orderly and constructive lives in this country for 7 years, but were temporarily out of the country in 1917 when the law was passed.

"By the gross abuse of this old, forgotten discretionary authority," Despain continued, "the Department of Labor has contrived to prevent the deportation of criminal aliens, as specifically required by other sections of the immigration statutes.

DEPORTED PREVIOUSLY

"Some of the aliens listed, who were readmitted to the United States by this illegal device, had been deported previously as Communist agitators."

He accused the Secretary of abusing her discretionary authority.

"In the first place, practically all of these aliens committed a felony by entering the United States illegally," Despain stated. "That fact alone made them deportable. In the second place, they have committed crimes of every nature while remaining in the United States illegally as unnaturalized aliens."

He said these crimes included perjury, forgery, smuggling, marriage-license fraud, registration fraud, theft, burglary, criminal assault, rape, bigamy, larceny, receiving stolen goods, procurer, conspiracy and extortion, fraudulent enlistment in the military service, shoplifting, manslaughter, embezzlement, and illegal entry.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1940

RADIO ADDRESSES BY HON. J. THORKELSON, OF MONTANA

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include three radio addresses given over the western Montana network on July 8, 11, and 15, 1940:

[JULY 8, 1940]

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, government must, to remain sound, be played according to rule. We have strict rules for baseball, football, golf, and various other sports. We take pride in adhering to the rules and playing the game fair and straight. Is it not much more important to take the same interest in your own Government and see that Congress plays square and sticks to the rules?

You and I get fighting mad when the rules are violated in a game. Why do we tolerate violation of rules by the Government? The rule you and I have given to our Government is embodied in the Constitution of the United States. We are safe as long as the Government adheres to the rule, but we become slaves to despots when the rule is violated. It is that condition that is developing today.

I shall take the liberty to quote the preamble, because it expresses the purpose of the document itself:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

These are the fundamental principles of our Government. Have they been observed? The answer is "No." The Union is no longer perfect, for that was destroyed in 1913. It is difficult to establish justice and we have no domestic tranquillity. We are not united in common defense or for the general welfare. We are instead ruled and regulated by minority groups. Liberty is destroyed day by day by the Government itself. This should be clearly evident as we consider Federal meddling, snooping, and persecution of private citizens.

We have a government with no head or tail—clearly incompetent and irresponsible. This deplorable situation is caused by failure to adhere to the rule—the Constitution of the United States.

This is the first of a series of talks on national defense, and tonight I shall begin by discussing industrial preparedness. The first requisite for national defense is self-sufficiency. We must produce our own food supplies and raw material, if possible. No army or people can defend themselves when they are starving; neither can we protect ourselves without arms and ammunition.

Instead of being self-sustaining, we are very much dependent upon foreign nations for food, as well as raw materials. In 1939 we imported 754,000 head of live cattle, 86,000,000 pounds of canned beef, and 105,000 pounds of fresh mutton. What would happen were we compelled to rely upon our own resources? Isn't it possible that many of us would be short of food?

In 1939 we imported 323,000,000 pounds of hides and skins, 134,000,000 pounds of cattle hides, and 64,000,000 pounds of sheep and lamb skins. What would happen if these supplies were cut off? Wouldn't it be much more sensible to allow our own farmers to raise this stock and produce the raw material?

In 1939 we imported 776,000 bushels of barley, 4,000,000 bushels of oats, 11,000,000 bushels of wheat, 70,000,000 pounds of wheat flour. This in spite of the fact that we can raise the best wheat in the world right here in this country. Suppose our supply were cut off in the fall of the year. Would we be able to sustain ourselves from the surplus now available in the United States? Or would we be compelled to reduce our rations?

In 1939 we imported 94,000,000 pounds of Irish or white potatoes and 11,000,000 pounds of potato starch, all of which can be raised on our own farms or produced in the United States. Do you believe your Government is playing the rules straight when they import this from foreign nations? Or is the Government playing into the hands of the international financiers who have interests in foreign countries?

In 1939 we imported 246,000,000 pounds of raw wool. Let us assume this import is cut off. Have we sufficient surplus to take care of us and provide clothing for our civilian and armed forces? I doubt it very much.

In 1939 we imported 5,500,000,000 pounds of sugar. Yet our own farmers are operating on restricted acreage and restriction in processing quotas. Sitting in the committee on the sugar hearing, I put this question to some of the sugar producers: "Is it possible for us to raise all the sugar we need?" Answer, "No." "How long would it take for us to develop sugar production to a point of self-sufficiency?" "More than 5 years," was the answer. In other words, with unlimited production, no restriction, it would take more than 5 years for us to develop sufficient sugar to take care of our own demand. In spite of this no effort is made to develop our own production; but we buy, instead, from Cuba and other foreign nations, no doubt because our international bankers have an interest in those countries.

In other words, the Secretary of State, to maintain a good-neighbor policy, sacrifices our own farmers for foreign agriculture and leaves us dependent upon foreign imports when we could be self-sustaining.

In 1939 we imported 16,000,000 pounds of flaxseed, 12,000,000 pounds of maple sugar and sirup, 59,000,000 pounds of cheese, 22,000 gallons of raw milk, 2,500,000 pounds of dried and malted milk, 16,000,000 pounds of casein, 329,000 dozen eggs in the shell—and we even imported over 48,000 tons of hay.

Now, then, this is a small part of our imports. And all are farm commodities that could be raised in the United States and should be raised in the United States in order to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of our people. Food is the most important item in our national defense, and should for that reason be produced in the United States.

I have discussed this purely from a national-defense angle, which of course is very important. However, do you believe it is good business to leave our own farms and our own farmers in poverty? Do you believe it is good business to develop foreign farming at the expense of our own agricultural structure? Do you believe it is good business to loan nearly one and a half billion dollars to South America for development of farm and other production in that country at the expense of our own farmers and production at home? The South American republics are in default on these loans to the extent of one and a quarter billion dollars. Do you believe it is good business to borrow this money from the international bankers, charge the loans, including the interest, to the farmers of the United States, and then loan the money to South American republics, when it is generally conceded that these loans will never be repaid to us, either in principal or interest? Wouldn't it have been more sensible to give one and a half billion dollars in gold to our own farmers?

It makes me smile to read about the efforts now made to prepare our Army and our Navy for national defense. Our statesmen seem to forget that the Army and Navy have to eat if they are going to fight. Our statesmen seem to forget that our enemy may prevent imports by blockade.

It is also possible that Argentina may need its own beef supply or it may even be bought by our enemy at a higher price. In either case, our supply is cut off, a situation to which we could not object. This holds good for all imports, for there is no assurance in case of war that such material is going to reach our own ports. It follows, therefore, that the most important part in national defense is in the developing of a self-sufficient and abundant food supply for our own people, and by our own farmers.

We must also develop strategic war materials, for such imports may also be stopped by the exporting nations. As a case in point, last year there was much discussion in Congress about developing strategic war materials in this country. Manganese was one of these materials. After much discussion Congress appropriated $10,000,000 to develop manganese. Did we get any part of that in Montana? No, indeed. A few hundred thousand dollars was spent in Virginia and the rest of it was spent in Cuba because the mines in Cuba are owned by the international financiers, who have no interest in developing the resources of the United States.

It should be clear from this that this administration is not interested in national defense except as a political gesture.

The best way to keep out of war is to be well prepared not only in a military sense but economic as well. We should therefore develop all minerals within the continental United States and in our Territories. Rubber, tea, and coffee may be grown in the Philippine Islands. We should import no competitive farm products. On the contrary, all farm products should be raised by our own farmers to meet all requirements in peace as well as war. This will not only leave us well prepared in a military sense but will also bring back prosperity, which we have lost by squandering our resources in foreign nations.

[JULY 11, 1940]

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, in my discussion last Monday I called your attention to an alarming increase in the imports of food and raw material that should be raised or produced in the United States. It should be evident that the first step in national defense lies in self-sufficiency. We must produce all food and raw material for our civilian and military populations. That can only be accomplished by removing all restrictions on farm and raw material production.

We must then, in order to protect our own industries, place a protective tariff on all competitive imports. We will be ill-clothed, ill-housed, and ill-fed until the unemployed go to work in private industry, and there will be no work in private industry until the farmer supplies our people with food and the manufacturer supplies us with merchandise.

Radicals should be eliminated from the councils of business and labor, for they are enemy agents or provocateurs. Dissension destroys the effectiveness of the industrial structure. There must be agreement between the real leaders of business and labor, for one group cannot operate successfully without the aid of the other.

No effort has been made in the last 8 years to bring harmony and cooperation in industry, and no sound or permanent aid has been given to the farmer. In 1936, under the pretense of increasing prices for farm commodities, the Government advised killing of livestock. Did the price increase? No. The prices and profits have instead declined not only on livestock but on all farm production. The Government then placed a premium on idleness; bonuses were paid for not raising stock and other farm commodities—a procedure which was bound to end in fraud and corruption.

Today, instead of being self-sufficient and self-sustaining as we were before the New Deal began to plan poverty, we are now largely dependent upon foreign countries for our food supply and raw materials. In order to make this clear, allow me to draw a brief comparison between the imports in 1938 and 1939.

We imported 424,022 head of live cattle in 1938, and 753,570 in 1939. We imported 3,829,000 bushels of wheat in 1938, and 10,774,000 bushels in 1939. We imported 45,859,000 pounds of white potatoes in 1938 and 93,859,000 pounds in 1939. We imported 274,250,000 pounds of hides and skins, cattle hides, sheep and lamb skins in 1938, and 521,329,000 pounds in 1939.

This increase in imports took place in 1 year and will, if continued, end in complete destruction of our agricultural industry. It will also, if continued, leave us totally unable to sustain ourselves should these imports be cut off. This may happen in time of peace, but it will surely happen in time of war, when all imports are cut off by blockade or by diversion to other nations.

Realizing the danger of such imports should a real emergency arise, I have opposed trade pacts and trade treaties. And so would all of you, did you understand their real background.

The first and most important step in national defense is an independent source of food and raw material, and the best place to develop these is right here in the United States.

One of the major causes for the present European war is density of population and lack of adequate food and raw material. This scarcity of food and raw material is felt most keenly in the central European states, and it is these states which suffer when the supplies are cut off by a blockading power.

We may well take a lesson from the present European war, for the central European powers are fighting to obtain territory which will furnish raw material and food for their people. What are we doing? We have already given up Cuba. We set Panama free and have promised independence to the Philippine Islands in 1946. We are importing ever-increasing quantities of food and raw material that can and should be raised and produced in the United States. We are, in fact, engaged upon a course of self-destruction which can only end in internal strife and revolution.

I have tried to warn Congress of this stupid policy without success. I now call your attention to it, in the hope you will interest yourself in your own Government and in the failure of Congress to protect your rights.

Realizing before 1939 that war would break out in Europe, and the necessity for national defense, I suggested on February 22, 1939, that we fortify the Philippines and the island of Guam. Such fortification would furnish a most efficient protection for the west coast of the United States and the Panama Canal. Neither side of the House supported this plan, and even defeated a $5,000,000 appropriation to provide a safe harbor in the island of Guam. It should be clear from this that I am not only in favor of national defense, but I proposed preparedness long before the President or the Congress gave it the slightest thought or consideration.

During the debate, one of my colleagues, Mr. COLE of New York, said: "But the gentleman said he favored fortifying the island, which is much greater than a submarine base."

And to this I replied: "I understand that, too. It is also the duty of Congress to provide for such protection, and justification for such expenditure may be found in the Constitution. Congress, of course, has the power to declare war, but Congress cannot always control and maintain peace, so it becomes the duty of Congress to maintain sufficient military and naval forces to assure peace. Realizing the danger of unpreparedness, the Constitution in these words makes it obligatory upon Congress:

" 'To raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia.' "

In continuing this debate I said: "These powers are very important for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 2499 and 2795, February 22, and 27, 1939.)

We have squandered over $30,000,000,000 on useless and unnecessary projects. Suppose that labor had been employed at regular wage scales in the construction of national defenses, as I suggested over a year and a half ago. Suppose the President had started this construction when he took office in 1933. Suppose a part of the $65,000,000,000 which the administration has spent in the past 7½ years had been used to build our national defenses. How free and secure we could feel now. We could have had a first-class army and navy, prosperous industries, full employment. What have we today? We have a stupendous political machine, dormant industries, and bankrupt business. We have nearly 20,000,000 people unemployed or on part-time employment. We have a debased currency. We are not only unprepared for war but we are totally unprepared to maintain ourselves while at peace.

What has become of the $7,000,000,000 which Congress has appropriated for national defense? We have 1 modern and 312 obsolete antiaircraft guns. We have 1 or 2 new cruisers and a few destroyers, the latter too top-heavy for practical use. We have built no fortifications or airfields along our coastal borders. We have less than 1,000 modern airplanes fit for combat use. The best airplanes we had have already been turned over to Great Britain.

If we include recent appropriations for national defense, it reaches the staggering total of $13,000,000,000—a sum which, in my opinion, should be sufficient to build up the best navy and army in the world. I am not opposed to this, providing the money is used for national defense, but I am opposed to squandering and wasting of public funds as has been customary in the past by this administration.

I thank you.

[JULY 15, 1940]

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, realizing that Europe could not avoid war, and our own unpreparedness, I recommended a year and a half ago that we fortify the Philippines and the island of Guam. Our Pacific possessions are not only valuable for military and commercial bases, but the islands will, when fortified, furnish a most effective protection for the west coast of the United States and the Panama Canal. It should be clear that no oriental power would dare to leave these islands astern for an attack on the west coast of the United States.

I have called particular attention to this because it should be considered in our plan of national defense. A first-class navy, of course, is important, but well-equipped naval and merchant-marine bases in our Pacific possessions are equally important because they would increase the fleet's radius of operation and striking power. Such naval bases would also be economical, because we could operate with a smaller fleet.

The Philippines and other Pacific islands are also valuable as commercial outposts and distributing centers of farm production and other merchandise to the Orient, India, and Australia. Storage space and warehouse facilities at conveniently located market points throughout the world are as necessary and important to our foreign trade as conveniently located and well-appointed stores are to us at home. To facilitate delivery it is important that our merchandise be carried in our own ships instead of foreign vessels. Just imagine the many delays and inconveniences we will experience when we depend upon foreign transportation for delivery of our merchandise. It is only natural for competitive nations to delay delivery in order to help their own export trade. As a matter of fact, this is exactly what has happened, for we have lost many foreign accounts as a result of overdue delivery.

Realizing that it is impractical to ship our merchandise in foreign vessels, and that deliveries will be purposely delayed in order to destroy our foreign markets, I have opposed the transfer and sale of our merchant marine to foreign nations. I have also opposed the sale and transfer of our fastest combat airplanes to foreign nations, for the simple reason that we need them for our own defenses.

When the Secretary of the Treasury and the President proposed the transfer of 23 of our naval ships to the British Government I made this statement on the floor of the House: "Congress should now take charge of the Government as it is supposed to do, and impeach the President for turning our warships over to a foreign power and weakening our national defense."

We should, in order to be in a position to enforce the Monroe Doctrine, own all British and French islands in the Caribbean, including Bermuda and the Bahamas group: Should we attempt to enforce the Monroe Doctrine in British possessions or Mexico, it would be no different from enforcing the Monroe Doctrine in South America, for it would, if not agreeable to the government in question, be tantamount to a declaration of war. As a matter of fact, England informed us last year that our regulation and control ended at the 3-mile limit. In making this statement, England was correct, for it is generally accepted that everything outside of the 3-mile zone is open water.

Realizing this, I have already suggested that we take over the English and French islands for the war debt, and invite Canada to come in for mutual protection and for consolidation and strengthening of North America. This would leave us protected from foreign invasion by water and from the north by land. We should also take over British Honduras and Central America.

We should also suggest that Mexico release Lower California as part payment on her indebtedness to us. Such transfer would provide additional protection for the west coast of the United States. The strategic value of Lower California should not be overlooked, for, fortified, it would make a Mexican invasion of the United States inconvenient.

I, of course, realize that my suggestion may prove objectionable to the internationalist, the Anglophile, and those hyphenates who still believe that the United States should again become a British colony, as advocated by Andrew Carnegie and Cecil Rhodes. However, I and others believe that Europe should pay her debt to us, and that can best be done by transfer of these colonies. The same thing may be said of Mexico, for it is high time that we discard our unsound "good-neighbor" attitude, in which we sacrifice our own welfare and the security of this Nation in order to have some foreign beneficiary say, "Uncle Sam is a swell guy. He is a real Santa Claus."

We have been dominated by the British Government too long, and what we now need is a patriotic American Government that will devote all its attention to the common defense and the general welfare of the United States. Our first line of defense is not in Europe nor in Asia. It is instead in our colonies in the Pacific, proximal islands in the Atlantic, and small states in North and Central America. It is only a question of time until we will be compelled to consolidate North America as a step toward our own security, so why not think about it now?

It is also high time that we set ourselves free from the Bank of England and its internationalistic lords, dukes, and noble exploiters. These international Shylocks are making their last stand in the United States, in defense of their empire of gold, a metal which we have foolishly allowed them to control and use to enslave us and enrich themselves. Our Federal Reserve banks and Treasury Department are today so interwoven with international finance and with the Bank of England that they are in reality operating to benefit this alien interest instead of our own people.

The victims of the British propaganda machine who still believe that we should extend further aid to England should remember that we have already given England the shirt off our back. British interests are holding over $13,000,000,000 gold credit in the United States. This will, when paid, reduce the gold in the Treasury to nearly $6,000,000,000. Against this small balance the Treasury Department has issued $17,000,000,000 in gold certificates to interests outside of the Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve banks, a privately owned institution. We are therefore a debtor nation to the international bankers, to the tune of $10,000,000,000 in gold. In other words, we are flat broke today.

And don't forget that our national debt is over $50,000,000,000 today, and will be over $70,000,000,000 by June 30, 1941, and that we are using commodity money or inflated money instead of secured currency.

The international bankers have taken $14.33 profit on every ounce of gold which has come into the United States since 1934, and this profit amounts to approximately $6,000,000,000 in gold. To those who still believe that we have not given enough, let me say that we are now financing England's war with credit, material, and merchandise. If this is not enough, let me also remind these generous givers that we are destroying our own farm and manufacturing industries by imports from foreign nations. This unsound procedure is regulated by the international bankers in order to establish such balance in the international credit structure as will favor their continuous control of gold and international gold credit.

All this is engineered by the international bankers, the real war mongers, in order to shift the cost of the war upon the taxpayers. This was done during the World War, and it is the same today. It is this small group that is the real rulers of the British Empire, the United States, and all nations in which they control gold money and credit. They operate through the United States Treasury, the Federal Reserve Banks, the Export and Import Bank, the Bank of England, the Bank of International Settlements, and all other associate banks, including international brokers such as J. P. Morgan and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. It is this monetary hierarchy that manipulates international gold credit in such manner that it always controls the gold. It operates in such manner that losses are charged to the taxpayers of all nations, instead of to themselves, in spite of the fact that they make the loans and are the real beneficiaries of all international transactions. In other words, the common people of all nations sustain and pay the losses, while the international bankers take all the profits.

I have exposed this control of gold money and credit because I maintain that gold is a property that belongs to the people of this Nation and not to a special private group. Surely no one will disagree with me when I say that we, the people, should be secured by the gold that is now owned and controlled by this small group of money changers.

Let us always remember that when we work for the bare necessities to sustain life we are no better than slaves, because we exchange today's work for today's living. When we work for gold, the permanent standard medium of value, we are free men, because we pay as we go and save for the future. We can do this only when our compensation is money of standard international recognized value—gold.

It is this freedom and security I want to restore to the people, and it can only be accomplished by setting the Treasury gold up as security for money in circulation. When that is done, we will again enjoy the use of sound money, the use of a dollar worth 100 cents in gold and 100 cents in purchasing value—the same dollar that we had in 1926, when taxes were lowered and our national debt was reduced from twenty-seven to sixteen billion dollars.

In conclusion let me say that I have always been opposed to war. I am not only bitterly opposed to it, but I have, as a Member of Congress, employed every means to get the people to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the articles inserted therein by my colleagues who are also opposed to war.

I am not only opposed to war, but it may interest you to know that I am willing to impeach the No. 1 warmonger in the administration, should he, accidentally or intentionally, hang on to the British lion's tail in order to provide an incident to drag us into the present British war.

Financial Responsibility of Certain American Republics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, the proponents of the good-neighbor policy indicate that the Congress will shortly be called upon to authorize and approve a new international banking structure with a capitalization of $500,000,000 to be provided by the people of the United States. The alleged purpose of this new institution, we are told, is to give further financial aid to our South and Central American neighbors.

This suggestion has attracted the attention of many thoughtful citizens of America. Mr. T. R. Frentz, Sr., one of the outstanding bankers of the State of Wisconsin and a lifelong advocate of the true principles of the Democratic Party, has written me an interesting letter on this subject. I am pleased to give to the Members of Congress and to the country at large the information contained therein. The letter follows:

Before you vote for the administration's modest $500,000,000 allotment to our "dear neighbors" of South America, this little spotlight on their financial responsibilities may interest you quite a bit.

PARAGUAY

In 1874 defaulted two loans.
In 1885 debt was refunded at 50 cents.
In 1892 again defaulted.
In 1921 again defaulted.
No quotations on their bonds.

PERU

In 1849 defaulted.
In 1875 again defaulted.
In 1890 entire foreign debt canceled.
In 1907 failed to make payments.
In 1915 internal debt also suspended.
In 1931 all debts were suspended.
In 1932 all foreign debts were again suspended.
No quotations on their bonds.

BOLIVIA

In 1874 defaulted two-thirds of their loans.
In 1877 again defaulted.
In 1931 again in default.
Quotations on their bonds, from 2½ to 6.

BRAZIL

In 1901 all interest suspended for 13 years.
In 1914 all interest again suspended for 13 years.
In 1931 all interest again suspended for 3 years.
In 1937 all interest again suspended for 3 years.
Quotations on their bonds, from 10 to 28.

ARGENTINE

Some defaults, some reductions in interest, but general record "fair."

Quotations on their bonds from 59 to 76.

CHILE

In 1928, defaulted.
In 1931, partial defaults.
Quotations on their bonds from 11 to 17.

COLOMBIA

Prior to 1905, all external debts were marked by adjustments and readjustments.

In 1932, 1933, 1934, interest payments were adjusted at 80 cents on the dollar.

Quotations on their bonds from 15¾ to 80.

COSTA RICA

In 1874, loans defaulted and reduced 50 percent.
In 1895, interest defaulted.
In 1901, again defaulted.
In 1912, payments defaulted until 1932.
In 1936, payments on external debts suspended.
Quotations on their bonds from 10 to 21.

GUATEMALA

Between 1828–55, debt was in default.
Finally compromised at between 75–80 cents on the dollar.
From 1927 to 1933, all manner of suspensions and compromises.
Quotations on their bonds from 35 to 42.

Nice record is it not? Ought to be easily entitled to a $500,000,000 "loan" don't you think so?

Hemispheres and Quarterspheres

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED A. HARTLEY, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

EDITORIAL BY MEADOR WRIGHT

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial from the pen of Meador Wright, distinguished publisher, author, and political analyst, of New Jersey.

In this editorial, Hemispheres and Quarterspheres, Mr. Wright has set forth some very illuminating observations concerning our position in world affairs.

HEMISPHERES AND QUARTERSPHERES

America's frontier on the Rhine—if we assume that we ever had one—has now been resolved by the rush of the German tanks. For better or for worse that phase in our foreign relations is over. The only part of Europe we could fight in today are the British Isles, and no strategist of repute would advocate an expeditionary force there.

But American public opinion is being prepared for another possible foreign venture that promises to be as fruitless as our last march into Europe. Like that one it carries a dual label: for security and democrary. Not mentioned in the schoolbooks but lurking beside the other two is a third factor—the ever fair siren of imperialism. The empire with which she teases us is South America. A fourth factor in the equation is the shibboleth that we have rights there as well as duties.

Even a casual examination of the facts will demolish all four of these factors. None can stand the light of honest rationalization. Collectively they fall down as completely as they do singly. There are no better reasons why American boys should die on the banks of the Platte than on the banks of the Rhine or the Marne. There are not reasons as good. Had the United States Army taken up a position in France last fall as many honest minded persons believe it should have done, we at least would have been fighting for ideals with which we are familiar and for peoples—Danes, Norwegians, Dutch, Belgians, French, and British—whom we admire. By reason of immigration and ancestral and cultural background we have a dozen reasons to be concerned over the fate of western Europe where we have one in South America. Fighting for their defense in a very real sense would have been a fight to strengthen and preserve democracy. One could haul away in a wheelbarrow all the democracy that ever was south of the Rio Grande, or probably ever will be in our time.

The so-called republics in Latin America have drifted from dictatorship to dictatorship during the century and a quarter that they have been free of European control. Some of these dictatorships, notably the Gomez regime in Venezuela, have been tyrannies unmatched since the days of Nero. Hundreds of broken and tortured wretches languished in the medieval prisons of Venezuela at the very time we undertook our last crusade to make the world safe for democracy. The Machado regime in Cuba was little better. The average government in Latin America is more enlightened than these, but democratic and representative government as it is known here and in western Europe is the meager exception rather than the general rule. Even if we attempted to arm South America for its own defense, there is a strong likelihood that many of these arms would be used either to make tyranny more complete or revolution more bloody.

As for cultural and racial ties, we have fewer than with any other section of the world, except Asia and Africa. The argument that by giving military assistance to South America we would be strengthening democratic government and ideals or assisting a neighboring or kindred people just simply does not stand up. The South Americans are neither democrats, relatives, nor neighbors.

Let us examine in the following order the other three factors mentioned above: (1) security; (2) imperialistic profits; (3) rights. The security of the United States rests on a continental defense, not a hemisphere defense. A proper continental defense includes the Caribbean Sea and the lands upon which it borders. The Caribbean ends roughly at the eastern boundary of Venezuela which is some 1,500 miles from the Panama Canal. On the Pacific the southern boundary of Colombia is 500 miles from the Canal. Obviously we have defense interests in these two countries which no outside nation would question. A declaration of policy guaranteeing their independence and even demanding naval or military bases there would be accepted everywhere as logical and proper. Ecuador and the Guianas might be included. But the remainder of South America just as decidedly is not within our defense sphere as the countries bordering on the Caribbean are. By making an imaginary claim to all of South America we are weakening the moral claim we have to that part which concerns us. Our area of defense should extend from Ecuador and the Galapagos to Hawaii and the Aleutian Islands on the west. On the east it should begin at the Guianas and include the West Indies, Bermuda, Newfoundland and Greenland. Within this area including the entire North American Continent we should demand the right to acquire military and naval bases necessary for an impregnable defense.

Likewise we should demand that the foreign and military policies of the nations within this area should conform to these defense needs. To facilitate this we should take steps to acquire any and all rights European nations have here. The nations involved are Great Britain, France, Holland, and Denmark. Three of these nations are now completely under the control of Germany with the possibility that the fourth may be soon. This gives Germany a claim—an immoral claim it may be noted, but a claim nevertheless. It must be remembered that England's claim to Canada derives not from discovery and settlement but by conquest from the French.

The most satisfactory way to acquire the rights of other nations in territory desired is by purchase. If we could exchange a billion dollars of our dangerously useless gold—or even five billions—for a clear title to all European claims in North America and the Caribbean it would be a good investment. If some of this gold went directly or indirectly to Germany so much the better. If Germany would not acquiesce in our title it would not be worth very much. No matter how much we dislike it or for how good reasons, Germany is the master of Europe and promises to remain so for many years. We must trade with her or fight her, either with weapons or blockade. Even if war is inevitable, which decidedly the writer does not believe, we owe it to history no less than to the boys who must die in that war and to their mothers to take every means within our power consistent with national honor to avoid it. It is not inconsistent with national honor to offer peace generously or even with some humility either to Germany or Japan, even though the hands of both may be wet with the blood of unjust wars. More blood is a poor solvent with which to wash away that which has already been shed. At any rate, as Gen. Hugh Johnson has observed, let us stay out of war until we are ready to get in.

As to the profits, those that would derive from an imperialistic policy in South America—and the Monroe Doctrine beyond the limits of defense needs is imperialism pure and simple—are likely to be largely illusory. Within the defense area outlined is territory approximately twice as large as the United States. In Venezuela and Colombia there is more oil than in any other section of the world. Mexico has mineral resources that are fabulous. Canada is a great unexploited frontier. Greenland and Alaska are potential storehouses of wealth. Like those of the United States, these resources are within our natural orbit. Whether through actual possession as would probably be the case eventually north of the Rio Grande, or as a sphere of influence as would be the case south of that river, these resources would make us richer than any other people. The area embraces just a quarter of the globe, contains 175,000,000 people, and has food and other natural resources ample for a population at least thrice as large.

Yet this area is not so large or so populous as to make it impossible for us to monopolize trade if such monopoly should be necessary to prevent foreign penetration. President Roosevelt's proposed cartel system of purchase could be made applicable north of the Caribbean. If extended to embrace all of South America it would serve no purpose other than to bankrupt us and disappoint South America. We simply cannot absorb a major portion of what South America has to sell. She wants markets for grain, cotton, meat, hides, wool, and minerals. Most of these commodities we have in abundance, we do not need them, while Europe does.

Europe is South America's natural market and must remain so for the next half century. While Europe was at war between 1914 and 1918, we captured much of South America's trade. But we lost it as soon as conditions in Europe were normal, and a great deal of our investments along with it. Businessmen who have had dealings in South America are aware of the difficulties of trying to sell when we are not willing to buy. The general public is not aware of these difficulties and hence is gullible to the argument that with European markets closed to us because of totalitarian control—an assumption by no means necessarily true—we must cultivate trade with South America to avoid the poverty of complete commercial isolation.

Lastly, what about our rights in South America above those of European nations? Claim to special rights are based upon two factors, one historic and one geographic. The historic factor is the Monroe Doctrine. This doctrine, as every well-informed schoolboy knows, was proposed originally by Great Britain and has remained without serious challenge for a century, only because British naval supremacy has not been challenged during that period. Withdraw the British Navy and the Monroe Doctrine is as strong as the force with which we will back it up and no stronger. Attempting to defend South America below the Caribbean will require a naval and air force larger than the combined forces that might be brought against us both from the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Natal, the easternmost point of Brazil is only 1,400 miles from the African coast, already two-thirds of the way under German control. But Natal is 3,000 miles even from the Panama Canal, and twice that distance from New York. The only geographic claim we have to South America is that North and South America are in the same hemisphere. This claim is so flimsy as to be ludicrous. If we should follow this argument to its natural conclusion, we would claim that portion of Antarctica lying within the so-called Western Hemisphere and instruct Admiral Byrd to build a Maginot line of fortifications square through the center to protect that claim.

If the United States has no legitimate claim to hegemony in South America, what about other nations? Only four nations have sent immigrants to South America in any considerable numbers—Spain, Portugal, Germany, and Italy. According to a recent map published by the Newark Evening News there are 2,306,000 Germans and 6,271,500 Italians in South American countries other than Colombia and Venezuela. While these are only 11 percent of the total population they are roughly a third of the white population. These immigrants form a bond between Germany and Italy and South America that is far stronger than any possible claim we can make. There is room in Argentina, Uruguay, and southern Brazil for millions more of Europe's excess population. From our standpoint it would be better if Europeans fill up South America rather than Asiatics. Furthermore, if we attempt to deny Germany and Italy access to Latin America south of the Caribbean, we can hardly expect those nations to recognize our claim to the area bordering it. Europe needs South America, both its products and as an outlet for surplus population. To try to prevent this natural relation will mean war.

Dempsey Scores Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to call the attention of the Members to the outstanding victory recently attained by my friend and colleague the gentleman from New Mexico, the Honorable JACK DEMPSEY.

In fighting one of the hardest battles in recent years to get the Dempsey-Hatch clean politics bill No. 2 up to a vote, the gentleman from New Mexico, Congressman DEMPSEY, scored against all odds by a final victory in the House 242 to 122.

The passage of this bill again demonstrated the ability and tenacity, as well as the leadership and popularity, of the gentleman from New Mexico, Congressman DEMPSEY. His services for his State of New Mexico and for the Nation are so well known that they need no elaboration to us who have followed his valuable services in this body. His legislative career is filled with dozens of such successes as that recently achieved.

In addition to his activity in sponsoring and carrying through to final passage an even 100 important legislative bills, the gentleman from New Mexico, Congressman DEMPSEY, has given his attention and services on the two most important committees of the House—the Dies committee investigating un-American activities and the all-important Rules Committee of the House. His record of thoroughness and fairness in all his dealings on both of these committees have brought him praise from the Nation's press.

New Mexico is fortunate indeed to be represented by our colleague [JACK DEMPSEY]. He has brought much favorable publicity to his State for his able and active contributions to the Nation's welfare in this critical time.

Recently the news magazine Time devoted much space to his outstanding record in the National Congress. I take pleasure in incorporating this in my remarks as only one piece of the evidence of the outstanding services in Washington of the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. DEMPSEY].

[From Time of July 22, 1940]

THE CONGRESS

One of the most popular men in Washington is red-faced, white-haired JOHN J. DEMPSEY, New Mexico's lone Representative in the House. One-time water boy on a railroad, hard-working JACK DEMPSEY fought his way to success, then, with the profits of some Oklahoma oil, went to New Mexico to retire. Instead he got into politics up to his neck. He first entered Congress in 1935. In 6 years he saw 99 of his bills become law—a legislative record.

Last winter the Senate passed Hatch bill II, prohibiting political activity by State employees who are paid in whole or in part from Federal funds. Many a Senator voted for it for the simple political reason that he was confident it would never pass the House. Experts gave the bill no better than to 10-to-1 chance. At this point scrappy JACK DEMPSEY stepped in, told his friends, "I'm going to pass that bill."

The Hatch bill never had the support of the administration. It was strenuously opposed by the Democratic leaders in the House. Its most formidable opponent was Texas' old, respected HATTON SUMNERS, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, where the bill reposed. The committee, horrified by the bill's proposed reforms, held a secret ballot, announced a vote of 14 to 10 to table the measure. Congressman DEMPSEY thereupon raised Congress' roof by announcing that 13 Members told him afterward they had voted for the bill. He started a petition to extricate the bill from the committee. Embarrassed Congressmen stayed away from Mr. DEMPSEY's petition in droves. Back he went to the committee members, wheedled, cajoled, and bullied them for almost a month. Finally, by an open vote, the Hatch bill passed the Judiciary Committee, 16 to 8.

The fight was not yet won. Dempsey had to get the measure through the Rules Committee before it could reach the floor of the House. To Rules Committee members he said: "I'm a member of this committee and I want you men to give me this rule just because its me." They gave him enough votes, and at last the bill was sent to the House. There HATTON SUMNERS made a final, vitriolic attack on it. With unfading zeal Mr. DEMPSEY stuck to his guns. The bill passed, 243 to 122. At week's end the Senate concurred, without debate. The final bill, as approved by both Houses, limited expenditure by a political party to $3,000,000 in a single year, limited single campaign contributions to $5,000, prohibited fund-raising devices such as the Democratic yearbook. As soon as the President signs it, the bill will become a law.

Having jacked his legislative score to an even 100 bills, JACK DEMPSEY, hale and hearty at 61, indicated that he would leave the House, run for the Senate in the fall. His opponent, New Mexico's Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ, whose relatives were once involved in a W. P. A. scandal (they were later tried and acquitted), thoroughly disapproved of the Hatch bill from the start.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE GRAND RAPIDS (MICH.) HERALD

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Herald of July 24, 1940:

BACK TO PRIVATE LIFE

James A. Farley, for 8 years chairman of the Democratic National Committee and for nearly that time Postmaster General in the Cabinet of President Roosevelt, before the week end will step down from all his political offices and become just Jim Farley, one of the owners and managers of the New York Yankee baseball team.

With his passing from public life will go one of the most beloved figures ever to hold the political spotlight in this or any other nation. Not alone among the members of his own party but among those of opposite political faith Jim Farley is respected and loved.

No man ever held public office who so universally held the respect and affection of the hard-boiled newspaper crowd as did Jim. Two events which gained no publicity in the recent Chicago convention showed more than anything else the respect they hold for him. On the day of his last press conference when Jim entered the room the entire body of newspaper correspondents rose and cheered him. And on Friday afternoon the press gallery gave a reception for Jim in the grand ballroom of the Stevens Hotel. Two such circumstances never before occurred for any man in the position of Mr. Farley and that demonstration of their affection for him was spontaneous. It needed neither the machinations of Mayor Kelly nor of any other cheer leader to bring about those events.

Jim Farley easily was the most popular man before the Chicago convention. The cheers for him always were genuine and from the hearts of the galleries and of the delegates. Abused, slighted, insulted as he had been by the man he had "made," Jim went smilingly about the business of handling the convention, pledged his support to the ticket even though he is unalterably opposed to a third term for anybody. He was loyal to the last moment of his public career. Disloyalty was all on the other side.

He had been hurt to the heart. The greatest hurt of all was when the President said Farley would be unavailable for the Presidency because of his religion. Jim is a devout Catholic who is sincere in his devotion and who is a credit to the church to which, as in everything else, he is always loyal.

Jim Farley started life as humbly as a man might. As a boy he was a bartender, yet he has yet to know the taste either of liquor or tobacco. His mother is a saint to him and she warned him early against the use of either.

A wonderful memory has Farley. It is said he can call 50,000 persons over the Nation by their first names. And whatever may be their positions in life, whatever their politics, their religious beliefs, their color, or their race, Jim Farley always is their loyal friend.

The Democratic Party has lost its greatest asset in Mr. Farley's refusal to conduct another campaign for the man whom he twice so triumphantly elected. But Farley will not bolt. His loyal disposition does not permit of that. And whatever the party may have lost, public service has lost infinitely more. They don't make a Farley every day. All over this Nation are those of all political faiths who will be wishing Jim Farley the best of success in his new place in private life and who will feel that public life has lost one of its highest type of men, the kind so much needed in the political life of this Nation.

Alien Registration Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. VITO MARCANTONIO, OF NEW YORK

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me in behalf of the American Committee for the Protection of Foreign-Born over the Columbia Broadcasting System, Sunday, July 28, 1940:

On June 28, 1940, the President of the United States approved an act which provides that within 60 days thereafter, every noncitizen who is 14 years of age or older, and who has not been registered and fingerprinted prior to his entry into the United States, shall report to the nearest post office or at such places as may be designated by the Commissioner of Immigration, to be fingerprinted and registered. The parents of noncitizen children under the age of 14 shall apply for the registration and fingerprinting of said children. The law further provides that the forms for the fingerprinting and registering of the noncitizen shall contain inquiries with respect to the time and place of entry of the noncitizen into the United States; the activities in which he has been and intends to be engaged; the length of time he intends to stay in the United States; the criminal records, if any, of such noncitizen; and such additional matters as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Immigration with the approval of the Attorney General. The act also provides that the fingerprinting and registration records shall be made available to such persons or agencies which may be designated by the Commissioner of Immigration with the approval of the Attorney General. This undoubtedly means these records will be placed at the disposal of the F. B. I. Failure on the part of noncitizens to comply with the act will subject them to a fine not to exceed $1,000 or to imprisonment not to exceed 6 months, or both.

It is estimated that 3,500,000 noncitizens will have to submit to fingerprinting and registration within 4 months after September 1. Over 3,000,000 of these have lived in the United States 10 years or more.

Thus in free America we will witness the Hitler-imitating spectacle of 3,500,000 men, women, and children composed of loyal, hard-working people in all walks of life—priests, nuns, rabbis, ministers, bricklayers, carpenters, and clerks—all of whom have been making a contribution toward the greatness of America, being subjected to the criminal-like treatment of registration and fingerprinting.

Further, after this humiliation, a resident noncitizen so registered and fingerprinted shall notify the Commissioner of Immigration in writing of each change of residence and new address within 5 days of the time of such change.

By the registration and fingerprinting of the noncitizen, by the continuous check-up of the noncitizen, and by the continuous hounding of the noncitizen as provided in this law, we have virtually segregated from the rest of our people a class of 3,500,000 innocent people. We have completely reversed our traditional policy of asylum, equality, and freedom to one of discrimination and segregation. We have substituted bigotry for tolerance. We have crowned with vengeful victory the know-nothingism of the 1850's, the Ku Klux Klanism of the 1920's, and the Gestapoism of today. It is not remote from reality that those responsible for this atrocious rape of American institutions will next advance into legislation the doctrine of Aryan superiority, the Nuremberg laws, and the concentration camps.

On June 22 the House adopted this measure by a vote of 382 to 4. I was one of the four who voted against it and the only one who spoke against it. You may wonder why it was passed by such an overwhelming majority. It was "blitzkrieged" through Congress as a part of the so-called national-defense program. It was another legitimate offspring of the present-day war hysteria. I am confident that when the American people insist that their legislators return to democracy that many will disclaim parentage of this truly alien, un-American, and violently subversive legislation.

I sat throughout the debate of this bill and carried the fight against it. I distinctly recall the arguments advanced for its enactment. The sole explanation advanced was that this method was necessary to fight Trojan horses, "fifth columnists," spies, and saboteurs.

It is my considered judgment that this argument was not advanced in good faith. I strongly believe that spies and saboteurs and all others engaged in illegal activities should be immediately apprehended and punished, but you do not accomplish this end by this law. Spies and saboteurs and other law violators will not report to a post office and submit themselves to fingerprinting. The citizen spy and saboteur does not have to register and be fingerprinted. The noncitizen law violators will not by their own act expose themselves simply because Congress asks them to do so. It is either naive or dishonest to contend that a spy or a saboteur or a real Trojan horse or a real "fifth columnist" who is engaged, particularly at this time, in destroying American peace and American liberty will, on or after September 1, report to a post office and disclose the nature of his activities. Only by honest, intelligent police work will the law violators be apprehended and not by the destruction of our free institutions such as this law tends to do.

The only true reason for this type of legislation is that those who seek to destroy American democracy and plunge this country into war have chosen the noncitizens as the object of their terror, so as to intimidate them and persecute them and thus eliminate them from the great army of the American people who are determined to preserve American peace and freedom.

The noncitizen resident is an integral part of America. The noncitizen in the United States in the overwhelming majority is a noncitizen through no fault of his own. When he attempts to become an American citizen he has to hurdle many barriers. He is often asked questions that even United States Supreme Court judges cannot answer. Frequently he is strangled by red tape, by unnecessary delays, and the fees that are required of him. He is a good American despite the fact that he lacks the technical status of naturalization. He is determined to keep America out of war. He believes in the Bill of Rights and is ready to defend our Nation against invasion, but simply because the war makers and bigots know that this honest type in our midst is unalterably opposed to our participation in an imperialist war, they now, in the name of national defense, subject him to all forms of discriminatory practices.

There was a time, however, in the history of our country when we wanted the immigrant to come to our shores. Labor exploiters sent agents to Europe and these agents pictured prosperity here and said, "Come on over, good wages, good living, and hospitality."

The immigrants believed them. They sold their few belongings and were herded into steerage. They greeted the Statue of Liberty with tears in their eyes, and their hearts swelled with the desire to become Americans, raise their families as Americans, and to become merged into a great democratic nation. No sooner had they turned their heads they found themselves in Ellis Island. They were tagged and shipped to work in the mines, on the roads, in the mills and sweatshops, and on the railroads. They gave America their greatest contributions, that of honest toil and the blood of their sons in 1917. Since their arrival they were forced to travel along the Via Crucis of discrimination and exploitation. Now that these foreign-born workers have joined their native fellow workers in the struggle for a decent American standard of living and seek to prevent a repetition of 1917, they are being forced to the crucifixion by those who seek to destroy the labor movement, by those who seek to destroy the civil rights of the American people, by those who seek to drive us into an imperialist war. The real motive, therefore, for this legislation is that it is part of a scheme to drive us into war. The real motive, therefore, is not to protect American democracy but to destroy it.

The war program is to smash civil rights first in order to stifle the voices of Americans opposed to war and start this overthrow of democracy with the persecution of the noncitizen. The noncitizen is among the first victims of this "blitzkrieg" against the peace and liberties of the people.

It has also been said that this amputation of our freedom was necessary in order to protect our American democracy. I believe this is the most incongruous proposition I have ever heard. On the one hand it is said that they want to preserve American liberties, and then they set out to destroy it. They strangle American freedom under the demagogic excuse of seeking to protect it. My friends, if we carry out this course we will end with no freedom and no democracy. Such has been the history of nations which have done just as we are doing by this legislation.

In a period as trying as this the test of a democracy lies in the ability of that democracy to maintain its liberties and to have more freedom rather than less freedom. The test of a democracy lies in its ability to preserve its institutions of equality. Remember, when the founding fathers said in that everlasting document, the Declaration of Independence, that all men are created equal, they did not say that all men are created equal except Italians, they did not say that all men are created equal except Jews, they did not say that all men are created equal except Negroes, nor did they say that all men are created equal except noncitizens. They said that all men are created equal. By this they meant no discrimination, no segregation, and no persecution of the foreign-born.

I submit that the best way to preserve the American way of life is preserve our liberties. American democracy can live only by letting it live. Limiting it will not permit it to live. It will choke it and kill it. Only by strict adherence to the Declaration of Independence, only by strict adherence to the Bill of Rights, only by the militant and vigilant realization that there are no "ifs," and that there are no "buts" to these great principles of our country can we successfully defend our American way of life.

Midwest Demands Share in National-Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a timely editorial from the Kansas City Times for Saturday, July 27, together with a copy of the resolution adopted at a meeting of the middle western business leaders from nine States, which was held in Kansas City, Mo., on Friday, July 26. This meeting was called because up to the present time the national-defense program has not been extended to the Middle West.

It is recognized that in the beginning, because of the need for haste, existing industrial plants located very largely in the East should be fully utilized and in some cases expanded. Those of us from the Middle West, however, feel very deeply that a great mistake will be made if the vast natural resources and ample supply of capable, well-trained, and efficient labor to be found in the Middle West are not fully utilized.

For the purpose of bringing about a thorough discussion of this question and of submitting to those in authority a program showing the advantages which the Middle West has to offer, a meeting has been called to be held in Kansas City, Mo., on August 30. To this meeting will be invited Members of Congress from the States of Arkansas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota. There will be present also representative businessmen from these States.

The resolution above referred to is as follows:

Representatives of nine States, representing the principal cities of the Midwest, assembled in Kansas City, July 26, 1940, make the following declarations:

"Our territory fully supports the objectives of our Government in making these United States impregnable to attack. We recognize these fundamental facts:

"The money for defense must be spent efficiently.

"Speed is essential. Existing plants must be used to their fullest capacity."

On the long-range program, however, which entails the location and building of additional plants to produce strategic war materials, the nine Midwestern States have many advantages which should be brought to the attention of the proper officials of our Government. These major facilities are:

Invulnerability against any conceivable foreign attack.
An adequate supply of raw materials.
Sufficient native-born trained labor.
Speedy transportation to the three coasts and the Great Lakes.
The cheap food needed to support any increased population.
Adequate low-cost housing already existing for industrial workers.
An abundance of fuel and power at low cost.

POPULATION DROP NOTED

These nine Midwestern States have suffered severely in the past, as the 1940 census population figures reveal, because of the fact that they have been depending too much on agriculture alone. The opening of the Panama Canal tended to drain industries from the center of the country to the rim. This was particularly accentuated by the industrial expansion during and following the last World War. A strong national economy depends upon a proper balance between industry and agriculture.

The nine States participating in this conference fear that if this new expansion of defense industry is largely concentrated in the already congested industrial areas, then there will be another further severe dislocation of population.

The present trend is:

To take our able-bodied young men into the materially enlarged Army and Navy.

To drain our highly trained skilled workers and surplus farm labor from this area to the coastal regions.

To draw our raw materials away from the point of production to the already congested manufacturing areas, thus adding undue costs by the transportation of those materials.

THE RECOMMENDATIONS

In view of these facts, we strongly recommend:

That all plants now existing in the Middle West which now manufacture or can be adapted to the manufacture of war materials be utilized by the War and Navy Departments.

We emphasize the recommendations of President Roosevelt that when additional plants are to be built, they be located between the Alleghenies and the Rocky Mountains. We urge that a rightful share be located in this nine-State area where the agricultural problem is now acute because of the loss of our export markets.

We believe that in the interest of economy the existing army posts and training schools be utilized to capacity before any additional camps or posts are constructed.

Resolved, That it is the unanimous opinion of this conference that our views thus expressed be conveyed in the most forceful manner to the President of the United States, members of the National Defense Council, and to the Senators and Representatives from our area.

To effectuate this, we recommend that not less than 100 representatives from this area assemble in Kansas City at an early date (August 30) for a conference with our Senators and Representatives in order that our views may be presented most advantageously.

We further recommend that a temporary organization be formed composed of not less than one representative from each of the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Arkansas to carry out this program; and be it

Resolved, That the National Defense Commission be requested to appoint an outstanding businessman in each of the nine Midwestern States represented here to serve with Federal authority at $1 a year, to assist in placing defense production throughout each of these States.

Following is the editorial from the Kansas City Times:

THE NINE-STATE CONFERENCE

The Midwest conference in Kansas City yesterday should help impress on Washington the need of taking the midwestern area into account in the preparedness program. There was no disposition to interfere with the speed and efficiency of the preparedness measures. But the conference emphasized the disorganizing effect on the economic structure of the Middle West—and so of the Nation—from draining off hundreds of thousands of workers into the congested industrial areas.

For the welfare of the Nation, as well as of the Valley States, the balance of industry and agriculture should be maintained. Unless this fact is kept in mind by the men in charge at Washington, the balance will be still further disturbed by the draining off of population into the great new war industries in the coastal regions.

Such an outcome is not necessarily involved in an intelligent and far-sighted handling of the program. There are many war supplies that can be quickly and economically manufactured in the Midwest area. The danger is that the Defense Committee in Washington, made up almost exclusively of eastern men, will forget that the Middle West exists.

The conference yesterday showed that the nine States represented are determined not to allow things to go by default. They are determined to have their case impressively and intelligently presented to the committee. They should be able to give effective backing to the movement already under way to establish the importance of the Middle West in the expansion program now under way.

A House Page Turns Author

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, a former page of the House, Albert C. Losche, of Indianapolis, better known as Bud Losche, well known to many Members on this floor, has written a very interesting book which bears the title "Washington Memoirs." This book presents to the reading public in a candid and refreshing way the impressions of a very brilliant, though youthful, mind in regard to the National Capital, the United States Government, and public men, and measures in general. It teems with the vibrant recollections of a very observant page, written in an easy, entertaining style. My heart thumped when I read the dedication, which is as follows:

To Congressman LOUIS LUDLOW, who gave me the opportunity to gather the material to write this book, to his high ideals and future hopes this book is respectfully dedicated.

Although Bud's sojourn on earth has been brief, he has already created a big stir. He developed an oratorical faculty before he could enunciate plainly and by the time he reached his teens he had become famous as a public speaker, stumping the State of Indiana for the Democratic Party and receiving numerous calls to charge the enemy from the rostrum in neighboring States. His skill and resourcefulness in painting the virtues of Democracy and the sins of omission and commission of the opposition brought him wide renown.

Bud served with credit and distinction as page in the Seventy-fifth Congress, and as his sponsor I was proud of the record he made. Having reached the advanced age of 15 he has retired, written his memoirs, and is preparing for a career in law and public affairs. He has a natural flair for politics and the public service and there is every indication that he will write his name high on the wall of success. I am not the seventh son of a seventh son; I have no familiarity whatever with crystal bowls and I claim no gift of vaticination, but I can easily imagine that a third, or half a century hence the Hon. Bud Losche will be saying "Mr. Speaker" in this Chamber or "Mr. President" in the other Chamber, or, who knows, he may be down at the far end of the Avenue, serving his third term.

College Students and Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1940

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENT

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to place in the RECORD a comprehensive letter from a very able college senior, a constituent of mine:

TOPEKA, KANS., July 26, 1940.

Mr. W. P. LAMBERTSON,
Representative, First District, Kansas,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: The Capital this morning reports "vigorous opposition broke out in the Senate" yesterday to the compulsory military training bill. I hope to hear in the near future that you are an opponent of the bill in the House.

To explain why I think I can give you the reactons of a large number of young voters, I remind you that I am a student at Dartmouth College, a senior next year, barely turned 21, and consequently in the age group most likely to be affected. As managing editor of The Dartmouth, college daily, I have had considerable contact with student opinion, and while this bill has come up since school was out, and apparently will be rushed to a vote before school reconvenes, I am confident that undergraduate opinion is against such a bill. I know that youths my own age in Topeka are opposed to it.

College students of this group are just as patriotic and loyal, just as willing to fight for the country, if necessary, as any other group. I doubt if the ideals of democracy are anywhere held in higher repute than among college youth. Our opposition is not based on merely selfish motives.

It is not serving the country we object to, nor military training. It is the idea of having our futures disrupted by something the necessity of which is not clearly established, something which may reflect only a passing hysteria and be repealed when the country returns to a calmer mind. A permanent, well-planned military training that a person could expect and prepare for, and perhaps take in conjunction with college work or during summer vacations, would be less disastrous.

Already there are many who feel that education, especially for men entering the professions, has stretched out until it covers too many years of a man's life. While college men have no dependents, and are not engaged in jobs essential to industry, what they are doing is potentially more for the good of the country than if they were skilled airplane-instrument makers. A draft extending the time a man must pass in preliminaries before beginning an actually productive career is apt to mean that fewer men will care to tackle the long grind of professional training—especially men who have had no warning, no chance to shape their plans with the thought of a year or two in armed service. That is certainly not for the good of the country.

As illustrations, let me give myself and my roommate at Dartmouth. Both of us are planning to finish college work next spring and proceed to prepare for a profession. Bill for medicine, I for law. Such study requires careful advance planning for time and finances. If our plans are rudely shattered by the requirement of a year in military camp first we (and we are typical of many other youths) will probably have to abandon plans for professional study.

As I said before, while I have had no direct contact with fellow Dartmouth students since June, I know that youths my own age in Topeka are opposed to the bill.

Sincerely yours,

CLIF STRATTON, JR.

Defense Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON SUNDAY STAR

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Sunday Star of Washington for July 28, 1940:

DEFENSE HOUSING

By linking the United States Housing Authority program with national defense, both Congress and the Democratic Convention gave timely cognizance of an acute shortage of decent, inexpensive dwellings in key cities that threatens now, as it succeeded in doing in 1917, to embarrass and retard the best-laid plans for military and industrial expansion.

Before the Chicago convention adopted a forthright plank pledging the New Deal to accelerate plans to make low-rent housing "a powerful arm of national defense by supplying housing for the families of enlisted personnel, and for workers in areas where industry is expanding to meet defense needs," the National Executive Committee of Housing Authorities had sounded an alarm. In a comprehensive review of existing housing conditions made available to the President's National Defense Advisory Commission these representatives of some 500 public housing agencies warned:

"In many cities migration has already set in on a large scale, and workers brought in for jobs in defense industries are being forced to leave because they cannot find places to live in. Some families are paying as much as 50 percent of their income for rent. Workers are occupying beds in two and three shifts. Buildings unfit for use are being opened to the rush of thousands of families being employed in defense industries. Arsenal employees already are refusing to come to work in cities where they cannot find homes. Yet the national-defense program has only just begun.

"In 1940 * * * we are already in a situation as desperate as we were during the World War, when disastrous delays occurred because war industries couldn't get and hold workers for whom no housing was available."

That this is no exaggeration of conditions is evidenced from the fact that in the 3 weeks since Congress empowered the United States Housing Authority to act in this new emergency more than 150 communities from coast to coast have laid their cases before the Federal agency or applied for defense housing loans. Very properly, no project can be undertaken without the approval of the President, who must first determine if an acute housing shortage in the community impedes the defense program. The President should hew close to the line if the funds are to be spent where they will do most good. The United States Housing Authority is making much to-do about accelerating the defense program and getting it before the public. Public housing, by necessity, moves slowly. Yet the Federal agency is slashing red tape and has set up a defense schedule designed to reduce the construction period of projects by about two-thirds. Under that schedule ordinary projects should be built in 4 to 6 months.

Present Administration Fails To Define Policies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

MEMORANDUM BY GEORGE N. PEEK

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following memorandum by George N. Peek:

In times of world crisis and national confusion such as these we must look straight to fundamentals. We must, moreover, be able to relate our policies and programs in specific fields to a central core of fundamental national policy. Much of the confusion and danger in which we find ourselves involved springs from the failure of the present administration to define clearly for itself and for the country a central core of unified national policy in which each field of endeavor would have its component part. Instead, the administration has pursued domestic policies irredeemably in conflict with each other and foreign policies which have conflicted with the domestic policies they should have supplemented.

A principal reason for this has been the failure of the administration to make and correlate essential studies of the cold facts of our national situation, internal and external. In spite of the mass of statistics collected in dozens of Government agencies in Washington, we do not know just what our national income is, how it is earned, whence it is derived, how and where it is spent. We do not know how many people there are unemployed, where they are, or what they could do. We lack essential studies as to the interrelation of wage levels and price levels. Yet current knowledge and current use of such facts as these are first essentials to the intelligent conduct of national affairs, and an essential foundation to the intelligent formulation of national policies, domestic and foreign.

The war, terrible as it is, has done one thing for this Nation. It has awakened it with a bang. After 7 years we see what the dreamers, schemers, and bunglers have done for us. In spite of the huge expenditures of the past 7 years we see unemployment and lack of social and economic balance; we see also that we are unarmed and unprepared. We have this opportunity at a critical moment to dispense with the bunglers and to follow our natural bent for organization, protection, and defense.

It is the inescapable duty of the Republican Party to identify and define a basic national policy and then to coordinate to it the various domestic policies on which our functioning as a nation depends, and to supplement it by a foreign policy and activity which such a unified national domestic policy demands. Our national interest must be the yardstick; to it all other policies must conform.

Every thinking man and woman must view with the gravest misgivings the recklessness and emotionalism which characterize the foreign policy of the present administration. It has already affected the abandonment of the safeguard of our neutrality. It is stripping us of military aircraft and supplies, without the prospect of their early replacement, at a most critical juncture in world affairs. It threatens, if not checked, to embroil us in a European war, with unforeseeable losses of blood, treasure, and strength; to involve us for generations to come in the politics and intrigues of Europe and Asia; and to facilitate the establishment here of a New Deal dictatorship. This is gambling with our national security and imperiling the very foundations upon which our democracy is laid. The only way we can assist democracy abroad is by preserving and strengthening it here. Whatever our personal sympathies for the people of the British and French Empires may be, we should conserve our men, money, material, and energies for the sole purpose of insuring and making effective our national security.

We must start with the proposition that the national interest of the American people must be the primary concern of those whom we entrust with direction of our Government. We must build for ourselves forthwith a position of military and economic defense, within the field of our potential control, so imposing and so impregnable that no aggressor will dare assail it, either directly or indirectly—a defense which will function effectively to protect us, our economy, and our institutions, regardless of the changes which may come about in other continents as a result of the tragic events now transpiring in Europe and Asia. The present war may be short or it may be long drawn out, but we can be certain that its post-war effects will not pass within our time. Our national policy must be such that it can cope with the vicissitudes of war and peace alike, and must be fashioned with that in view. All that conduces to that end must be retained and strengthened; all that does not accord with that purpose must be thrust away, no matter what its individual appeal or desirability may seem.

If we are substantially in accord on this concept of national interest as the supreme need of national policy, many of the problems with which we deal fall naturally into place and dictate their own solutions.

I. MILITARY DEFENSE

Complete self-dependence for national defense in the air, on the land and sea. A two-ocean navy or its equivalent to make us independent of the navy of any foreign country in our relations with the rest of the world.

Immediate negotiations looking toward our political and military control of all European-owned islands in our American waters in both the Atlantic and Pacific essential to our defense and defense of the Monroe Doctrine, accompanied by appropriate military arrangements with other American republics for the defense of the Monroe Doctrine.

II. ECONOMIC DEFENSE

The immediate gearing of our industry, agriculture, transportation, and labor to wartime requirements, under a Department of Economic Defense clothed with adequate powers and unhampered by political tampering or by bureaucratic or legalistic red tape.

Development of new resources or substitutes for needed essential supplies (rubber, tin, manganese, etc.) in the United States and the nations reasonably adjacent to us.

III. DIPLOMATIC DEFENSE

Reorientation of our foreign policies to conform to the paramount objective of national security, military and economic. Reaffirmation of our historic policy of no entangling alliances and that of the Monroe Doctrine. Conservation of our human and material resources to that end.

IV. INTERNAL STABILITY

Reorganization of the long-established protective system as the basis of American prosperity and social stability, and in particular its extension to insure fully the maintenance of a prosperous and self-dependent agriculture as the foundation of our economic system and of our social and political institutions.

V. FARM POLICY

The present agricultural program, as administered by Washington, is a demonstrated failure. We should, by amendment and improvement of existing legislation, make mandatory certain provisions and vigorously prosecute them administratively, so that the following shall be sustained:

The restoration of farm income and purchasing power and the maintenance of a free and self-dependent agriculture, which form the essential basis for industrial and national prosperity, employment, and security. Against the present program of restricted production and increased imports of competitive farm products, we should seek to increase farm income to its proper size through the medium of improved prices and increased sales for American farm products.

(1) The protection and full price benefit of the American market for the American farmer by the limitation to actual requirements (by tariffs, quotas, embargoes, or otherwise) of competitive farm imports or substitutes therefor. A method by which this may be accomplished is suggested by H. R. 7590 (introduced October 19, 1939, by the Honorable ROY O. WOODRUFF, of Michigan), placing an embargo on farm imports whenever domestic prices are below parity.

(2) The development of new uses for American agricultural products in industry and commerce and the development in the United States of the growth of farm commodities or their substitutes previously imported.

(3) An American price for American consumption, independent of export or world prices. To accomplish this in the case of surplus crops on which the tariff is ineffective until such time as (1) and (2) above become fully effective, the payment of benefits upon the domestically consumed portion of such crops to compensate for lack of tariff protection and to insure a fair exchange value with the products farmers buy. When this parity price has been attained we should provide the machinery whereby the farmers may establish a self-sustaining program, without substantial cost to the Government, through the medium of an equalization fee, substantially as provided in the McNary-Haugen bill of 1928.

(4) Government assistance in disposing of surpluses in foreign trade for the best prices obtainable, bargaining for foreign markets selectively by countries and otherwise, both as to exports and imports.

(5) The adoption of a long-range program for conservation of the soil for its own sake, as distinguished from schemes for production control, such program to be administered by the land-grant colleges or other responsible State agencies with Federal financial and technical assistance.

(6) The encouragement of farmer-owned and farmer-controlled cooperative organizations to decrease the price spread between producer and consumer, the extension of commodity loans to farmers on a sound basis to assist in carrying seasonal surpluses, and the encouragement of crop insurance under proper auspices.

(7) The encouragement of the better financing of farm mortgages on a sound basis through recognized public and private agencies at low rates of interest on an amortization plan, to the end that farm ownership may be more widely distributed in the hands of those who actually work the land.

VI. FOREIGN TRADE AND FINANCIAL POLICIES

These must be shaped to protect and supplement our basic national security, the military and economic policies which that entails, and the internal stability on which national security must rest. We should concentrate control of our foreign trade and financial activities in a foreign-trade board.

Foreign trade and financial policy should be based upon and conform to the requirements of our domestic economic objectives. These objectives are the protection of the American market for American agriculture, industry, and labor, and the protection of American employment and standards of living. These should not be needlessly exposed to the impact of events abroad over which we have no control, nor should American recovery be sacrificed upon the altar of academic whims or internationalist diplomacy, particularly in the difficult post-war conditions with which we shall surely be confronted when the millions now engaged in warfare and in war production return to peacetime production and trade competition. Specifically there should be:

(1) A reorganization of the Tariff Commission into a Foreign Trade Board as the responsible executive authority for the determination of foreign trade and financial policy in the light of American domestic interests and for the coordination of the foreign commercial and financial activities of the Federal Government.

(2) The establishment of a comprehensive system of national bookkeeping, expressed in simple arithmetic, covering all our commercial and financial transactions with other nations, as an essential basis for determining questions of foreign trade and financial policy.

(3) The adoption of a realistic policy of trading in the national interest under a system of quotas, and of selective imports and exports, granting tariff or other trade concessions only on a quid pro quo basis, thus returning to the traditional American policy of offering to all nations reciprocal treatment on the basis of the condition most-favored-nation principle.

(4) Congressional approval of all general trade agreements which have been or may be negotiated, as an essential to the maintenance of constitutional and responsible government.

A method by which this program may be effected is suggested by a bill (S. 3238), introduced in the United States Senate on February 1, 1940, by the Honorable ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, of Michigan.

To summarize, we must make national security the sole criterion of our national policies. We should seek it by direct military, economic, and diplomatic measures such as are outlined above. We must establish it upon a firm basis of internal stability, to attain which a sound solution of the farm problem is indispensable. We must supplement that internal stability by foreign trade and financial policies which will strengthen and insulate that stability against the shocks and strains of wartime and post-war conditions.

We are a warm-hearted and courageous people. We must be cool-headed as well if we are not to dissipate the heritage of our fathers by following the false gods of foreign intervention and war. Our experience in Europe in 1917–19 was a costly and terrible lesson in the futility and folly of intervening in European affairs. Americans should not have to learn that lesson nor pay that price a second time, for the price is the blood and shattered lives of our young men and it it may be the permanent loss of our liberties to a New Deal dictatorship.

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY FREDERICK E. HASLER AT Y. M. C. A. DAY AT NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the unanimous consent of the House of Representatives to insert the following address in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The address delivered Tuesday, July 9, 1940, in the Temple of Religion of the World's Fair by Mr. Frederick E. Hasler, president of the Pan American Society, was nationally broadcast and sent by short wave to South American countries.

Mr. Hasler is chairman of the executive committee of the Continental Bank & Trust Co. of New York, and chairman of the executive committee of the New York State Chamber of Commerce. Words of direction and advice from a man of such wide experience may well be taken as a guide for the youth of America.

On behalf of the Congress, I wish to congratulate Mr. Hasler for his scholarly and timely speech in which he gave expression to thoughts we all have had in our minds and hearts. The Young Men's Christian Association's celebration was the most appropriate forum for this inspiring appeal to our youth.

In times of crisis, such as the world faces today, the relative importance of many things changes. With the Western Hemisphere facing economic and military threat from the totalitarian nations of Europe, the Pan American Union has taken on a new and vital importance. The ideals of the union have, by recent events, been brought out in bold relief. Organized primarily for peace, commerce, and culture, the events of the last few months in Europe have given a new, temporary character to it—that of a great defensive alliance for the preservation of democracy and freedom on the continents of the Americas and their adjacent islands.

These same world events have also given added importance and offer new and greater opportunities to the Young Men's Christian Association in the influential part it plays in the national life of our countries. The building of strong, healthy bodies by physical training, the inspiring of a love of good sportsmanship, fair play, clean living, kindly regard for one's fellow men, loyalty to country, and belief in the Creator are of especial practical importance in times of crisis; more so than even in times of world tranquillity. All these things are important to the American way of life—and by the use of the word American I do not mean just the United States, but all the Americas. When the American way of life is threatened, as it is today, the things which the Young Men's Christian Association is doing become vital to national welfare. Upon the youth of today depends the hope of civilization and democracy, and the preservation of both the spiritual and temporal ideals for which our forefathers pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

I have confidence in the young manhood of the United States and other pan-American nations. Our youth have not become soft, as events in Europe indicated the youth of some nations there became. Neither is our young manhood brutal, cruel, nor selfish as the youth of some dictator countries has proved to be.

The young men of the Americas face the world unafraid, but theirs is not a regimented courage or a bravery drilled into them by iron-handed discipline. Life is dear to them, freedom more so, and they are not prepared blindly to give up either at the bidding of a fanatical, war-crazed tyrant. But they are ready to make any sacrifice to preserve our democratic form of government, and even eager, if necessary, to meet any challenge the dictators may make in the Western Hemisphere.

I have sufficient faith, too, in American enterprise to believe that it will be able, through 100 percent preparedness, to meet successfully any economic or military attack which the wreckers of European civilization may devise. Once this menace, so far as it affects the Western Hemisphere, is destroyed and some measure of normalcy is restored in Europe, I believe that a new day will dawn in the affairs and fortunes of all countries of the Americas.

Many of you may not know that the Young Men's Christian Association is firmly established and for many years has been doing splendid work in all the large cities of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Peru, Uruguay, and Mexico. The branch in Rio de Janeiro was founded at the beginning of this century. The leaders of public life in these countries recognize, as they do here, that the Young Men's Christian Association is one of the great bulwarks of Christianity and a protection against the march of paganism and destruction, and is their strongest weapon against the insidious doctrines that seek to undermine the spiritual and moral fibre of the youth of the world. Because it is such a powerful force for building up good will and brotherly love, it can be of tremendous help in further solidifying pan-America in the crisis which now faces the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

Frequently, I am asked what pan-Americanism stands for. It is this: The determination of all the peoples of the Americas to stand together, to work together for the good of all, and to do unto others as we would have them do unto us. Pan-Americanism means more today than ever before. Each of the 21 nations has a big stake in its success. Upon its solidarity and single purposedness the future of each nation, in large measure, depends. The United States must cooperate in every way to help the other nations, for we are all members of one family—the family of democracy and freedom, bound together by geography and kinship in the campaign against hate, intolerance, and tyranny.

If I have said too much about pan-Americanism and too little about the Young Men's Christian Association tonight, let me assure you that it was not because I was unappreciative of the fine program which has been staged here. The national recognition awards made this evening for the five best "Y" projects carried on by "young people for young people" are a splendid illustration of the high type of work the world-wide service of the organization inspires.

In closing, I want to wish the Young Men's Christian Association greater success and ever widening influence, not only in New York, but throughout the Americas. To you, young men, and to all who hear my voice on this Nation-wide radio broadcast, you who are destined to be the leaders of tomorrow, I earnestly appeal to have courage, to merit the training and advantages that have been yours, and never let defeatism have any part in your thoughts. The ideals you stand for are the lifeblood of civilization. Democracy is not a forgotten dream—democracy is not on the run. It has been asleep. The decent people of the world, in failing to recognize that the devil and his works were not dead, placed their trust in the good faith of supposedly civilized governments whose spoken and written words have proved to be worthless. It may be a matter of months or years, but no matter how long it takes, victory is ours because the young men of the democracies are real men, not quitters.

The Americas are safe so long as young men are alert—you are.

RESOLUTIONS OF IOWA COUNCIL OF REPUBLICAN WOMEN

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the privilege granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include resolutions adopted by the Iowa Council of Republican Women.

Whereas conditions in many foreign countries have revealed an alarming spread of ideas that are antidemocratic, resulting in disloyalty of the peoples of those countries; and

Whereas the Iowa Council of Republican Women strongly feel that in the United States a powerful defense against the spread of antidemocratic ideas and activities is needed at this time as a protection to our form of government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we earnestly urge the President of the United States and the Congress to direct the properly legalized departments of the United States to set up an increased and widespread program to prevent and to deal with, by legal methods, any activity on the part of persons whose ideas are opposed to the form of government of this country; and, further, that the citizens of these, our United States, be given assurance that a definite program of protection is being carried on for their safety; be it

Resolved by the Iowa Council of Republican Women, That the President of the United States and the Congress be urged to utilize every available resource to immediately expand and complete an adequate defense system, both economic and military, to properly protect the safety of the United States and to insure adequate training and equipment for each and every person called to the service of the Government; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be petitioned to remain constantly in session during this period of emergency in order to properly protect the interests of the United States of America and to safeguard the liberties and welfare of the people of this great democracy.

LETTER FROM GERMAN-AMERICAN NATIONAL ALLIANCE, INC.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit a letter in which a threat is made against various Members of Congress who voted contrary to the wishes of the German-American National Alliance on the legislation Congress enacted at the special session to modify the Neutrality Act. I am advised other Members of Congress received an identical or similar letter. I do not know what steps are being taken to carry out the threat made in this letter, but I am sure that such an attitude by this or any other organization is resented by all fair-minded people.

The letter mentioned is as follows:

GERMAN-AMERICAN NATIONAL ALLIANCE, INC.,
Chicago, Ill., September 1939.

Hon. JED JOHNSON,
United States Representative of Oklahoma,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We attach hereto a list, recording the voting of the Members of the House of Representatives in matters of the Bloom fake neutrality bill. We have tried to correctly set forth therein the vote of each Member and would appreciate to have you check the list concerning your vote. If an error or omission has taken place, kindly so advise us, so that we may change the list accordingly before we give it national publicity through the various channels open to us.

In the event of a special session of Congress and further voting on the matter of neutrality by the House of Representatives, we shall revise the list according to the vote then given, before giving it wide circulation.

Permit us to state that we are aiming to pledge all of our members and members of all organizations which are or may become affiliated with us to assist in preventing by lawful means any person from ever again holding a public office, who votes for the enactment of legislation or termination of existing laws, as a result whereof the sale of arms, munitions, and implements of war would be permitted in the matter of the present European conflict.

We are convinced that such action on part of Congress would lead us into the present European war, which is of no concern to our country.

Very truly yours,

GERMAN-AMERICAN NATIONAL ALLIANCE,
By PAUL A. F. WARNHOLTZ,
Chairman of Committee on Public Affairs.

DISPATCH FROM NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following dispatch published in the New York Herald Tribune of July 19, 1940:

WAR IF ROOSEVELT WINS IS FORECAST IN CANADA

OTTAWA, July 18.—If President Roosevelt is reelected for a third term, "the United States will be in the war before Christmas," it was forecast here today by G. Howard Ferguson, former Premier of Ontario and former Canadian High Commissioner at London.

He described Mr. Roosevelt's nomination as "a good thing for us," and added that pro-British sentiment in the United States was "very strong." All that was required to lead the United States into the war was "a little leadership in the right direction by some outstanding man like Roosevelt," he said.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. RICHARD M. KLEBERG, OF TEXAS

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the gentleman from Texas, Hon. RICHARD M. KLEBERG:

PREPAREDNESS—THE INNER DEFENSES, THE MATERIAL DEFENSES, AND THE GEOGRAPHIC DEFENSES OF THE UNITED STATES

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, my fellow citizens, at the outset permit me to express my appreciation for the courtesies extended by KRIS on this occasion.

For the past several weeks the Congress of the United States has been in session considering problems connected with the preparation of our country to meet a situation filled with ominous portent. The war clouds hanging low over Europe, which have blasted with their lightning of destruction nation after nation, have caused you to recommend to the Congress that it remain in session during this period of emergency. As your Representative in the Congress of the United States, it has therefore been impossible for me to come home save in this period of recess.

Ever since last year, before the session was called to consider neutrality legislation, it has been my responsibility, along with other Members of the Congress, to consider, with an ever-growing sense of responsibility, the picture which even then had begun to rapidly unfold itself. The picture which has developed as of today is one which, I am candid to admit, depicts the most tragic hour in world history. We are witnessing the perversion of the products and fruits of scientific civilization into paths which bend the minds and efforts of men to the study of the intricate science of individual and mass human destruction; paths which in Europe are leading men away from the teaching of the Prince of Peace and our common God; paths which lead us as your Representatives to believe that we, the United States of America and the peaceful peoples of the Western Hemisphere, may be encompassed by their ominous advance and trends. So I find myself tonight addressing you on a subject of gravest importance.

In this hour I voice the hope, coupled with prayer, that I may have your undivided attention and your serious consideration.

I have divided my discussion into three divisions, which, insofar as our national defense is concerned, present this matter as I see it in its more practical aspects. First, the inner defenses; second, the material defenses; and third, the geographic defenses of our country.

The inner defenses of the United States are to be found in the hearts of every true and devoted American citizen. They are formed of the combination of an imperishable faith in our common God and an utter, unwavering devotion to our freemen's government of reason and laws, which is founded upon that faith. In this period of congressional recess, on my visit here at home, as a Member of Congress and as your Representative, I am devoting my every effort and such limited mental capacity as I possess to the problem of seeking ways and means of calling to the attention of my fellow citizens of this district and elsewhere the importance of this particular portion of our preparedness program.

Past and recent history are filled with uncontrovertible evidence to the effect that, after all is said and done, and regardless of the guns, battleships, tanks, airplanes, and other equipment and material of war, the final success of military effort, defensive or offensive, depends upon the man behind the gun and the man who mans the guns, the battleships, the tanks, and the airplanes.

The United States is a peace-loving country. Its people are probably the most devoted to peace in the world today. But once their martial spirit is aroused, they have proven themselves on the fields of honor to be made of the sternest fiber of all. Our success in preparing ourselves—and God forbid the test should come—will depend in the main upon the rehabilitation of these inner defenses and upon the question as to whether or not, after years of division of our people into classes and political divisions, we can reweld ourselves into the united people of the United States with the united and common purpose of giving our all, if need be, for our God and our country.

Recent history lays before us in vivid array the wreck and conquest of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France. These countries had each of them modeled their governments after the Bill of Rights and Constitution of the United States. To these countries, however, and to their peoples, their governments were merely document. To us, our Government is the crystallization of a God-given genius, the fundamentals of which had come down through the centuries from the hearts and minds of people elsewhere. May we always remember and never forget this truth in this tragic hour. Our Government's background and historic tradition—yes, and the Almighty Providence to which we pledged our faith and which, in the days of George Washington, gave to us the Government of the United States and with it those inner defenses which left an army-wide trail of bloody footprints on the rocky ice and snow at Valley Forge—these are the kind of qualities of inner defenses we need today.

Unless every man and women in this land of ours has a deep and abiding conviction in their heart-of-hearts that we have something worth fighting for—yes, and worth dying for if need be—we have but to remember the fate of the other democracies I have just mentioned, which, because of internal strife and dissension, or may I say democratic indifference, offered fertile fields for the diabolic work and success of the "fifth column" which paved the way for the collapse and destruction of each and every one of them.

The work and research of the intelligence services of our War and Navy Departments, of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and of the Dies committee on un-American activities, indicates the widespread and divergent field of subversive activities going on today within our country, gnawing at its vitals and eroding its foundations. God grant that we can awaken in time and call upon our inner selves for a resurgence of the vital and intelligent patriotism which gave us the land of the free and the home of the brave, and upon which its continuity depends today.

It seems as though tonight, if Americans could hear a voice which over a century and a half ago read to the soldiers before the march at Valley Forge, at the request of George Washington, that inimitable document which began with these words: "These are the times that try men's souls," and, thus hearing that voice, give in response what those men gave there, and what Texans gave at the Alamo, at Goliad, and at San Jacinto—that which can only be given by those of imperishable American faith in God and country, and could I be sure that somehow, some way, irrefutable evidence of the concerted power—that imperishable devotion of Americans for God and country—which has come to us in times of stress before, could be given to the world at large, and particularly to the advancing armies bent on conquest and destruction, that I would feel an unshakable faith, not only in the permanency of our institutions, but in the permanency of peace here in our homeland. But it is because of conditions here that are doubtless known abroad that in this recess period I address to all within the sound of my voice a most urgent call to all Americans to man and rehabilitate those inner defenses which are the only ones upon which we can definitely depend for our national continuity and safety.

The material defenses of this Nation, and the preparation for their completion are going forward apace. You have all read in the newspapers the gigantic appropriations which have been made for naval, land, and air armaments and equipment. You are informed of the legislative authorization bills calling for the building of tanks, guns, airplanes, battleships, air and naval bases, Army training camps, and so forth. You know that when Congress again takes up its duties it immediately begins consideration of appropriations approximating five billions more for the Army and Navy, legislation looking toward compulsory military training, mobilization of the National Guard, and preparing the way for selective draft in emergency. All of these constitute the material defenses and, inasmuch as you are familiar with them, I shall not take time to discuss them further than to say that on Sunday night I leave for Washington to be present at the consideration of these various problems by committees, and in conference next week. The Congress itself will possibly not consider these legislative problems until after July 29.

Now as to geographic defenses, which have to do with the location of our Nation in the central part of North America, between Canada and Mexico, comprising as it does the wealthiest and most powerful nation in the Western Hemisphere. We have recognized since the days of James Monroe that immortal document known as the Monroe Doctrine, looking toward the continued maintenance of the peace and establishment of those countries already extant in North and South America, and the maintenance of their sovereignty and immunity from invasion. But my countrymen, it takes more than the Monroe Doctrine to complete the geographic defenses of the United States.

First of all, we must consider and remember that we live not only in North America as a nation, not only in the Western Hemisphere as a nation, but that we live in the world as a nation. We must first of all remember and never forget that in this inimitable crisis, upon the behavior and actions of the United States of America finally depends, in more than mere probability, the fate of both Christianity and civilization as united forces for the good of mankind. We likewise must not forget the major lessons of history, which indicate without possible challenge the truth that a man with friends is stronger than he who would stand alone, the truth that in nature's greatest of all schoolhouses the gregarious forms of life are stronger than those which seek survival alone and unsupported. And so it is among nations that a nation with friends, earned and real (not bought or coerced by fear), is far stronger than a nation which declares that it can and will stand alone and that it desires so to do.

What I am getting at and trying to convey to you is that it is my definite opinion that much more can and should be done on the part of the United States, its administration, its representative branch, and its diplomatic corps, to earn the friendship, to a greater degree than we now have it, not only of Canada and Mexico, but of Central and South America. This earned and increased friendship can be acquired only by a desire on our part to understand their problems and at the same time to lay our own cards on the table for their review. There is an indivisibility and community of interest between the nations of the Western Hemisphere and the insular populations and nations which surround it, which becomes increasingly vital as the years go forward and the picture which the future is unfolding becomes more apparent and visible. These geographic defenses constitute a vital part of the inner defenses of this Nation. The inspiration of a true confidence existing between our neighbors and ourselves is a vital factor tending to reinforce our and their strength.

In the Western Hemisphere we have a major advantage over Europe and Asia in that in both North and South America two languages are common to all of their peoples—English and Spanish. Could we but see the importance here, as I am sure we can if we would think, of immediately undertaking for the future, both immediate and remote, the study of Spanish as a requirement in our schools, and would they in Latin America, as I am sure they will, undertake the requirement of English in their schools, the major barrier to a growing and permanent friendship between our country and Latin America would be removed.

We have but to recognize that in our country, formed as it is of racial strains including every civilized nationality, we are not confronted, as is the case in Europe, with a condition like unto that which confronted the builders of the Tower of Babel. We have welded a united citizenship speaking the English language, which is taught in all our schools. As a token of the success of that venture we have but to witness the history of age-old Europe in its recurrent wars and revolutions, occasioned in the main by their inability to understand one another and to recognize those essential communities of interest between all humanity the world over; we have but to recall the inhibitions in our organic law which frees our country of religious and racial prejudices which are rampant in Europe, and the development of the American spirit which is based upon a tolerance between our citizens which is not to be found elsewhere—a tolerance which, if strengthened to a still greater degree, is of essential and vital importance in this day when suspicions are aroused, for instance, concerning "fifth column" activities—a tolerance which by steadfast national self-control should warn and inhibit against the pointing of the finger of suspicion at our neighbor because of his racial descendence—a tolerance which will cause us to be sure before we indulge in any of those overt acts which tend to destroy the unity of our people—a tolerance which will lead us into united effort to uproot and cast aside all of the class hatreds which are born of both carelessness as to the true principles of political expediency of the hour and of intolerance, which is one of humanity's greatest curses.

In conclusion, these statements which I have made are in the form of suggestions for mental exercise and practice, and the development of constructive thought which is essential to the prompt and permanent rebuilding of our inner defenses, as I see it.

And so, my fellow citizens, may I again, with all of the earnestness and emphasis at my command, commend you to marshal that great heritage incident only to citizens of a country governed by its people, under a government which derives all of its just powers from you, the people; a government under which the Federal branch functions under a constitution limiting its powers, and which Constitution and Bill of Rights reserve all powers not delegated to the Federal Government to the States and to you, the people, so that not only it may not vanish from the earth but, God willing, it may continue in its imperishable service to mankind here and everywhere. By dedicating ourselves to the rehabilitation of our inner defenses, in a tragic hour when Almighty God has imposed upon us an uncomparable trust, may we exhibit and show a worthiness of that trust by the manner in which we bend our efforts in service to our common God and country. May we never relinquish our priceless liberties which come to us through God at one and the same time with the life He gives us. May we remember that here in the United States of America we hold in trust to countless generations which are to follow, the last gigantic crucible where Christian men and women, free in mind and thought and speech, may work undisturbed for the benefit of our families, our friends, our country and the rest of the world. Let us be true to that trust, and let us exhibit in this realm of free men's government an ability and capacity for self-government that will hurl back the challenge from abroad.

HON. CHESTER H. GROSS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, the President's plan proposed to the Habana conference by Secretary Hull that the United States purchase all surplus commodities in South America has evidently collapsed. It is a good thing for the farmers of the United States, as well as the taxpayers that the program collapsed so early. The President's proposal that $500,000,000 be used to purchase these commodities was just a small beginning of another impossible New Deal program that would have cost the Nation billions of dollars. The farmers of America have a perfect right to ask how the President thinks we can control the surpluses of South America when we cannot control our own.

The Government now owns vast quantities of corn, wheat, and cotton, and under this program they would have had to purchase probably a million and a half bales of cotton from Brazil, together with probably 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, 10,000,000 bags of coffee, 725,000 tons of meat, 214,000 tons of wool, 300,000 tons of copper, and about 20,000,000 tons of oil. And this is not nearly all of the commodities we would have had to purchase. To the American farmer and taxpayer this sounds just as foolhardy as the purchase of 80 percent of the world's gold to bury it in a hole in the ground.

We farmers all over the country are threshing our wheat right now and selling it for just about one-half of the cost of production. Every American farmer wants to know what the administration has done to get him a better price. Dollar wheat would be worth much more to the farmers of this country than a cheap loan from the Government to help him hang on until he is entirely swamped. The taxpayers, too, have a right to know why these billions of dollars are being appropriated in the name of national defense without any plans submitted by the President as to how the money should be spent. There is a righteous wave of indignation sweeping the country as they learn that these billions appropriated for national defense are blank checks in the President's hands. It is altogether evident now that much of this money will be used for purposes other than national defense. It is also becoming known that many of the taxes soon to go into effect would not have needed to be levied for some time to come, since much of this money cannot be legitimately expended for national defense for several years. The fact that we find it impossible to secure mechanics now at the time when they are greatly needed is simply because they refused to let young men and women learn trades for the last 4 or 5 years. Hundreds of thousands of young men wanting to learn trades have been forced to the highways and to the ranks of common laborers. These were unable to find jobs, and now we find their personal initiative gone and the country short of tradesmen in this critical hour.

Now it becomes necessary for us to spend millions of dollars of the national-defense appropriation to create mechanics that we would have had had not they interfered in the lives and programs of our men during the last 7 years, and, what is more important, we would have them right now, when we need them. They would be full-fledged, experienced men who could operate the mechanized equipment of a modern army instead of having to wait in many cases 2 years for a mechanic who then has no practical experience. I believe we should in all possible haste make it possible for the industry of the country to take on apprentices. This would be a much more sensible way of getting practical men than to spend the taxpayers' money to teach them trades in schools, which is apparently going to be the program. We must train mechanics regardless, but I do not believe that we need to resort to compulsory military training on the scale recommended by the President simply because war hysteria has been created by certain men in executive positions. And I do not intend to support a bill for compulsory military training until I am convinced that we cannot raise an army otherwise. Compulsory military training is a far departure from the American practice and point of view, and I find in the country an overwhelming sentiment against it.

Will Harry Hopkins Have His "Brain Trust" Anyhow?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 29, 1940

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the annual appropriation bill for the Department of Commerce, I made a point of order against an item which would have provided funds for an additional quota of specialists, experts, and so forth, in the office of the Secretary, for whom there was no authority in law. The point of order was sustained, and the item went out.

When the bill went to the other body an attempt was made to insert the item by amendment. There, in a brilliant exposé of the number of secretaries and assistant secretaries and assistants to the secretaries, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Senator LODGE, defeated the proposal. Thus funds were denied by Congress for this unauthorized increase of personnel, and under every customary interpretation of congressional intent the whole proposal went out the window.

Lately I have been advised that this plain denial of funds and the absence of legislative authority is being flouted by the Secretary of Commerce, who seems determined to have his special "brain trust" whether Congress wills or not. The procedure adopted is to eliminate career men in the Department by forcing their retirement under one pretext or another in order to have funds to pay the desired new employees. A large number of men at modest salaries will be forced out to make way for the Secretary's pets. Mr. Speaker, such a move is a challenge to Congress which must not be ignored. I propose to present further details on the matter shortly.

Appropriation National Defense—T. V. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL C. MICHENER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1940

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for projects, the completion of which will increase the generating capacity of the T. V. A. 298,000 kilowatts. It provides an initial appropriation of $25,000,000 for a program of expansion, the total cost of which will be $65,800,000. It is brought before the Congress as an emergency matter and its proponents are the members of the National Defense Council. This bill would not have been favorably reported by the Appropriations Committee, it would not have received a favorable report from the Rules Committee, and it would not be before the House today were it not a part of the program of national defense, which a vast majority of the American people are now demanding. I feel sure that if this additional power demanded for our national defense were not to be provided in connection with the existing T. V. A., there would be very little, if any, opposition in the House. Be it remembered that the Senate this very afternoon passed this same bill unanimously. Not a single Senator from a single State in the Union raised his voice or cast his vote in opposition to this request on the part of the National Defense Council.

Now, I take it that we are all for adequate national defense. There can be no question about that. The debate this afternoon, however, has developed that certain Members of the House are satisfied that this additional kilowatt power is not needed. Then, there are those among us who insist that even though this additional kilowatt power is needed for our national defense, nevertheless, this is the wrong place and the wrong method to be used in procuring the power. Now, there are 435 Members of Congress and, as one of those Members charged with responsibility in this matter, I am free to admit that I am not an expert on the production of kilowatt power; neither am I an expert qualified to speak as to the necessities of the National Defense Council in providing kilowatt power for our national defense. In this particular I think I am in the same position as all Members of the Congress. Assuming that we all want to furnish this national defense and that we are not experts ourselves, then it necessarily follows that we must rely upon expert advice in shaping our course here today. In these circumstances, let us call the witnesses who are presumed to know.

Parenthetically, permit me to say that I have always opposed this T. V. A. socialistic experiment which has sounded, and is sounding, the death knell of much of private initiative and industry by its unfair competition. I am opposed to subsidizing with the taxpayers' money any venture on the part of Government in business, the effect, if not the purpose, of which is to drive out of business the small businessman as well as legitimate industry. I have consistently opposed, on the floor of this House, extending the tentacles of this gigantic New Deal endeavor. I have been in Congress since the inception of the T. V. A. I am not only prejudiced against socialization of this kind, but my opposition is based on sound reason. In these circumstances, the position I take today is certainly not based on any desire to extend or amplify the T. V. A.

The National Defense Council is a nationally known group of business leaders and experts called together to assist the Government in its hour of peril and to provide as rapidly as possible an adequate national defense. Among those on this Council are William S. Knudsen, of General Motors, Mr. Stettinius, former president of the United States Steel Corporation. Mr. Knudsen is an expert in mass production and his job is to see that the industry of America is coordinated and voluntarily mobilized to meet the requirements of our national-defense program. Mr. Stettinius' specific job on the Council is to furnish the raw material to be used in Mr. Knudsen's endeavors. Mr. Knudsen advised Mr. Stettinius as to the requirements of kilowatt power for the purpose of making aluminum to be used in the manufacture of our airplanes. Aluminum is a vital part of every airplane, the average airplane requiring 5 tons of aluminum.

The testimony before the committee shows that Mr. Stettinius sought the advice of Mr. Gano Dunn, who is admitted by all to be one of the outstanding authorities in this country on the production of electric power. Having before him Mr. Knudsen's requirements as to power, a survey was made of power-producing facilities throughout the country. After this survey, it was agreed by Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Knudsen, relying much upon the advice of Mr. Dunn, that the legislation we are now considering is essential to our national defense. Mr. Stettinius, appearing before the Appropriations Committee, said:

> I have been over this matter for approaching 3 weeks now with Mr. Dunn and the members of our staff, and I am perfectly confident, gentlemen, that from the standpoint of our aluminum production to meet the aviation program which Mr. Knudsen is responsible for, and a great many other developments in the southeastern section, we must have this added power.

Mr. Woodrum of Virginia asked:

> And you cannot get it from private industry?

Mr. Stettinius responded:

> We cannot, sir; and it cannot be delayed for reasons which Mr. Dunn will bring out in his testimony. Not weeks, but days, count now from the standpoint of speeding this work up so that we can get the full effect of the spring floods 2 years hence.

I am not going to quote what Mr. Dunn, the engineer, said because that has already been quoted several times here today and in the remarks made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. LEWIS], as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, will be found Mr. Dunn's full statement. Suffice it to say that it seems difficult to read Mr. Dunn's conclusions and not be convinced that this legislation is not only advisable but necessary and urgent in the interest of our national defense.

Now, if Mr. Stettinius, Mr. Knudsen, and Mr. Dunn were advocates of, believers in, or sympathetic with the T. V. A. project, then we might be justified in charging prejudice on their part in favor of the development of the T. V. A. It so happens, however, that Mr. Stettinius, Mr. Knudsen, and Mr. Dunn are all opposed to the philosophy of the T. V. A. They have been its opponents and not its advocates. They believe in individual initiative and the development of our vast national resources by private industry under Government regulation. Then why are they advocating this extension of T. V. A.? To me the answer is simple. Our national defense requires this additional power and it is most available in this particular place. If this were a new proposition, that is, a question of developing kilowatt power by steam, or water, that would be another question. Mr. Dunn, the engineer, made it clear before the committee that with few exceptions kilowatt power can be developed in this country at this time cheaper by steam than water power. He cited as the best evidence of this fact the policy of all private utilities to provide additional kilowatt power by steam rather than further development of potential water power. He attributed this change to modern efficiency of the steam plant.

I call as my next witness a man whom we all agree probably knows as much about T. V. A. and electric power as any man in the country. Former president of the Commonwealth & Southern Power Co., he has opposed the T. V. A. most strenuously from its inception. I refer to none other than Wendell L. Willkie, who because of his opposition to the T. V. A. has been the constant object of attack down through the years by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and other New Deal T. V. A. exponents. When appearing at the hearings before the Appropriations Committee, Mr. Dunn, who had been Mr. Willkie's consulting engineer in his opposition to the T. V. A., made this statement:

I would like to read a statement by Mr. Willkie into the record. Here is what Mr. Willkie said on that subject on June 15, when this proposal was presented in a memorandum to the President. On June 12 it was presented, and it became public, without our knowledge. The reporters went ahead and saw Wendell Willkie, expecting to get a grand slam from him against doing this thing. I will quote from this newspaper interview of June 14, in a Scripps-Howard paper. This is what Mr. Willkie said:

"Nothing is more important than defense, and that is nothing which might and will mask more political logrolling than the flag-waving variety of national defense. But if some impartial group, the United States Army or its engineers, for instance, do say that the completion of these dams is a link in our national defense, the dams should be completed and as rapidly as those charged with our defense think necessary."

The National Defense Council is an "impartial group" as described by Mr. Willkie, and this impartial group says—

That the completion of these dams is a link in our national defense; the dams should be completed and as rapidly as those charged with our defense think necessary.

Mr. Willkie is big enough and patriotic enough not to permit his dislike for T. V. A. and his prejudice against this New Deal socialistic experiment to prevent him from recommending a step which the engineers and the experts tell him is an essential part of our national defense. I agree with Mr. Willkie.

Now, who is opposed to this legislation and what are their reasons? So far as the committee hearings are concerned, and so far as the records show, the only opposition is that opposition expressed here today in the debate. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCLEAN], the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and the others who have spoken in opposition to this bill are all capable, conscientious, and outstanding legislators. They are experts in legislation, tried, experienced, and great weight should be given to their views in the consideration of proposed legislation coming from their committees. They are not experts, however, in the production of kilowatt power, and they do not claim to be. It is the duty of the Congress to determine the policy, but we must rely upon those especially qualified in various lines of endeavor—the experts—for the facts which determine our course as to policy.

In the final analysis, it seems to me that two questions are involved in this debate: First. Is it necessary for the Government to provide additional kilowatt power as requested in this bill? Second. Under existing conditions, should this power be provided in connection with the T. V. A.?

Mr. Knudsen, Mr. Stettinius, and Mr. Dunn answer these questions in the affirmative, and give their reasons. Those in opposition doubt the necessity for this legislation at this time. However, they are satisfied that even if legislation providing for additional power is necessary it should not be produced in connection with T. V. A.

I must make a decision as to which group in this controversy is more likely to be correct. The Senate has already made this decision by a unanimous vote and because in the opinion of the Senate this legislation is so vital, that body is at this minute in recess awaiting the action of the House. Just as soon as this bill passes the House, it will be approved by the Senate and go to the President for signature on this very day.

In spite of the fact that I always have, and still do, oppose the general principle of the T. V. A., yet for the reasons herein given, I am constrained to believe that my duty lies in but one direction. If there is doubt in my mind, that doubt must be resolved in favor of national defense. My conscience tells me that duty requires that I vote for this bill.

The Supply of Tin in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN McDOWELL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

ARTICLE BY DREW PEARSON AND ROBERT S. ALLEN

Mr. MCDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, from today's Washington Merry-Go-Round:

WASHINGTON DAILY MERRY-GO-ROUND

(By Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen)

After 7 years of stalling over one of the most important raw materials to American industry, the State Department actually is doing something about the United States tin supply.

In cooperation with the National Defense Commission, State Department officials are doing three things:

1. Talking with Jesse Jones about an R. F. C. loan to establish a tin smelter in the United States. The United States firms in on this are Phelps-Dodge, National Lead, American Metals, and the American Smelting & Refining Co.

2. Facilitating the visit of the world's biggest tin king, Simon Patino, to the United States; also holding conversations with Mauricio Hochschild, big German-Jewish producer of Bolivian tin.

3. The National Defense Commission has ordered 75,000 tons of metallic tin from the Malay Peninsula and the Dutch East Indies.

This is almost enough to last the United States for half a year—if it ever gets here. But the catch is that the tin is still down in the mines of Malay and must not only be mined and smelted, but also shipped half way around the world. Meanwhile, the Japanese may move into this area of the South Pacific, or the Germans may crush the British combine which controls Malay tin, or the British may decide that they need the tin for their own military purposes.

ONLY 3 WEEKS' SUPPLY

All of which reveals one of the most inexcusable chapters of national-defense neglect in recent history.

Almost nobody knew that on January 1 of this year, United States stocks of tin were so low that we had only 3 weeks' supply. And few people know what the exhaustion of our supply would mean to American life and industry. Not only would it put an end to our packing of food in tin cans, which is a major industry, but it would eventually mean a black-out for every American home not lighted by gas or kerosene lamps. For the contact point of every electric light bulb is made of tin.

Furthermore, the United States Fleet would be laid up in a few months for lack of tin for bearing replacements. The same would apply to automobiles, and to many other products intimately woven into American life.

BOLIVIAN OVERTURES

Despite this, the State Department literally ignored representations by the Bolivian Government to work out a trade agreement whereby the United States would secure tin not from the South Pacific, but from inside the Western Hemisphere, thus avoiding dangerous shipping hauls, and the danger of foreign controls.

First Bolivian overture to the State Department was made by Chargé d'Affaires Enrique Lozada in June 1933, at the suggestion of the Washington Merry-Go-Round. At that time, Acting Secretary of State William Phillips, now Ambassador to Rome, turned a deaf ear. He said the United States was not interested.

Then the late Representative Sam McReynolds, of Tennessee, introduced legislation placing an excise tax on the importation of crude tin, in order to encourage its smelting in the United States. Whereupon the State Department actually intervened to kill the bill, causing its author to protest to his old friend, Cordell Hull.

"This memorandum," said McReynolds, referring to the State Department's memo opposing the tax on crude tin, "could have been no more favorable to British interests if it had been written in the British Foreign Office.

OPPONENTS OF PLAN

By that time it had become apparent that the chief opponents of having Bolivian tin smelted in the United States were (1) the British tin monopoly; (2) the Patino tin interests, which were shipping ore all the way from Bolivia to Liverpool, thence back to the United States, in order to enjoy British monopoly price-fixing; and (3) the National Lead Co., and perhaps also other heavy

United States users of tin, which seemed to be linked with the British-Patino interests.

For instance, the late Edward J. Cornish, chairman of National Lead, also was chairman of Patino Mines and Enterprises, while the present chairman of the Patino company, Fletcher W. Rockwell, is also president of National Lead.

Thus, big American business appeared to be cooperating with the British-Patino monopoly, despite national-defense interests, while the State Department appeared to condone that cooperation.

But now, suddenly awakening to the grave danger of the situation, the State Department is trying desperately to make up for past negligence. Several days ago it sought to arrange for space on a clipper plane for Patino to come to the United States. But, since his family almost fills one clipper, he is en route by boat.

NAZIS IN BOLIVIA

Meanwhile, Jesse Jones, in cooperation with the State Department, is discussing an R. F. C. loan to set up a tin smelter in the United States, with a possible subsidy of 1 or 2 cents a pound on smelted tin. The first company to show an interest was Phelps-Dodge, but more recently American Metals, American Smelting and Refining, and National Lead have shown interest.

Meanwhile Hochschild, who has been mining tin in Bolivia for 10 years, informed the National Defense Commission that he was ready to do immediate business. But the Defense Commission, like the State Department, bowed to the tin king and said they would wait for Patino's arrival.

Most ominus development has been the recent and sudden activity of Nazi interests in Bolivia to try to block these deals. The Bolivian Army, long trained by German officers, and leaning heavily toward the Nazis, is doing everything possible to sabotage the negotiations now being conducted by Bolivian Minister Guachalla in Washington.

NOTE.—Dr. W. Y. Elliott, Harvard expert, comments on the present tin situation: "Today the prospect of Japanese domination of Asia and of German domination of Europe and the whole of its colonies presents this country with an entirely changed strategic situation, desperate in its implications. The securing and processing of these vital strategic materials is no longer an arguable point. It may be a matter of survival itself of the American people."

Why America Should Keep Out of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

WINNING ESSAY, BY REV. JOHN WARREN DAY

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am placing in the RECORD the very short but wonderful essay by Rev. John Warren Day, of Topeka, Kans. It was the prize winner among 400 submitted to the National Committee to Keep America Out of Foreign Wars.

America should keep out of foreign wars—

(1) Because up until 1917 our traditional foreign policy of keeping out of entangling alliances with foreign nations, combined with the Monroe Doctrine, made it possible for this Nation to develop her own material, moral, and social resources to a high level of achievement. Our first flight into foreign meddling on a large military scale seems to have resulted in throwing us into reverse.

(2) Because war destroys a large part of a nation's most virile manhood. It upsets international trade, the national economy, the ordinary peacetime standards of decency and morality, thereby retarding the processes of democracy which are so dependent upon the motives set forth by the Christian religion.

(3) Because to fight another foreign war to preserve democracy will undoubtedly insure its destruction in America for many years, because it would necessitate a military dictatorship to carry it to a successful military conclusion. Foreign wars are based upon imperialistic aims. Imperialisms always move in the direction of dictatorships, and warfare is their modus operandi. Democracy constantly moves in the opposite direction. It makes progress not by cracking heads but by counting them.

Dean of Grace Cathedral, Topeka, Kans.

Operations of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY B. STEAGALL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

STATEMENT BY LEO T. CROWLEY

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Mr. Leo T. Crowley, which was published in the New York Herald Tribune on July 29:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of July 29, 1940]

F. D. I. C. SHOWS GAIN IN CAPITAL; MAY CUT FEES—FUNDS NEAR $500,000,000, AND CROWLEY CONSIDERS DIP IN ASSESSMENT RATE

WASHINGTON, July 28.—In reporting to insured banks today on the condition of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, as of June 30, Leo T. Crowley, Chairman, says that, as it now appears that the capital of the Corporation will have increased to about $500,000,000 by the end of 1940, it would be appropriate to give consideration to a reasonable reduction in the rate of assessments paid by banks.

Mr. Crowley did not give any inkling in his report as to his ideas of a reasonable reduction in the Corporation's assessment rate. There have been reports here, however, that the Corporation would not look with disfavor on legislation which would pare the assessment rate to one-fourteenth of 1 percent of insured deposits from the present figure of one-twelfth of 1 percent.

Assessment income realized by the Corporation in the first 6 months of this year amounted to $22,415,429, or at an annual rate of approximately $45,000,000. On this basis, a reduction in the assessment rate to one-fourteenth of 1 percent would mean to insured banks a saving of about $6,500,000 on an annual basis. It was regarded as significant that Mr. Crowley spoke of a cut in the assessment rate rather than elimination of the assessment on interbank deposits, as would be achieved by a bill pending in the Senate since the regular session of Congress last year.

LOSSES TO BE FEWER

Following an outlay of about $80,000,000 in the first half of this year, the largest disbursements by the Corporation in any 6 months' period, Mr. Crowley says: "We can now say with a reasonable degree of assurance that the accumulated losses in the banking system have been eliminated with the possible exception of a few small scattered cases." However, it is inevitable that there will be bank failures from losses currently arising just as there are failures in any other business. Henceforth bank owners should assume a greater share of the risk of their business by investing more private capital, particularly in the case of weak or inadequately capitalized banks.

Mr. Crowley informs the insured banks that the corporation in the first 6 months disbursed more than $65,000,000 to facilitate the merger of 20 banks. Included in this outlay were the following sums: $16,000,000 for Integrity Trust Co., Philadelphia; $23,000,000 for First Trust & Deposit Co., Syracuse; and $16,700,000 for First Citizens Bank & Trust Co., Utica.

Income of the Corporation for the first 6 months amounted to $27,382,078, of which $22,415,429 represented assessments paid by insured banks and $4,966,649 represented interest earned, after deducting provision for amortization of premiums, and profits on securities sold. Expenses and losses amounted to $11,706,213, including deposit insurance losses and expenses of $9,973,971 and administrative expenses and other charges of $1,732,242.

SURPLUS GAINED

For the year ended June 30, income of the Corporation amounted to $52,821,659, including assessments paid by insured banks of $43,271,826 and $9,549,832 of interest earned, less provision for amortization of premiums, and profits on securities sold. Total losses and expenses for the year amounted to $14,343,570, represented by deposit insurance losses and expenses of $10,863,370 and administrative expenses and other charges of $3,480,201.

Surplus of the Corporation as of June 30 was $180,264,574, representing the excess of income over expenses and losses during the entire period of operation. Since the beginning of deposit insurance total income has amounted to $245,985,466, including assessments of $187,313,360 paid by insured banks and $58,672,106 derived from interest earned and profits from sales of securities, after provision for amortization of premiums. Charges to surplus have amounted to $65,720,891. Net deposit insurance losses and expenses amounted to $45,525,604, resulting from the difference between total disbursements of $219,930,791 actually made or pending to depositors of closed insured banks and estimated recoveries of $174,405,187.

[1] As of June 3, 1940, the Corporation had deposited $16,690,481 in a special account for the purchase of assets from an insured bank, if and when an existing purchase commitment is consummated. A reserve has been provided for the estimated loss of $4,275,000 in the liquidation of these assets, and the surplus of the corporation has been reduced by this amount by the inclusion of a provision for this loss with other deposit-insurance losses and expenses.

In the first half year 30 insured banks closed or received aid from the Corporation. The 234,400 depositors in these banks, having total deposits of $136,391,000, were protected by insurance or otherwise to the extent of $136,224,000.

Marvelous Rescue of the Mosquito Fleet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appears in the August 3 issue of the Saturday Evening Post:

MARVELOUS RESCUE OF THE MOSQUITO FLEET

Here is a story that was blurred in the news. It is the story of how an original fleet of fast torpedo boats building for the United States Navy was lost by intent, recaptured by accident, and then restored to the national defense, where it will stay.

Early in June there were rumors, seemingly from London, that the British Admiralty was negotiating with the American Government for some "old" destroyers. And it was supposed that the American Government, if it were so resolved, could actually effect a transfer of United States Navy vessels to a foreign belligerent, as it had already been doing with airplanes and guns, by the simple device of declaring them to be "surplus" and selling them, not directly to the Allies, but first to the manufacturer, on condition that he resell and deliver them immediately to the Allies—the American Government to take credit for replacements to be made out of future production.

The rumors were not confirmed. The Navy Department was silent.

One afternoon the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, having an officer of the Navy before it to testify on other matters, suddenly asked him what he knew about it. He replied "that nothing had been done about releasing destroyers." Whereupon, in the presence of the naval officer, the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs agreed to address a letter to the President asking him what property of the United States Navy, surplus or other, had been disposed of.

The next morning, before there had been time to send such a letter, the Acting Secretary of the Navy got the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs on the telephone and told him that 11 motor torpedo boats and 12 motor submarine chasers, a total of 23 vessels, called the mosquito fleet, had been disposed of. This was the very first the Congress knew of it.

What had happened, according to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, reporting it afterward to the Senate, was that when the naval officer got back to the Department, he told his superiors what the committee was going to do and suggested tactfully that somebody had better tell it about the disposal that had been made of the mosquito fleet.

The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs immediately summoned the Acting Secretary of the Navy, Lewis Compton. He was asked by what authority of law the Navy had released the mosquito fleet it was building. Certainly a fleet in building could not be called surplus or obsolete, could it? The Acting Secretary of the Navy admitted that it couldn't; but he called the committee's attention to a law that permitted the Navy to change its designs and modify its contracts. Well, then, all it had done had been to decide that it could build better vessels by an improved design, which made it possible so to modify its contract with the boat builders that they could sell to the British Admiralty the fleet they were building for the United States Navy.

At this, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs exclaimed: "Now, Senators, see how careful we shall have to be in our legislation. They have a right to modify or change their contracts. So all these transactions have been based, not on any legal authority—for they have none—to dispose of any property except surplus, but upon the fact that they have authority to modify or change contracts. Who in God's name, in Congress or in the country, thought, when such a power was given, that these contracts for our own protection would be modified or changed in order to assist one side or the other of belligerents at war?"

But beyond the question of legal authority was the question of responsibility. The Acting Secretary of the Navy was asked on whose responsibility this thing had been done. He said it had been done entirely upon his own responsibility.

He was asked, "And you say on your own responsibility that this was done without consulting the Commander in Chief?"

His answer was, "Yes."

It was very handsome of the Acting Secretary of the Navy to take upon himself the entire responsibility—possibly more handsome than he knew—for, as it turned out, the transaction was in violation of a statute in the Federal Criminal Code.

However, the President could not accept it. He caused his private secretary to issue a White House statement saying that he, the President, had been himself fully and directly responsible. Thus clarified, Mr. Compton was heard no more on that matter.

It had been, as Chairman WALSH said, "by the merest accident" that the loss of the mosquito fleet was discovered in the first place; and it looked then as if it were already too late.

What saved it was unexpected. A Member of Congress from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] suddenly stood in the well of the House of Representatives reading chapter 30, title V, 3, 40 Statutes 222—in effect since 1917—which says it shall be unlawful "during a war in which the United States is a neutral nation to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war * * * with any intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation," under pain of fine or imprisonment, or both.

And that was what saved the mosquito fleet—the only defense of that kind we had in preparation.

After a silent week end at Hyde Park, the President returned to Washington, and abruptly canceled the Navy Department's release of its mosquito fleet to the British Admiralty. This he did, according to the White House statement, on "an informal opinion prepared by the Attorney General." Which leaves one to ask whether the transaction had been begun with no legal opinion at all, or whether the Attorney General was indebted to Mr. CASE of South Dakota, for his knowledge of the law that made it criminal.

The rest of the White House statement was defensive argument. Firstly, those fast motor torpedo boats were experimental. Secondly, if it took 6 months to replace the fleet that was going to be released to the British, still no time would be really lost, because the quantity would accelerate production, there would be all the more time to train the personnel, and we should be learning something. Waive all that. It may or may not be technical. The triumph of the defense was to say that the new fleet to be built in place of the one released to the British would be designed for the 21-inch torpedo, which is standard in the United States Navy; whereas the fleet that was going to be sold to the British Government was designed for the 18-inch torpedo, which is obsolete in the United States Navy.

What would this mean? It would mean that the United States Navy had been building a mosquito fleet for an obsolete torpedo. As we believe in the United States Navy, we do not believe this.

Not the least distorted feature of the whole matter was the disposition of the Navy to belittle its own work. Senator WALSH said: "The Navy Department called the vessels 'boats' first of all. They did not give the emphasis to value which I myself had and which other members of the committee had. * * * I wish to say that I have given the Navy credit for having more sense and more patriotism than to spend $6,000,000 for ships which are not of value and importance to the Navy." And he added that the loss of these vessels, which were for the defense of eastern seaboard harbors, would have been a serious injury to our own national defense.

Well, there is the story. The only sequel, so far, is a paragraph written into the naval appropriations bill saying, "No vessel, ship, or boat now in the United States Navy or being built therefor shall be disposed of by sale or otherwise or be chartered or scrapped without the consent of the Congress."

Those are strange words to appear in an American law. The necessity that gave rise to them was strange above all.

Extension of Credit to Latin American Countries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday by unanimous consent, I incorporated in the RECORD information with reference to the defaults of South American nations compiled by one of my constituents.

Further light is thrown upon this proposal to extend further Government credits to Latin American countries in the Western Hemisphere by an article appearing in the Chicago Tribune under date of July 29, 1940, and for the information of Members of Congress and the country at large I am incorporating this statement and these remarks in the RECORD, so as to make the record complete.

MOST OF LATIN AMERICAN LOANS ARE IN DEFAULT—UNITED STATES INVESTORS HOLD ONE AND SEVEN-TENTHS BILLIONS

Latin American governments and corporations have defaulted on more than 75 percent of their obligations held by investors in the United States, a survey indicated yesterday. United States investors' holdings of Latin American obligations total about one and seven-tenths billion dollars.

Interest payments on many of the Latin-American dollar bonds were suspended early in the depression.

ADJUSTMENT EFFORTS FAIL

Adjustments, part payments, and drawn-out negotiations between representatives of American bondholders and the Latin American countries have brought little improvement in the debt service.

"Latin American countries, taken as a world group, have made relatively the poorest showing in the adjustment of their defaulted bonds," said the Foreign Bondholders' Protective Council, Inc., in its most recent report. The council is a private nonprofit organization formed to protect American holders of foreign securities.

DATA ON BOND DEFAULTS

Figures showing the status of some of the bonds of Latin American countries held in the United States and the percentage of the face value of the bonds in default at the end of 1939, as reported recently in an analysis by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, follow:

	Par value	Percent in default
Argentina	$197,900,000	5.1
Bolivia	53,600,000	100.0
Brazil	273,200,000	92.2
Chile	191,500,000	74.8
Cuba	66,400,000	17.0
Costa Rica	8,000,000	100.0
Colombia	128,000,000	89.6
Guatemala	8,000,000	100.0
Panama	11,300,000	69.3
Peru	54,100,000	100.0
Salvador	4,100,000	100.0
Uruguay	35,700,000	10.4

In addition to the loss of interest, American investors have taken heavy losses in the market value of the Latin American bonds.

The Real "Fifth Columnists"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

ARTICLE FROM FORTUNE MAGAZINE

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, since there are so many who seem to desire to conscript our manpower, without doing the same for the wealth of the country, it might be well to get a clear view of the entire picture. Not the least of the "subversive" influences in the country are the armament maker and others who hope to profit by a blood bath. Let us see what Fortune magazine has to say.

[From Fortune magazine of March 1934]

ARMS AND THE MEN—LOVE THINE ENEMY

The armorers, after all, are the true internationalists. Regardless of their nationalities, they work in concert at the two axioms of their trade—prolong wars, disturb peace. Between 1914 and 1918 they practiced constantly a neat practical way of prolonging war.

It was this: If your enemy is in danger of running short of a basic raw material that he needs in the business of destroying your troops, sell him some out of your own surplus stocks.

Such interchanges went on constantly during the war—always, of course, through a neutral intermediary. (The amenities of warfare must be observed, even at some inconvenience.) Throughout the war English and French industries maintained to Germany a steady stream of glycerin (for explosives), nickel, copper, oil, and rubber. Germany even returned the compliment: She sent France iron and steel and magnetos for gasoline engines. This constant traffic went on during the war via Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Switzerland, Spain, or Holland by the simple process of transshipment—enemy to neutral to enemy.

It is no bristling Communist who supplies corroboration, but as conservative and well-considered a gentleman as Rear Admiral Montagu William Warcop Peter Consett, who was British naval attaché in Denmark between 1912 and 1917 and in Norway and Sweden between 1912 and 1919. He stated in so many words that if the "blockade" of Germany had been really effective during 1915 and 1916 Germany would have been forced to her knees long before the collapse of Russia permitted her to prolong the struggle by throwing more troops into the trenches of the western front. And it is he who is responsible for the following statement:

"In 1915 England exported twice as much nickel to Sweden as in the 2 previous years put together. Of the total imports of 504 tons, 70 were reshipped to Germany. But it can be said that the total importation served the needs of Germany, for the remaining 434 tons were used in Sweden for the manufacture of munitions."

And so it went. Germany throughout the war had urgent need of nickel, aluminum, and chemicals like glycerin for explosives. France, because the rich Briey basin and other sources were out of her control, had to scratch hard for iron and steel. Continuously, therefore, what one nation lacked the armament manufacturers of an enemy nation did their urgent best to provide. Month after month during the war German heavy industries exported an average of 150,000 tons of scrap iron, steel, or barbed wire to Switzerland, where, having been smelted to a more convenient form, it was then transshipped to France. France, in her turn, shipped chemicals to the Lonza Co. (a Swiss industrial concern, German controlled, but with directors who were French, Italian, and Austrian as well), from which they reached munitions works in Germany. It was all very profitable—and the splendid war went on and on.

THIS FRENCH GUN BELONGS TO THE FRENCH NAVY

But that does not mean that cannon merchants equip only their own armies with the tools of war. In 1899 British soldiers were shot down by British guns that British armament firms had sold to the Boers. When in 1914 the Kaiser's armies marched westward into Belgium and eastward toward Russia German soldiers were killed by German guns manned by the armies of King Albert and Czar Nicholas II. Great Britain had built and equipped the Turkish Navy before the war; in the Dardanelles British ships were blown up by British mines, shattered by British cannon. Bulgarian troops turned French 75s (the famous "Soixante-Quinze" of the Schneider-Creusot factories) on French poilus. In every naval engagement of the World War the German fleet encountered vessels protected by armor plate made by Germans or with German patents. On a village green in rural England stands a war memorial, a cannon captured by the local regiment from the Germans. On one side of the cannon are engraved the names of the English soldiers who were killed in that advance. On the other side is the manufacturer's name, the English Vickers, Ltd. The Riffs found French guns useful in mowing down French regular troops. China has been pleased to use excellent Japanese guns for the purpose of killing excellent Japanese soldiers. This friendly exchange is still in vogue. Perhaps it is only sentimental to mention it. If a man must be shot to death, what difference does it make whether his enemy or his brother forges the gun that kills him?

ARMS AND THE MEN

A primer on Europe's armament makers, their mines, their smelters, their banks, their holding companies, their ability to supply everything you need for a war from cannons to the casus belli; their axioms, which are (a) prolong war, (b) disturb peace.

According to the best accounting figures, it cost about $25,000 to kill a soldier during the World War. There is one class of big-business men in Europe that never rose up to denounce the extravagance of its governments in this regard—to point out that when death is left unhampered as an enterprise for the individual initiative of gangsters the cost of a single killing seldom exceeds $100. The reason for the silence of these big-business men is quite simple: The killing is their business * * * every time a burst shell fragment finds its way into the brain, the heart, or the intestines of a man in the front line, a great part of the $25,000, much of it profit, finds its way into the pocket of the armament maker.

French interests not only sold arms to Hungary in flat violation of the Treaty of Trianon, but when Hungary defaulted on the bill the armorers got the French Government to lend Hungary the money to pay the French armorers. Thus, too, the great Czechoslovakian armament company, controlled by Frenchmen, promoted the rise of Hitler in Germany and contributed millions of marks to Hitler's campaign. These same Frenchmen own newspapers that did more than any others to enrage France against Hitler. It is time we had a dramatis personae of arms and the men.

"NO SOLDIER WOULD START A NEW WAR!"—GEN. MAXIME WEYGAND, OF FRANCE

Germany, forbidden by the Treaty of Versailles to import armaments, receives generous supplies from Sweden (where Krupp controls the armament firm of Bofors) and Holland. Forbidden to export armaments, she ships to South Africa, the Far East, or to any European nation that will violate its own treaty by ordering from her. Yet for all the might of the Krupp works, we must look elsewhere today to find the real heart of the armament business.

BETHLEHEM STEEL ET AL.

To the United States, perhaps? After all, we have our Du Ponts, who at least own the State of Delaware. We have an Army and Navy whose officers, according to the statement of a former Cabinet officer, are far and away more active than the officers of any other armed forces in the world against any sort of international understanding. We have an armament bill of over $200,000,000 a year. We once had our (when we say armaments we mean here, and hereafter, only the actual implements and materials of war—cannon, guns, ammunition, tanks, military aircraft, and naval vessels) "big bass drum," Mr. William B. Shearer, whose boast was that he wrecked the Naval Conference at Geneva in 1927. We have our Midvale Co. (controlled by the Baldwin Locomotive Works), which prospered mightily during the war and has continued the manufacture of guns and gun forgings, armor plate, and projectiles; our Colt's Patent Firearms Manufacturing Co., which supplies machine guns as well as squirrel rifles, which declared an extra dividend in 1933; our Remington Arms Co. (controlled by Du Pont), whose output of firearms and ammunition together is one-third of United States production. And we have our Bethlehem Steel Co.

Bethlehem's Mr. Charles M. Schwab dismayed the cadets of West Point in 1927 by saying: "Today the Bethlehem Steel Co. has definitely abandoned any thought of ever again engaging in the manufacture of ordnance except in times of great national emergency." Such times are apparently with us now—have, in fact, been continually with us since Mr. Schwab unloosed this shaft of oratory. In the official listing of Bethlehem's products (you need only turn to standard statistics or Bethlehem's own most recent annual report) you will find armor plate, projectiles, gun and shell forgings, battleships, battle cruisers, scout cruisers, destroyers, submarines, and airplane carriers all listed as products of Bethlehem's plants. The site at Bethlehem where cannon and armor plate are made is separate from the rest of the plant. No outsiders are allowed. * * *

Our own country is not, then, quite so virginally innocent in this business as we might like to suppose. But despite the size of our armament bill, our armament and munitions exports to South and Central America, and the Far East, we are essentially small fry in this game.

ENGLAND'S VICKERS-ARMSTRONG

Much larger fry is England, where the firm of Vickers-Armstrong is the brightest star in the armament firmament. The annual bills of Vickers-Armstrong to nations for armaments purchased quite possibly amount to $100,000,000.

The sun never sets upon Vickers. It has its factories in Rumania where, for greater convenience, Sir Herbert Lawrence is a director of the Bank of Rumania (and Vickers to some degree allies itself with the Czechoslovakian armament firm of Skoda). In Italy it latinizes its name to Societa Vickers-Terni; in Japan it has as a subsidiary the Japan Steel Works, and thus allies itself with the Japanese armament and industrial firm of Mitsui. There are Vickers factories or subsidiary companies in Spain, Canada, Ireland, Holland (The Hague affords an appropriate site for some of the Vickers operations), and New Zealand.

Vickers directors are men of wide affairs. Sir Herbert Lawrence, besides being a director of the Bank of Rumania, is also a director of the Sun Insurance Office, Ltd., with which Vickers-Armstrong has a curious agreement that "if the profits (of Vickers) in any year during the 5 years ending December 31, 1932, do not amount to £900,000, then a contribution not exceeding £200,000 will be made in each year." Sir Otto Niemeyer, the infant phenomenon of British finance, who first entered His Majesty's Treasury at the age of 23, is another Vickers director; he is, in addition, an officer of the Bank of England, a director of the Anglo-International Bank and the Bank of International Settlements.

Among the more prominent shareholders of Vickers or allied concerns in 1932 were: Rt. Hon. Neville Chamberlain, Chancelor of the Exchequer; Sir Austen Chamberlain, Member of Parliament, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1925. * * * In 1914 the list was even more imposing. It included that lofty philosopher, Lord Balfour; that glittering snob, Lord Curzon; and also Lord Kinnaird (president of the Y. M. C. A.), three bishops, and Dean Inge of St. Paul's. It was in that same year that Socialist Philip Snowden spoke in Parliament: "It would be impossible to throw a stone on the benches opposite without hitting a member who is a shareholder in one or other of these firms."

The American that gladdened his heart was Hiram Maxim, whose new machine gun was incomparably the best killing machine Zaharoff had ever seen. * * * The Boer War added to his laurels; Boers shot Englishmen with Vickers guns and ammunition. The Russo-Japan War provided him with an even wider field for his gifts; Vickers sold as much war material (and possibly more) to Russia as it did to Japan, England's supposed ally.

SCHNEIDER-CREUSOT

France stands at the very top. She stands at the top in the amount her Government spends on armaments; at the top in the amount of arms she exports to other nations; at the top also by virtue of the billion francs she has spent to build a military Chinese wall of forts, many of them underground, along her eastern boundaries. But these mere quantitative details do not reveal the true significance of her position.

She stands today as a queer paradox: France, the democracy, a quiet pasture land for the world's famous peasantry, coexisting with France, the greatest military power of modern times, with an army which all but equals in number, and far surpasses in equipment, Germany's vast militaristic machine of 1914.

The French threat to the peace of the world lies elsewhere—in France. For in France, and only in France, a new situation exists; the armament makers are no longer, like Alfred Krupp or Sir Basil Zaharoff in his younger days, humble petitioners of government, hat-in-hand solicitors of orders—their influence is so infiltrated into the industrial, social, and political affairs of the nation that they have power in some ways beyond the state; a power so mighty that they are all but able, for their own individualistic reasons, to sweep the state along in a course of action against its own will. They are all but anonymous, these men. They are displeased by publicity and are well able to enforce their displeasure.

But we must now displease one of them and present the figure of M. Charles Prosper Eugene Schneider.

Charles Prosper Eugene Schneider is a man of many offices—the executive head of hundreds of armament firms throughout Europe. He is the president of the Schneider-Creusot Co., armament manufacturers with mines, smelters, and foundries scattered throughout France. He is director of the Banque de l'Union Parisienne, one of whose most profitable sources of business is the financing of loans for armaments.

François de Wendel comes legitimately by his present power and position; his family have been Europe's armorers since before the French Revolution, although the De Wendels have not always been French, not even always the De Wendels. There was once a Johann Georg von Wendel, who, in the seventeenth century, was a colonel in the armies of Ferdinand III, of Germany.

The tragedy of Waterloo was no tragedy to the De Wendels; a cartoon of them going home after the battle to count their profit from it would not have been far-fetched.

They are conspirators because they have no loyalties, because theirs is the sword that knows no brother.

In Germany the greatest steel company is the Vereinigte Stahlwerke A. G., and for its head it has Fritz Thyssen. * * * It was Thyssen who was Hitler's angel.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS

One of the first public men to comment on Arms and the Men in Fortune's March issue was Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University and president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Here is an excerpt from an interview with him as published in the New York Herald Tribune for March 4, 1934:

"But the thing which will make the greatest sensation since the World War is the exposure in the March issue of Fortune of the interlocking of the armament industries, in which the German manufacturers sold to the Frenchmen guns and ammunition to kill the German and the French munition men sold to the Germans munitions to kill Frenchmen. I doubt that this material will be published abroad. The reason is that the munition men control the European press. If that article were published in either France or Germany it would cause a tremendous reaction, but I expect that it will not be printed. Great Britain did not sell guns and ammunition to the enemies of England."

Unfortunately, if Dr. Butler is quoted correctly he has, in his last statement, come into collision with facts. For 18 years has stood unchallenged the charge of British Rear Admiral Montagu W. W. P. Consett that British manufacturers during the war conducted a profitable trade with Germany in nickel and other war materials through the intermediary of one or another convenient neutral.

LONDON, March 26.—The direct question whether munitions turned out by Vickers, Ltd., great British armaments firm, were secretly being used for the rearmament of Germany and Austria was put at the annual meeting of Vickers shareholders here today.

Gen. Sir Herbert A. Lawrence, chairman of the firm, replied that he could not give any assurance in definite terms, but pointed out that exports of armaments from Great Britain were strictly limited to shipments approved by the Government, and said nothing was done without the complete sanction and approval of the Government.

Miss Eleanor Rathbone, independent member for the English universities of the House of Commons, questioned the chairman as to advertisements of tanks and other armaments circulated by the firm in German newspapers.

The explanation, as already given, said the chairman, was that the English press was not well represented in South American countries where Vickers had many old clients for shipbuilding and armaments, but that many German newspapers circulated there; consequently, they felt the best way to get in touch with many interests in South America was through advertisements in German papers which circulated there.

One other criticism made perhaps by a dozen readers is epitomized by George Seldes:

I notice you speak only of the "sinister business going on in Europe." I have been gathering material for 10 years on this subject and will publish it shortly. You may be surprised how much of this sinister business has always been and still is (I say regretfully) American.

Our Foreign Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

TEXT OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S MESSAGE TO FOREIGN TRADE CONVENTION

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the text of the President's message to the National Foreign Trade Convention at San Francisco, as quoted by the New York Times, July 31, 1940:

[From the New York Times of July 31, 1940]

It is a great pleasure to offer my warm greetings to the delegates assembled for the Twenty-seventh National Foreign Trade Convention at San Francisco. I am confident that your deliberations, which are characteristic of our democracy at work, will contribute substantially to the successful solution of your common problems—problems which are today of grave concern to the entire Nation.

Producers and workers in our export industries, both agricultural and industrial; consumers of imported products; foreign traders; banks, insurance and shipping companies; all of the millions of our people who have a vital stake in the Nation's foreign trade, realize the seriousness and the difficulty of the problems confronting us in this field today. You are all aware of the dislocations suffered by our foreign trade as a result of armed conflict in other parts of the world. Established trade channels have been disrupted, our exports of many important products, particularly agricultural, have been severely curtailed, our trade with virtually the entire European continent has dwindled to a small fraction of its former volume, and the weakening of the international economic structure has necessitated the imposition by many countries of even more drastic trade-control measures than existed before the war.

Nevertheless, the substantial progress made during the past 6 years in our efforts to maintain trade between free nations, on the basis of the liberal and democratic principles which underlie our trade-agreement program, has not by any means been lost. In order to safeguard the progress made thus far, and to meet any external threat to our economic security, we must redouble our efforts to bring about, by every practicable means, the closest possible economic cooperation with other countries, particularly with those in the Western Hemisphere. It is my profound conviction that such a vigorous program of economic defense is an essential part of our national-defense program.

It has been suggested or implied by a few faint-hearted defeatists in recent weeks that we should abandon our efforts to conduct our foreign trade on the basis of liberal and democratic principles. The logic of such implications, if they be true, would lead us to embark upon a course of action which would subject our producers, consumers, and foreign traders, and ultimately the entire Nation, to the regimentation of a totalitarian system. For it is naive to imagine that we could adopt a totalitarian control of our foreign trade and at the same time escape totalitarian regimentation of our internal economy. I, therefore, reject any implication that we have been defeated in our efforts to maintain liberal trade principles and, to the end that our continued efforts to maintain those principles may be crowned with lasting success, I pledge you the whole-hearted cooperation of your Government.

An American Principle Wrecked

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WILLIAMSPORT (PA.) SUN

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial of the Williamsport Sun, Williamsport, Pa., showing how President Roosevelt has wrecked an American principle of vital importance to the preservation of the Republic and the only way the American people can recover and reestablish that principle is by the smashing defeat of Mr. Roosevelt:

AN AMERICAN PRINCIPLE WRECKED

We are writing this editorial long hours before Mr. Roosevelt is scheduled to complete the "draft" farce with an address to the Democratic Convention.

For all that matters, with the exception of bringing one or two items up to the minute, it could have been prepared months ago. The facts in it have long been obvious, but we American people are a funny lot.

Even in the face of contrary circumstances we still hope on and on. We have so great confidence in and respect for those who occupy our highest offices it is difficult for us to accept the final truth that they are capable of any other than the most sincere acts with complete conformance to the justice and propriety of the occasion.

Hence, we continued to cling to the hope that respect for American tradition and justice to those who have been loyal to man and party at the cost of much personal sacrifice would bring an honorable ending to the Chicago convention.

Like many, many other persons we have been reading columnists and listening to commentators. Those who have been critical, we thought might be suffering from partisan or personal prejudice and that in the long run the outcome would upset their dope and prove they had misread happenings and developments.

'Tis true that we could not close our ears securely to the echo of rumblings of the unsuccessful efforts at purging that have marked previous campaigns in which the present administration figured.

We could not escape the reverberations of the blasting of other Presidential candidates during the past months. Nor could we banish entirely the sight of the smearing of other aspirants, nor get altogether away from the sickening sound of the blows the group of ambition killers rained upon the heads of these aspirants whenever they stuck them above the crowd.

All this flowed and ebbed in memory, but still we hoped that tradition and fairness would win out.

Of course, there was always the ominous silence. No break occurred in it, even when sincere, honorably ambitious men went up the steps of the White House with requests for information and guidance. Their hands cupped behind their ears intercepted no sound waves.

Then, a palace guardsman, one who had been making his home at the White House, left for Chicago. Could he have the answer to the riddle? Would some act or word of his set straight the unique situation?

Would he utter the message the Nation wanted to hear—that precious American tradition, tradition established and continued at the patriotic sacrifice of great Americans' hopes and ambitions, would be adhered to?

Would he convince us that, after all, we were unfair and needlessly perturbed over the hovering apprehension that unholy things were going on behind the back of the public?

But no, his first acts were to set up a telephone line in direct communication with the White House and to hang out a shingle indicating that he was in Chicago to make good all the plans and plots of the third termers.

Still, we hoped.

Then came the momentous statement of Tuesday night. Hope gasped and passed out before the Kentucky Senator was half through his announcement.

The American people do not mind being fooled occasionally, and they like to be kidded, but they resent insult, and especially insult to their intelligence. That's what, we find, has happened to us. We're expected to believe that all this "draft" movement has been the natural, spontaneous demand of the people, when, now through it all, we can see and recognize the hands that engineered the manipulation.

Today we are disillusioned; we are hurt; our hearts ache with sadness. The wool is removed from our eyes and they betray tears over discovery of political trickery in high places.

We have a bit of the reaction of concern, even fear. If good and understanding people such as those who make up the State and county leadership of the Democratic Party throughout the Nation, and who thereby furnish delegates to national conventions, have been misled by their chieftains, what of the future of the Republic?

On some sides you can hear expressions of jubilation that Mr. Roosevelt has broken a tradition. He hasn't broken a tradition, he's wrecked an American principle of vital importance to the preservation of the Republic, and the only way the American people can recover and reestablish that principle is by the smashing defeat of Mr. Roosevelt.

The Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. L. L. MARSHALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following item from the Cleveland Plain Dealer expressing the attitude of Rabbi A. H. Silver on the third-term question.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer of April 1, 1940]

"NO THIRD TERM" URGED BY SILVER—TRADITION OF ROTATION IS SOUND RABBI SAYS

President Roosevelt ought not to stand for election for a third term, in the opinion of Rabbi A. H. Silver, expressed in an address before a capacity audience at the temple yesterday morning.

"The tradition of rotation and restricted tenure of office is a sound one," Rabbi Silver asserted. "With this salutary tradition we have come a century and a half through many crises, some of which, in my opinion, were graver than that of today. The whole genius of American political life is against the one-man savior. The philosophy of dictatorship is the very antithesis of the philosophy of democracy. The strength of democracy is not its faith in the man, but in the people.

"It is not a law but a tradition there should be rotation in the office of Chief Executive every 4 or 8 years. In this case the tradition or custom is more powerful than a law.

SHOULD DEMONSTRATE FAITH

"The real question over the third term for President Roosevelt is whether the times are so desperate as to warrant a break from tradition, and I, for one, say 'No.'

"At this time I think it is particularly desirable that a President should demonstrate his faith in democracy by voluntarily relinquishing office. To insist on the reelection of a President on the ground that he is the sole leader who can save the people is to acknowledge publicly the bankruptcy of democracy. It is preferable in this case to elect an apparently less qualified candidate with the hope that the office will develop his powers, just as the responsibilities of office developed President Roosevelt.

"Renomination of President Roosevelt will obscure the issue in the forthcoming election, relieving the Republican Party of the responsibility in showing what it proposes to do about the real problems of the country. The issue would be fought over the cry of 'Roosevelt the would-be dictator,' and otherwise nothing would be decided by the election.

PROGRESS HAS BEEN MADE

"No matter what party is elected, we must remember that substantial progress was registered under President Roosevelt and that that progress must be continued if chaos is to be averted. Whoever succeeds President Roosevelt will have to follow him in solving our problems from the bottom up, not the top down, in terms of the masses and not of the classes, and with primary concern for the laborer, the farmer, and the boy seeking a job, rather than for the corporations.

"No mere negation of the New Deal is adequate to meet the present situation. If there is to be a new party it must show how it will deal with the problems of unemployment, the Dust Bowl, the regions where the Grapes of Wrath are stored, wages and hours, labor relations, social and old-age security and Federal relief. It is well to talk about balancing the Budget, and how is it to be balanced? It is desirable that taxes should be reduced, but at whose expense? To specific problems, specific concrete answers must be given."

"Fifth Column" Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NEWT V. MILLS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, of course I shall support every national-defense bill. We have been a long time realizing that this Nation is not adequately prepared, and we cannot hope to, within a few short days after this realization has dawned on us, complete legislation which will completely meet the demands of national defense as we see it today.

We have only touched the surface when we pass a bill authorizing an expansion of the Army, Navy, and Air Corps. If we do that, then smugly tell our folks that we have done a great job, we will have missed the point a long way. There is much to be done, and I believe this Congress should stay in session until an adequate national-defense program has been completed.

Hitler has bragged publicly that he was able to do the speedy and devastating job he has done in Europe largely by reason of the operation of what he chooses to call the "fifth column" in the countries of Europe. Anyone who thinks that there are no subversive activities going on in the United States today is one who refuses to face the facts. At the moment the Federal Bureau of Investigation has only a force of approximately 1,000 men to stamp out Communist, Fascist, Nazi, and other subversive activities in the United States among 130,000,000 people.

I propose to introduce legislation to correct this, as I hold the Federal Bureau of Investigation should be authorized to employ a sufficient number of men to protect the people of the United States against "fifth column" and all subversive activities.

Mr. Speaker, we are going to be derelict in our duty if we do not, before this Congress adjourns, provide an authorization and funds to be placed in the hands of one of the greatest men in his specialized line that this Nation has ever seen—J. Edgar Hoover—to combat the "fifth column" movement in the United States.

I want to tell you that the time is here when we of this body had better begin to give a little concern to the cankerous infection within the vitals of this Government, which is being nurtured and fed by those of foreign birth who advocate European "isms" as a substitute for our form of government.

We have gone far enough in our smug complacency in furnishing police protection to Communists, Fascists, and members of the German Bund, as they in the public square and in public places openly advocate the overthrow of this, the greatest Government in the world.

Now is the time when we should begin to think seriously about this thing which has grown up in our Government and which is among us and which, day after day, proposes the overthrow of this Government.

I am advised that we have many people on the Federal pay roll in the Nation's Capital here in Washington who glibly admit that they are connected with either the Communist, Fascist, or German Bund parties. If this be the case, surely the executive heads of our various governmental agencies will have the intestinal fortitude, if in the past they have been so lacking in American patriotism that they have failed to do so heretofore, to discharge these traitors from the Federal pay roll.

Compulsory Military Training Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

RESOLUTION BY RALPH D. COLE POST, NO. 3, AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the resolution adopted by the Ralph D. Cole Post, No. 3, of the American Legion at Findlay, Ohio, opposing the Burke-Wadsworth compulsory military training bill. This resolution was adopted at their last meeting held July 29, 1940, and forwarded to me by the adjutant of that post, Mr. W. Earl Ulrich.

Whereas the Burke-Wadsworth bill (compulsory conscription) is now pending before the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas the members of the American Legion have always been willing to serve in the armed forces of the United States in cases of emergency and still are willing to serve; and

Whereas the members of the American Legion believe in compulsory conscription when an emergency and the interest of our defense require it to assure the best possible defense for the welfare of our people; and

Whereas the members of the Ralph D. Cole Post, No. 3, of the American Legion of Findlay, Ohio, deem the aforesaid Burke-Wadsworth bill to be premature and not now necessary: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of the said Ralph D. Cole Post, No. 3, of the American Legion oppose the said Burke-Wadsworth bill for the following reasons:

1. It provides for the drafting of 400,000 men by October 1, 1940, despite the fact that it has been thoroughly established by competent testimony of Army and Navy officials that these men so drafted will not have adequate camp and uniform facilities, and there is not and cannot be available at that date or soon thereafter the necessary modern equipment to train them.

2. It provides for the drafting of 1,500,000 men within a span of 18 months from October of 1940, without reasonable assurance of the necessary equipment to train them or adequate camp facilities to house them.

3. The passage of this act would create war hysteria and would divert attention from the all-important task of producing the necessary mechanized equipment of modern warfare, and interrupt the smooth and efficient functioning of our production of war materials and supplies.

4. Compulsory conscription should be resorted to only after voluntary enlistment has been demonstrated to be inadequate, and when all of the equipment and facilities necessary for the proper training of those conscripted are available for their immediate use.

5. The bill vests too much authority in the appointees of the President of the United States in its administration, regardless of the political party in power. Compulsory conscription, if adopted, should be removed from politics and should be administered by an independent, nonpartisan board and responsible only to Congress—the elected representatives of the people; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be given to the press and that true copies thereof be sent by the adjutant of this post to Senators VIC DONAHEY, ROBERT A. TAFT, and Congressman FREDERICK C. SMITH of Ohio.

Barriers to Plane Production Must Be Understood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1940

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to reprint herewith an editorial which appeared in this morning's Pittsburgh Post-Gazette and which is most timely.

[From the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette of July 31, 1940]

BARRIERS TO PLANE PRODUCTION MUST BE UNDERSTOOD

Once again the little word of caution lest exuberance outrun capacity, for which we are indebted to Mr. Knudsen of the National Advisory Defense Commission. In the month of August the schedule of airplane production calls for 895 completed combat and large transport planes, of which 396 will go to the Army and Navy, 236 to the British Government, 84 to other governments, and 174 transports will go into commercial use.

Last week Lord Beaverbrook, British minister for aviation production, broadcast to the English people that the United States would approve a production plan to supply 3,000 planes a month for British war use. Secretary Morgenthau confirmed this, adding that the United States had pledged "every facility" to enable British purchase of 3,000 planes monthly.

There can be no question as to American willingness to supply this number, or any number of planes desired by England. Unfortunately, willingness is not enough. Plants and equipment and skilled mechanics also are needed to build 36,000 more planes annually for export to Britain. Mr. Knudsen, assembling these facts, asserts that England could not expect deliveries under this schedule of new production until late in 1941, or even in 1942.

It is wisest now that we neither fool ourselves nor mislead our friends. There is a great deal of difference between approving a production plan and putting it in operation. Because of misunderstanding as to what this country could supply immediately in the shape of war materials, we have incurred a degree of ill will on the part of many French people who expected more than they received. They had been led to such expectation by unwarranted belief that United States production could be geared swiftly to their needs. That ill will must not be duplicated in Britain because of confusion between "on order" and "on hand." With all the goodwill in the world, the United States cannot send 3,000 planes to England monthly when total production for August is scheduled at 895.

Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a brief trip through the district which I represent in northern Michigan. I found in parts of that district many people who, because of their friendship for and dealings with Canadians, naturally have a great deal of interest in this important question of supplying aid to Great Britain and its colonies. Throughout the entire district I found my constituents genuinely concerned about our own pitiful state of unpreparedness and particularly our lack of aircraft. These people have been led to believe by false propaganda that it is a simple matter to tool the vast manufacturing resources of this country for the immediate expansion of our armament program and particularly the production of aircraft.

Mr. Speaker, you and I know that it cannot be done without upsetting our normal economy, and more particularly it cannot be done until we cut the red tape. Let us stop kidding the people and let us stop kidding Canada and Great Britain.

Yesterday your New Deal leadership forced us to vote $25,000,000 as the initial expenditure of a $65,000,000 program to furnish power in the Tennessee Valley for the manufacture of this aluminum that has to go in these planes. Doubtless some of the people think it was a patriotic act. But what you do not make public is the engineers' testimony to the effect that a steam generating plant of comparable capacity could have been built for $18,000,000 within a year, whereas your hydro plant cannot be completed before the summer of 1942 and then can go into production only when, as, and if there is a spring flood in 1943.

Mr. Speaker, again I ask this question: What crimes will be committed with the taxpayer's pocketbook under the guise of national defense?

Undesirable or Dangerous Aliens—How Shall Congress Deal With Them?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, there are between three and four million aliens now in the United States. Assuming that a large majority of our aliens are peaceful, law-abiding persons who appreciate America and contribute to its upbuilding, yet there are many who are not desirable, either as residents or as citizens, and some who are actually a menace and should be properly dealt with for our national security. The Congress has, within certain constitutional limitations, full and adequate power to deal properly with this class of persons. No constitutional amendment is required to enable Congress to meet the present situation. I maintain that the Government of the United States has plenary power to deal with undesirable aliens, and I demand that they be properly dealt with as a matter of national security. I have worked toward this end in 10 or a dozen instances, but I have not asked for an unnecessary or undesirable constitutional amendment for the purpose. What should be done?

Two courses of legislative action have been begun toward undesirable aliens. One of these is a right method and the other a wrong method. One method is wise, constitutional, and very likely to be effective. The other is exceedingly unwise, unconstitutional, and very probably will be ineffective. The right method was begun several months ago, before this World War started, and has proceeded slowly—too slowly perhaps—because of red tape and the natural cumbersomeness of governmental action. The wrong method grew out of a mixture of motives, encouraged by hysteria and perhaps an honest rebellion against red tape; but it is a rash attempt to short circuit the process and attain a certain objective no matter what it costs America later. This method is like "cutting off the nose to spite the face," or "burning the home to kill a cockroach."

The right method defines undesirable aliens so all may know, and provides for their trial and deportation. It violates no treaty provisions with other governments regarding nationals residing here; it does no violence to constitutional principles which our fathers set up to safeguard personal rights—that is, the personal rights of Americans—and it depends only upon enforcement to be effective. On June 28 the President signed a bill—not the Bridges bill, for it hasn't passed the Senate—but the Smith bill which embodies a right way of dealing with undesirable aliens. Recently the President and Congress transferred jurisdiction over aliens from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice. Our laws have been too lax, and possibly too laxly enforced, but now with the F. B. I. and Department of Justice on the job, and with the proper legislation, we may expect certain undesirable aliens deported. This new method, part of which is already law, and for all of which I voted, will probably deport Harry Bridges and do it in a constitutional manner.

The wrong method was begun on Harry Bridges by rushing through the House on June 13 a bill of attainder which ordered the Attorney General to disregard all other provisions of law and to take Bridges into custody and deport him forthwith. That bill charged no crime, furnished no hearing, permitted no trial, and is the first of its kind ever passed by either House of the American Congress. It is very probable that this individual deportation bill for Bridges will never be effective, for it is not likely ever to become a law, or to be upheld as a law if passed as is by both Houses. It ought not become law, for it is very, very unwise, as well as unconstitutional, because it sets up a dangerous precedent, which, if allowed to stand, would soon be applied to other persons, citizens as well as aliens, and more extreme treatment than deportation. To start something in America like the Allen-Van Zandt bill, which passed the House June 13, to get rid of Harry Bridges would jeopardize us and our children for untold generations and is too great a price for us to pay to get rid of Harry Bridges, irrespective of how undesirable he may be, or any person.

Let us do a thing the right way and not a wrong way which might at first seem all right to some. On June 13 I voted to consider the Allen bill to deport Bridges, hoping to amend it and make it general in its terms and thus constitutional. Let the country be safeguarded from Harry Bridges and Heaven knows how many others in the right way, by well-considered legislation. Thank Heaven, such legislation has been pending for more than a year and a part of it is now law. I think it will be effective.

IF FOLKS ONLY KNEW THAT "THINGS ARE NOT ALWAYS WHAT THEY SEEM"

Would you approve of a nurse putting a nipple on a well-filled bottle and placing it in the crib in the nursery? Well, yes; that seems all right—but certainly not if that bottle is filled with nitroglycerin!

The Third Term—Unwarranted

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, a government is no stronger than its leadership. Ever since the days af Aristotle men have been debating the relative merits of the many governmental systems which he so thoroughly analyzed. They have discussed the values of aristocracies, democracies, oligarchies, and tyrannies. Some have accepted the conclusion to which Aristotle was driven, that each form of government contains within itself forces which will ultimately destroy it. Others have insisted that the philosopher was unjustified, and arguing that for forms of government only fools contest. "That form of government is best which governs best."

Whatever may be the merits of this abstract theorizing we in America know that our system of government has functioned effectively because men have learned to respect and to follow the Nation's leadership. The Presidency of the United States has become a position warranting the Nation's utmost confidence because the men who have occupied the office have placed the Nation above themselves. They have looked upon the White House as a solemn trust to be tended carefully and to be turned over to their successors unimpaired. Even in the midst of the cares of their own office they have found time to discuss its implications and to offer rules of conduct to guide those who follow them.

There has never been a time in the history of our country when any man felt that he was greater than the Presidential chair he occupied. From Washington through Herbert Hoover every President of the United States has yielded to the tradition established in the beginning of our Republic, preventing every effort to win three consecutive terms in the White House. This precedent is defied today. Franklin D. Roosevelt believes that 8 years are not sufficient to carry out his plan "to make America over." He believes that an emergency of such pressing proportions faces this Nation that it demands his personal presence as supervisor of arrangements.

There is no reason in the nature of things to make us believe that Mr. Roosevelt's ambitious plans for this Nation can be achieved in 12 years any more than they were achieved in the last 8. We have reason to believe that Mr. Roosevelt looks upon America as a never-ending problem. Each new partial solution suggests a dozen necessary additional steps. One program leads invariably to another, so that we shall never know when the task set by Mr. Roosevelt has been accomplished. It may take 12 years; it may take 16 years; it may take 20 years. And if we are to continue Mr. Roosevelt in office for a third term, there is no logical reason in the nature of things why he should not remain in office indefinitely in the future.

There is no man alive who believes that all of America's problems can be solved through the simple device of continuing Mr. Roosevelt in office. Our problems are too complex for any one man. If we fall into the fatal error of believing that our President is the only man who can begin to meet these problems, we shall be denying the lesson of all our history. Since the days of the colonists, one new difficulty after another has been confronted and solved by our people. They will continue to be solved without Mr. Roosevelt's presence.

But argument against a third term presents other considerations. Mr. Roosevelt should not be regarded as indispensable. He is not the only leader in our country capable of charting a path through the wilderness. In both great political parties there are many men capable of demonstrating the genius of America.

We should bear in mind the circumstances in which we find ourselves in 1940. Throughout the world, democracy, the right of the people to choose their own leadership, is being relentlessly assailed. We in America have always been proud of the principle of rotation in office. We point to those nations which salute their leaders for 15 or 20 years as illustrations of the surrender of human liberties. Shall we confess in this hour when democracy is on trial, that we too are relying upon one man?

Thomas Jefferson expressed the view that our Constitution itself should limit the term of office for which a President should be eligible. He believed that perpetual reeligibility might one day result in life tenure, and at the end of his second term as President of the United States he declared:

> I should unwillingly be the first person who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office.

To the people of this country Jefferson declared 20 years later:

> Should a President consent to be a candidate for a third election, I trust he would be rejected on this demonstration of ambitious views.

Andrew Jackson might well have been able to break the third-term tradition. He refused. When Gen. Ulysses S. Grant sought a third term, the Republican Party refused to grant him nomination in 1880. When Theodore Roosevelt sought to serve beyond the 8-year limit, the people of the United States rejected him.

We have seen the results of third-term discussion. We know full well that in dictatorship-led countries, the reelection of our President for three terms will give added point to their argument that democratic government is collapsing. It is a sad condition when a nation which subscribes to universal education declares that only one man is able to do its hardest job over a period of 12 years.

Let us tell the world these things:

First. The third-term tradition has served to check any tendency toward a dictatorship in our country. It will continue to do so.

Second. It has discouraged the use of politics and patronage as a means of indefinite continuation in office.

Third. It has given every American the feeling that some day he or his children may prove worthy of the Presidency, since no man may monopolize it.

Fourth. It has prevented Presidents from paying so much attention to the quest for popularity in the hope of constant reelection that they endanger the course of national policy.

In this Nation, let the people speak. Let them decide for themselves who the President of the United States shall be. Let there never come a day when the President becomes so sacrosanct he perpetuates himself in office beyond 8 years of steady usefulness.

We need no third term in 1940.

So long as America lives, we shall never need it.

Propaganda of the Committee to Defend America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. THORKELSON
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 30, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, this country is today being flooded with a mass of propaganda in the papers, over the radio, and in special printed pamphlets which has for its purpose the involvement of the United States in war, either with Germany or Japan.

Members of Congress are the recipients of the bulk of this propaganda, and within the past few days I have received some pamphlets issued by a committee which calls itself the Committee to Defend America, a deceptive title, for it is quite evident that the purpose of this committee is to involve the United States in war on the side of Great Britain. These pamphlets are printed in glaring red and black scareheads, so that they will not fail to attract attention. I do not know whether the red is supposed to represent blood or communism, perhaps both, because bloodshed goes hand in hand with communism.

It is my candid opinion that should Congress investigate this committee it will be found that the Committee to Defend America is not what the name implies, but is, instead, a rabid prointernational and pro-English organization, the purpose of which is to stampede this Nation into war. This committee is not concerned with the safety of America. It is not concerned with the welfare of our people, for if the members of the committee had such interest at heart they would not try to promote a war that could only end in disaster to us, as well as to the nations now engaged in combat.

The contents of these pamphlets are an insult to Congress and one of the best reasons for defeating conscription and the attempt to call the National Guard into active service. There is no need for conscription nor for calling out the National Guard, and there is no need to augment the already immense appropriations, for the money cannot be expended in a useful and sensible manner. Members of Congress should get their feet on the ground and prepare to take charge of the Government instead of leaving its administration in the hands of alien-minded crackpots. Members of Congress must realize that we are heading into a revolution at home, under the excuse of which the Executive will attempt to establish himself in power, as have the dictators of South American republics, namely, by military force. War would give him the power to establish a dictatorship, but our people are not disposed to engage in war for Roosevelt or anyone else.

The next step is internal strife, promoted as it was in Russia by Lenin and Trotsky. Should such revolution take place under the leadership of the Communists who are now well placed in all Federal departments, the President will use it for an excuse to call upon Congress to declare a greater emergency. That would be to establish a one-man control, for who else will be the dictator except the Chief of the Army and Navy? This, however, will not solve the problem, because it is my firm conviction that the Army and Navy will not go along with such plan. As a matter of fact, the Army and Navy should not go along with such plan, because the officers in both services have obligated themselves to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and not the delusionary ideas held by the Chief Executive and his internationalistic advisers.

The two pamphlets which I have obtained permission to insert in the RECORD are vivid examples of false, subsidized propaganda, to confuse the people and lead our Nation into war. This propaganda is issued by people who are alien-minded and dupes of foreign governments; and I am even willing to believe that it is written by the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League, of New York, a league which has preached hatred, enmity and boycott since 1933, when it was organized by the late Samuel Untermyer.

PRIMER OF AMERICAN DEFENSE

COMMITTEE TO DEFEND AMERICA,
45 Devonshire St., Boston, Mass.:

Keep this copy moving. Pass it along. Don't destroy it. Additional copies $2.50 per hundred obtainable at committee headquarters. Contributions—any amount will help to carry on this work. Make checks payable to Allan Forbes, treasurer.

Mr. Speaker, if this is a primer of American defense, we are already considered a British colony by the Committee to Defend America, and the dream of Andrew Carnegie and Cecil Rhodes has already come to pass. I am, however, of the opinion that Americans with our country's interest at heart will think otherwise.

The first thing an invader must have is bases from which to operate. Are there any such bases available to the Nazis on this side of the Atlantic?

There are no bases available for any foreign power on this side of the Atlantic, if such bases have been relinquished by their present owners. It is our duty, in the interest of our own defense to occupy the present French and Dutch possessions in the Caribbean and north from the Guianas.

Yes. Now that Germany controls the French Government, she also may control the French islands of St. Martin, Martinique, and Guadaloupe, * * * within 5 hours' flight of the Panama Canal, * * * and the island of St. Pierre, * * * an ideal submarine base, * * * but—

This question has already been answered, yet to emphasize my statement, let me say that we should occupy these islands, including French Guiana and Devils Island, in order to consolidate North America and provide for its security—is Germany in a position to make use of these bases so close to us? No; because * * *.

The answer given by the committee to this question is partly correct, for Germany is in no position to take possession or occupy any islands in the Caribbean or the Guianas. It is also the very best reason why we should establish bases in the Philippines and in the island of Guam, so that we will not find ourselves in the same position in which Germany is today, namely, without bases for naval and commercial operations.

Germany does not control the sea. * * * She has no lines of communication to these western bases. Why doesn't Germany control the sea? Because of * * *.

Neither Germany, Great Britain, nor any other power has inherent right to control the ocean trade routes. Such routes should, instead, be open to all nations, and will, if left open, provide a more friendly feeling and equitable justice to all. The German Navy has been insignificant, because her interests have been directed in establishing commercial relationship with foreign nations, instead of naval domination and commercial dictatorship, as is the policy of Great Britain.

The British Fleet. As long as the British Fleet defends the Atlantic * * * we are in no immediate danger. Why doesn't our fleet control the Atlantic? Because * * *.

The conclusions drawn in this statement are erroneous, because Russia and Germany have never been able to maintain a fleet, as they lack port facilities for naval operations. Both countries have been successfully blockaded by the British Navy which in itself is unjust and responsible for European ill feeling toward England. Great Britain has never been of any aid to the United States.

The British Navy burned our undefended shore towns in 1776–83, 1812–14, tacitly assisted the rebellion against the United States, 1860–64 gave Napoleon III the green light to transport a large French army and his puppet Maximilian across the Atlantic to Mexico. Britain took advantage of the situation to turn the self-governing community of British Honduras into an empire colony, threatened Venezuela in 1887 and again in 1895–99. Can we be any more sure about England than England was about France. Politicians and admirals are being arrested in England, too. Upton Close in Common Sense for Americans, Living Age, August 1940. (Sargent bulletin, July 29, 1940.)

Our fleet is not large enough to defend us in both the Pacific and the Atlantic. What can we do about this? We must—

This statement is correct for our fleet is not large enough to defend us in the Atlantic and Pacific because we have only one fleet built and maintained. We are now consigned to build two fleets, a policy which I venture to predict will be sabotaged by our politicians. The answer, however, is not what this committee would have us believe, but is to provide for our own defenses so we will not have to depend on England or any other foreign power—help the Allied fleets so that they will continue to defend the Atlantic, at least until we are ready to defend ourselves. If the British Fleet goes under, Germany will also get the British naval bases, which are still nearer our shores. Then we would be even more dangerously threatened. What can we do?

To help the British—not the Allies—so that they can "continue to defend the Atlantic" simply means to make a vassal state of us and place our Navy in a subservient position to the British Fleet. In other words, we leave ourselves hanging on the coattails of John Bull.

Why not build a navy of our own, a navy sufficiently powerful to protect our colonies and our Atlantic and Pacific coast lines? If the British Navy goes under, our Navy will then be large enough to occupy and take possession of all British-owned islands in the Caribbean and off the Atlantic coast. This cannot be done if we maintain, as the committee does, that the British Navy is our first line of defense.

Help England to defend us. Help with the guns, planes, shells, and the things that she must have to continue the fight. That we will do this is Hitler's one great fear. And what can you do?

This question, "What can you do? Help England to defend us!" is just about the most hopeless statement I have ever seen. It is defeatism in its most tragic aspect. Here is what we can do. We can fortify our possessions in the Pacific, including the Philippine Islands and the Midway group. We can build another canal to Nicaragua, to be used for military purposes alone in wartime. We can build another navy over a period of a few years, instead of rushing into construction pell-mell, as we are doing now. After this Navy is launched, it should be maintained by adding new ships yearly, so that its efficiency is always A–1. Our great trouble in the past has been that we have played politics instead of looking after our national defenses and the general welfare of our people. What we need are more pro-Americans and less pro-English and pro-internationalists. What we need more than anything else is a party composed of sound and sensible Americans, who have the country's interest at heart, instead of political parties and political patronage.

I am not worried about Hitler, whether he loves us or whether he fears us. Hitler is only one man, and as one man he can live no longer than the rest of us. Time will, therefore, take care of him, as it will others here who are less patriotic to the United States than he is to his own country.

Suggested message to your Congressman: "It is vital that we realize that the Allies are our first line of defense. I, therefore, urge that you do everything you can to speed up production and delivery of all needed supplies to the Allies." Do it now!

This effrontery; this message which the Committee to Defend America suggests sending to Members of Congress, is in itself the very best reason why we should vote against conscription and the drafting of the National Guard.

Any group, no matter what they may call themselves, which takes the responsibility that this committee has taken in advising people to send this message to Congress, is not only un-American but it does not have the country's interest at heart—and let us make no mistake about that. This committee is interested in one thing alone, and that is to involve the United States in war. My suggestion is that the committee enlist its members, so that they may be sent across to England and fight for the nation they prefer to that of our Republic.

Write or wire your Congressman * * * right now that we must speed up our production of planes and munitions, and must send help immediately to our first line of defense.

It was too late for Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Finland, Belgium, Holland, and France. Are we going to be too tragically late?

I have always maintained that we can serve Central Europe best by leaving them alone. The Treaty of Versailles is the best evidence that this statement is correct. European nations have always settled their boundaries and will in the future without our help. The deplorable part of the invasions referred to is that had we come out in 1933 or in 1939 and said that we would be strictly neutral; that we would give no aid to any belligerent, no doubt peace would have prevailed in Europe today. It is our meddling and fooling with a situation that we know little about, that is in a sense responsible for the present war in Europe. So I say again, let us set our own house in order and allow foreign nations to do the same.

Call the roll. Austria, gone. Czechoslovakia, gone. Danzig, gone. Poland, gone. Norway, gone. Denmark, gone. Holland, gone. Belgium, gone. Luxemburg, gone. France, gone.

Who is left to face a Germany which rides roughshod over Europe? Britain!

Can Britain carry on? Yes! She can if we do our part.

This we must do. Britain is fighting our battle. The British Navy is protecting us. For more than a century, it has been our first line of defense. We and other American countries are safe from attack as long as the British Fleet stands between us and Hitler * * * and no longer.

Tanks, planes, artillery, machine guns, rifles, ammunition, food * * * these Britains must have. We must supply them. Must! In enormous quantities. Without delay. If we fail, another name will be added to the list of countries which were once free but are so no longer. It will read:

The United States, gone.

Let it be understood that Great Britain is not fighting our battles, but instead is fighting her own—which is only just and proper, as it is the first time she has had no help to defend the British Empire. Let it be furthermore understood that our first line of defense is not the British Navy, but it is instead the United States Navy, which is equal to or better than the British Fleet. At any rate, if it is not, it will be when we get through with it. There will be no "Britannia rules the waves" any more, because we are going to rule a few of these waves from now on. Some day the American people will discover the real truth and we will then return again and unite upon those sound principles set forth in the Constitution as it was in its original form when given to us by the founders of this country. When we discover ourselves, we will then develop a part of that spirit of '76, that started the boys marching for freedom.

We have sent ships, planes, and all war equipment that we manufacture to England, even to the point where we have little left for our own protection. We can send nothing more except men, and that we shall not do, as we realize it would be in a hopeless and lost cause. If England is not safe for her noble lords and dukes; if she is not safe for the titled and the wealthy; if she is not safe for the internationalists and for those who control the British Government, she is not safe for anyone of us. If this crowd of refugees who have come here for protection, are unwilling to defend their own empire, it certainly would be a stupid blunder for us to send our men to drown in the Atlantic or to be killed on the battlefields of England.

England could have settled this war by disgorging some of the colonies that she has unjustly held since the World War, and it occurs to me that she should have restored such colonies in the interest of her own people and the security of the British Empire.

I have incorporated copies of this propaganda for war in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD because I want the people to know the pressure which is used to involve this Nation in war. I want them to know that they should pay no attention to any propaganda issued, no matter what the statements may be; for they are issued by a people who have no interest in the United States except for favors they can receive. It is therefore better to allow England to fight this war alone; for in this experience she will think twice before she declares war again.

Provocation—Then War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1940

ARTICLE BY JOHN T. FLYNN

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article by John T. Flynn, which appeared in the Washington Daily News, July 30, 1940. It depicts the provocative war course this Nation is following. Will the American people wake up some day and find Roosevelt's course of action has led to war?

PLAIN ECONOMICS

(By John T. Flynn)

NEW YORK, July 30.—It is not possible to read the daily papers this last week without feeling alarmed at the swiftness with which we are being hustled into war. For instance, military men tell Congress that we must have 400,000 men in the Army by October 1, and add omniously that "maybe" we cannot wait that long.

Another commentator tells us that maybe "days will count soon." What do they mean? The first of October is only 2 months off. What is brewing that may cause us to need that new army before that date?

Then we read that England has blockaded the Spanish coast, and a statement from the British Government that "the United States is expected to promptly end shipments to Spain." The same paper, in a Washington dispatch, tells us that the President has embargoed shipments of oil, etc., to Spain and cut off American shipping thither.

Are the British and American Governments in consultation in the shaping of war moves against Germany? How far does that put us away from war?

And then the American nations are actually considering an arrangement to seize Latin American territories that belong to England or France to prevent them falling into German hands. This is well enough, but we are informed that the American Government considers that Martinique, which belongs to France, has actually changed hands because Germany dominates France, and that therefore we should seize Martinique now.

If we do, France will protest. She will certainly say it is an act of war by the United States and other American governments. If this is carried out, we will have actually committed an act of open war, and we may find ourselves at war. And that any day.

Certainly our Government is leaving no stone unturned to translate events as they arise from day to day into excuses for provocative action against Germany.

Of course, we are told that we must not refrain from doing these things because of fear of Germany's disapproval. This is a very ingenious way of stating the case. The more truthful way is to recognize that we cannot go on committing hostile acts against any power and expect that that power will not recognize them as such and act accordingly.

It is not a question of whether we are afraid of Germany's displeasure. It is a question of whether we want to go to war with Germany—to get into this war. The American people certainly do not want to get in. But assuredly some fatal power, some force which we do not see in daily action and cannot trace, is leading us in that direction.

This will go on—one provocation after another—until one day we will wake up with a difficult incident on our hands. Then all the engines of propaganda will go into action to inflame the American people more than they are already inflamed. We are treading on thin ice.

POEM BY PLINY A. WILEY, OF WICHITA, KANS.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the RECORD a timely and beautiful poem composed by Mr. Pliny A. Wiley, of Wichita, Kans., who feels that in these dark days it may be an inspiration to those who have grave doubts and fears about the future. The poem follows:

OPPORTUNITY

They wrongly speak who say I am no more
And that the future's gates are locked and sealed.
Tomorrow's sun will rise bright shining as before.
My pathway then will clearly be revealed.

There will be work for willing hands to do;
Good seed to sow and golden grain to reap.
I shall rejoice the world's advance to view.
All mankind's gains I shall most surely keep.

Roses will bloom with fragrance rich and rare.
Orchard and field and countryside
In various language will declare
That industry and bounty here abide.

There will be sick and sorrowing ones, I know.
But love will haste with healing to their side.
Within Earth's Eden thistles rank will grow.
Battle and conflict will this world betide.

But God is ruler of the nations yet,
His purpose in the ages to fulfill.
The Star of Bethlehem and Olivet
Will guide men on to greater glories still.

We welcome you, brave comrades in your youth.
The sword of justice and of human right
Will nobly serve you in your quest of truth.
You shall possess eternal hills of light.

Patriotism and 8 Percent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. LEE E. GEYER

FABLE BY O. HORACE FEATHERS

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker under leave to extend my remarks, I include a fable written by one of my constituents. While we are trying to fasten the methods of Hitler by way of regimentation of our male population between the ages of 18 and 64 on our Nation we should pause to reflect. The fable follows:

PATRIOTISM AND 8 PERCENT—A PHABLE INPHECTED WITH PHACT

(By O. Horace Feathers)

Once upon a time, there was a great nation, which was called Democracy, and in which everybody and his uncle had an equal voice, although some grew voice and voice.

In democracy there were two kinds of citizens, the gazabos, who owned all the private property, and the galoots, who did all the work. This arrangement was called private capitalism, in which everybody invested his all. The gazabos invested their money, and the galoots invested their skill. The gazabos drew a dividend of $8 for each dollar invested, and the galoots drew $8 for each week they worked. This racket was known as 8 percent.

And it came to pass, that a warlike neighbor threatened to invade democracy, and a great army was needed pronto, if not sooner. So, the gazabos arranged all the great factories to make war canoes and spears instead of fire chariots and private yachts. This action was prompted by a great surge of patriotism.

Then spake the head man of democracy, saying: "Mah frands, we are sore beset by a nasty outfit. Everybody must help to save his country. All the galoots will be conscripted into the army and to man the war canoes, while all the gazabos will please fix it up so the galoots will have plenty to fight with, while the gazabos will have plenty to fight for, which will make it a fifty-fifty proposition."

Then it come to pass that the gazabos went out on a sit-down strike, saying, "We are not interested. Eight percent is not enough to hire our patriotism, and the limit must be taken off our profits. Otherwise, roll your own war canoes and spears."

But one of the galoots had, through some strange miscarriage of justice, been equipped with a brain when he was built, and he sat down and thought it over. Then he called a war council of all the galoots in Democracy, and said unto them: "See, birds have nests, and foxes have holes, but we have not where to lay our heads. Since these slick foxes and birds of prey own this country, why not let them fight to protect it?"

And, being democracy, it was easy to get justice, and a law was passed requiring one day's service in the war canoes for each $100 of the country that each gazabo and galoot owned. But, since none of the gazabos could expect to live long enough to serve their time, they agreed to be conscripted along with their private property, and fight on equal terms with the galoots. And it came to pass that the nasty outfit was dam well licked.—The end.

Hours-of-Labor Ceiling

LETTER AND DISCUSSION BY COL. PHILIP B. FLEMING, ADMINISTRATOR OF WAGE AND HOUR DIVISION

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, on July 11, 1940, Col. Philip B. Fleming, Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor, wrote a letter to the President of the United States in relation to the question whether in the light of a national-defense emergency, it will be necessary to raise the ceiling for hours of labor and on July 12, 1940, Colonel Fleming and his associate, Mr. Osgood Nichols of the Information Branch of the Wage and Hour Division, engaged in a discussion on a Nation-wide hook-up over the National Broadcasting Company on this subject. Because of the universal interest and because of the information contained in the letter to the President and in the broadcast, I ask unanimous consent to have the letter and discussion inserted in the Appendix of the Record.

There being no objection, the letter and discussion were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

COLONEL FLEMING'S LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT ON THE CEILING FOR HOURS AND THE NATIONAL EMERGENCY

The following letter was read by the President this morning (Friday, July 12, 1940) at his press conference:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
WAGE AND HOUR DIVISION,
Washington, July 11, 1940.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MR. PRESIDENT: The question whether in the light of the national-defense emergency it will be necessary to raise the ceiling for hours, above which time and one-half must be paid, has given me much concern.

As a soldier, the Nation's defense is my primary interest. My assignment to the administration of a labor law has in no way lessened that interest.

Were there any defense need in certain industries for abrogation of the time and one-half rule, nothing could keep me from so reporting. In my contacts with industry no such need has yet been demonstrated to me.

Two documents from the last war should be called to public attention:

One is the wartime report of the British Munitions Commission. The report stated that from experiments spread over thirteen and a half months, a reduction of working hours of munitions workers was associated with an increase of production. For example, in one factory hours of work were changed, first from a 66-hour week to a 55-hour week, and then to a 45½-hour week. Considering the weekly output of the 66-hour week as 100, it was found that the 55-hour week yielded a relative output of 111. The 45½-hour week yielded a relative output of 109. Thus the 45½-hour week yielded more in products than the 66-hour week and practically as much as the 55-hour week. The same results were obtained during the 13-month period in various other munitions factories.

The other document is General Order No. 13, issued by the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, on November 15, 1917—7 months after the declaration of war—when the United States was at the height of its procurement effort. The order stated:

"In view of the urgent necessity for a prompt increase in the volume of production of practically every article required for the conduct of the war, vigilance is demanded of all those in any way associated with industry lest the safeguards with which the people of this country have sought to protect labor should be unwisely and unnecessarily broken down. It is a fair assumption that for the most part these safeguards are the mechanisms of efficiency. Industrial history proves that reasonable hours, fair working conditions, and a proper wage scale are essential to high production. During the war every attempt should be made to conserve in every way possible all of our achievements in the way of social betterment. But the pressing argument for maintaining industrial safeguards in the present emergency is that they actually contribute to efficiency. To waive them would be a shortsighted policy, leading gradually but inevitably toward lowered production."

These documents were drafted almost a generation ago. The production-line techniques of industry have been greatly developed since then. Today maximum production calls for maximum efficiency of the machine. Maximum efficiency of the machine is usually obtained by using relays of workers in shifts short enough to make constantly intense effort possible.

I think it also should be called to the public's attention that the French 40-hour week in effect from 1936 to 1938 had little resemblance to our "ceiling for hours." The French 40-hour week generally was a rigid limitation.

Germany was on an 8-hour-day, 48-hour-week basis from July 26, 1934, to January 1, 1939. A survey entitled "Labor Policy in Germany" appearing in the June 1940 issue of the Monthly Labor Review reports that a 10-hour day, 60-hour week began in nondefense industries after January 1, 1939, due to a labor shortage. In the more vital industries, hours up to 16 per day might be permitted by the factory inspector. But this lengthening of working hours was not successful. The article states: "Production began to fall off rapidly, accompanied by such an alarming increase of industrial accidents and stoppages as to attract the serious attention of the Government authorities. * * * The Government applied the strictest measures against suspected saboteurs but also began to lighten somewhat the hard labor conditions."

Any complaints from the key defense industries that the payment of time and a half for overtime is making difficult their operation will be promptly brought to your attention. To date the Wage and Hour Division has received but three such complaints, all from small establishments.

Respectfully,

PHILIP B. FLEMING,
Administrator.

RADIO BROADCAST DELIVERED BY COL. PHILIP B. FLEMING, ADMINISTRATOR, WAGE AND HOUR DIVISION, UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, OVER THE NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO., FRIDAY, JULY 12, 1940

ANNOUNCER. At this time all the energies of the United States Government, and of many private individuals and industries, are being bent toward national defense. Here in Washington at the moment little else is being talked about. Congress has appropriated unprecedented funds for the Army and Navy. Tonight we have invited Col. Philip B. Fleming, Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor, to discuss the bearing of the wage and hour law on this matter of national defense. The talk will be handled in the form of an interview. Mr. Osgood Nichols, of the information branch of the Wage and Hour Division, will ask the colonel to answer the questions concerning this important matter which he believes are uppermost in the minds of the American people today. Mr. Nichols.

Mr. NICHOLS. First of all, I should like to ask you, Colonel Fleming, whether you think the wage and hour law can be retained, in view of the need for increased production.

Colonel FLEMING. It is not only possible to keep the wage and hour law, but imperative that we keep it.

Mr. NICHOLS. I don't quite follow you there, Colonel. Doesn't the wage and hour law limit the workweek to 42 hours, and, after October 24, to 40 hours? If we don't permit people to work more than 40 hours a week, how are we going to produce tanks, guns, airplanes, and warships quickly enough?

Colonel FLEMING. Surely you haven't forgotten that there are still between eight and ten million people out of work in the United States. Don't you think it will be time enough to talk about longer hours after industry has absorbed these people?

Mr. NICHOLS. Yes; but there was unemployment in France, too. Yet France enacted a 40-hour week law. The result was that the country's industries could not produce the war equipment needed and France was left unprepared.

Colonel FLEMING. I am not quite so sure as you seem to be that France was unprepared from the material standpoint. There doubtless was a deficiency of such things as tanks and airplanes, but that rather indicates a mistake in judgment rather than any shortage of productive capacity. France had prepared to fight a defensive war behind the Maginot line, not a "blitzkrieg" in the open. And we now know that the difficulty may have been political, patriotic, and psychological unpreparedness and not economic unpreparedness.

Mr. NICHOLS. Still, some newspaper columnists and political writers have been saying that the 40-hour workweek was disastrous for France.

Colonel FLEMING. I also have read those columnists and political writers. And it strikes me as rather significant that most of the hue and cry about the need for lengthening the workweek comes from these armchair generals and not from actual employers in the primary defense industries.

Mr. NICHOLS. In other words, you think the armchair generals don't know what they are talking about?

Colonel FLEMING. I'd prefer to say that most of them have drawn conclusions that are much too general from too little evidence. How many of them have pointed out the differences between the French 40-hour law and our wage and hour law? It would seem that if they were aware of the difference they would be honest enough to state it.

Mr. NICHOLS. There is a difference, then, Colonel?

Colonel FLEMING. A vast difference. Take the wage and hour law first. What does it do? It says that all employers subject to the law shall pay their workers at least a minimum wage, which for most industry is now 30 cents an hour. The law also sets a maximum workweek of 42 hours. But the workweek isn't limited to 42 hours. Employees can work any number of hours, provided they are paid time and a half for overtime. If an employer is producing goods directly for the Government's account—and this includes, among other things, guns, airplanes, and battleships—he comes under the Walsh-Healey Act.

Mr. NICHOLS. Doesn't the Walsh-Healey Act call for an 8-hour day?

Colonel FLEMING. Yes; it sets up an 8-hour day and a 40-hour week. But here, again, just as in the wage and hour law, there is plenty of flexibility.

Mr. NICHOLS. You mean that the Walsh-Healey Act permits overtime to be worked?

Mr. FLEMING. Exactly. Any amount of overtime can be worked as long as the employer pays time and a half. Under either the wage and hour law or the Walsh-Healey Act there is nothing to prevent a 60- or 70-hour week, as long as the employer pays extra for overtime.

Mr. NICHOLS. You said a moment ago that our laws differed from the French. What is the difference?
